SEVENTY-THIRD CONGRESS, SECOND SESSION

SENATE

TUESDAY, JANUARY 23, 1934

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Gracious art Thou, O Lord, and full of compassion to the children of men: Wherefore do Thou blot out our transgressions and remember no more our iniquities. Manifest Thyself to us; show us the way in which we should walk, and lift our hearts above our failure and bewilderment, our ignorance and sin, unto Thy perfection.

O Thou ever-living, ever-present Christ, well-beloved of Thy Father, open our eyes that we may see Thee as Thou art; help us so to know Thee that we may love Thee, so to love Thee that we may grow more like Thee, so to follow Thee that through us others may know Thee and find in Thee their hope and joy.

Master of all good workmen, sanctify to each one of us this fellowship of kindred aims, that when the evening comes each mordant note shall have died away and the benediction of Thy pierced hands shall bring peace and perfect harmony to our troubled world. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On motion of Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal for the calendar days of Friday, January 19, and Monday, January 22, was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed without amendment the bill (S. 2284) relating to contracts and agreements under the Agricultural Adjustment Act.

CALL OF THE ROLL

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Costigan	Johnson	Robinson, Ark.
Ashurst	Couzens	Kean	Robinson, Ind.
Austin	Cutting	Keyes	Russell
Bachman	Davis	King	Schall
Bailey	Dickinson	La Follette	Sheppard
Bankhead	Dieterich	Lewis	Shipstead
Barbour	Dill	Logan	Smith
Barkley	Duffy	Lonergan	Steiwer
Black	Erickson	McAdoo	Stephens
Bone	Fess	McCarran	Thomas, Utah
Borah	Fletcher	McGill	Thompson
Brown	Frazier	McKellar	Townsend
Bulkley	George	McNary	Trammell
Bulow	Gibson	Murphy	Tydings
Byrd	Glass	Neely	Vandenberg
Byrnes	Goldsborough	Norris	Van Nuys
Capper	Gore	Nye	Wagner
Caraway	Hale	O'Mahoney	Walcott
Carey	Harrison	Overton	Walsh
Clark	Hastings	Patterson	Wheeler
Connally	Hatch	Pittman	White
Coolidge	Hatfield	Pope
Copeland	Hayden	Reynolds

Mr. FESS. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF], the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. HEBERT], the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK], and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] are necessarily absent from the Senate.

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to announce that the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS] is necessarily detained from the Senate by illness. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

I desire to announce further that the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] is necessarily detained. I also ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Ninety Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

MONTHLY REPORT OF FEDERAL EMERGENCY RELIEF ADMINISTRATION

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the secretary of the Federal Emergency Relief Administration transmitting, pursuant to law, the report of the Federal Emergency Relief Administrator covering the period of November 1 to November 30, 1933, which, with the accompanying report, was ordered to lie on the table.

REPORT OF THE FEDERAL POWER COMMISSION

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Chairman of the Federal Power Commission transmitting, pursuant to law, the thirteenth annual report of the Commission for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1933, also a statement showing the names, titles, and compensations of the members and employees of the Commission as of June 30, 1933, which, with the accompanying documents, was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of South Carolina, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce:

A concurrent resolution memorializing the Federal Government, through the Federal Public Works Administration, to undertake the development of the Santee Cooper River hydroelectric and navigation project, and urging its relation to the national plan of recovery now under way

Whereas it has been determined by competent authority that the project known as the Santee Cooper River hydroelectric and navigation project is feasible, both from an engineering and economic standpoint; and

Whereas it is believed that this project is of no less practical value when the relative costs are considered than the project known as the Tennessee Valley Authority; and

Whereas it is thought that the development of this project at this time affords the Federal Government a useful and worthy means of contributing to economic recovery in that—

(a) It is estimated that this development will afford 7,000 persons useful employment over a period of 3 years.

(b) It will subject to the useful needs of man the waters of a mighty stream that now "runs wanton to the sea."

(c) It will provide power, heat, and light for a vast number of citizens of this State and Nation at a minimum rate of charge by reason of the natural advantages of the project due to the constancy and volume of the stream and the topography of the country through which it runs.

(d) It will be the means of bringing industry in this State, thereby affording opportunities for work in normal periods of natural life for a large number of our people.

(e) It will afford untold advantages of navigation, giving our people a competitive water rate from the seaboard to the interior: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the house of representatives (the senate concurring), That the Federal Government, through the Federal Public Works Administration, be urged to undertake this development of the project known as the Santee Cooper River hydroelectric and navigation project, preferably as a Federal project, that its wonderful advantages and possibilities be given due consideration, and that especial attention be called at this time to the Federal Government to the manner in which this opportunity of development may become related to and contribute to the determined efforts of our great President to bring about national recovery and to set up an order of economy that will give each and every citizen an opportunity to achieve contentment and happiness; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to each United States Senator and Member of Congress from this State, and to the clerks of the respective branches of the Congress.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Columbia, S.C., January 22, 1934.

I hereby certify that the foregoing is a true and correct copy of a resolution adopted by the house of representatives and concurred in by the senate.

[SEAL] J. WILSON GIBBES,
Clerk of the House.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the petition of Pilchuck Tribe, No. 42, Improved Order of Red Men, of Everett, Wash., praying that certain forest areas suitable for recreational purposes be withdrawn from sale until a survey is completed of such areas, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by N.R.A. Lodge, No. 91, American Federation of Government Employees, favoring the immediate restoration of the 15-percent pay cut of Federal employees, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also laid before the Senate the petition of Mr. and Mrs. Mader, of Carrick, Pa., praying for the adoption of the silver monetary standard, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

He also laid before the Senate a letter in the nature of a petition from Mme. Anita de R. Koster, of New York City, N.Y., praying for the passage of the bill (H.R. 6976) to protect the currency system of the United States, to provide for the better use of the monetary gold stock of the United States, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution of the Amalgamated Labor League, of Norfolk, Va., favoring the passage of legislation providing governmental insurance against unemployment and adequate compensation of those adversely affected thereby, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also laid before the Senate a petition of sundry citizens of Los Angeles, Calif., favoring the passage of soldiers' bonus legislation, such bonus to be paid by bonded scrip, non-interest bearing, backed by the United States, to be used as money which can be called by the Government within 13 years, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also laid before the Senate a letter from A. J. Alger, president of the New Age Fellowship, of San Francisco, Calif., submitting a plan looking toward national economic recovery, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the regional conference of the National Woman's Party of the Middle Atlantic States at Harrisburg, Pa., favoring the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution providing equal rights for men and women, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also laid before the Senate papers in the nature of petitions of citizens of North and South Carolina, praying for the passage of legislation providing old-age pensions, which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas presented a letter from George H. Williams, of St. Louis, Mo., suggesting the adoption of a standing order providing for the sending of two copies of the daily CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to former Members of the Senate, which was referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. CAPPER presented a petition of sundry citizens of Bremen, Kans., praying for the passage of the so-called "Frazier farm refinancing bill", which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Bremen, Kans., praying for the passage of legislation requiring packers to buy hogs through open competitive terminal markets, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. ADAMS presented the following joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Colorado, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency:

House Joint Memorial No. 4

Approving the creation and establishment of an additional Federal land-bank district comprising the States of New Mexico, Colorado, and Wyoming (by Representatives Twining and McDonald)

Whereas the State of Colorado is now included in the ninth Federal land-bank district with headquarters at Wichita, Kans.; and

Whereas there has been continued dissatisfaction with the administration of the affairs of the said Federal land bank at Wichita, insofar as it concerns the granting of loans to citizens of Colorado; and

Whereas said bank has failed to function properly during the emergency, and its personnel is made up of men unfamiliar with the problems of irrigation, ranching, and farming peculiar to the Rocky Mountain region; and

Whereas a reorganization of said bank has recently been made which in no way remedies the situation; and

Whereas the Honorable ROBERT D. CAREY, Senator from the State of Wyoming, has introduced a bill into the Congress for the creation and establishment of an additional Federal land-bank district comprising the States of New Mexico, Colorado, and Wyoming, the said bill being sponsored by the Honorable ALVA B. ADAMS and the Honorable BRONSON CUTTING, Senator from New Mexico: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the house of representatives of the twenty-ninth general assembly (the senate concurring herein), That it expresses its hearty approval of the said Carey bill and respectfully requests and urges its passage, in order that the existing unsatisfactory conditions with respect to the interests of Colorado may be overcome; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this memorial be forwarded to the Members of the Senate and House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States from this State, with the request that they give it their support and approval; and that copies hereof be sent to Senators CAREY and CUTTING.

W. H. TWINING,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
RAY H. TALBOT,
President of the Senate.

REPORT OF THE BANKING AND CURRENCY COMMITTEE—UNITED STATES MONETARY SYSTEM

Mr. FLETCHER, from the Committee on Banking and Currency, to which was referred the bill (H.R. 6976) to protect the currency system of the United States, to provide for the better use of the monetary gold stock of the United States, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 201) thereon.

BILLS INTRODUCED

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. McKELLAR:

A bill (S. 2452) authorizing the President of the United States to appoint Sgt. Alvin C. York as a major in the United States Army and then place him on the retired list; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. 2453) for the relief of Drew N. Keever; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. PATTERSON:

A bill (S. 2454) for the relief of Arthur W. Adams; and

A bill (S. 2455) to increase the efficiency of the Medical Corps of the Regular Army; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. 2456) granting a pension to Virginia J. Potter; and

A bill (S. 2457) granting a pension to E. Jane Spencer; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. DICKINSON:

A bill (S. 2458) for the relief of Howard D. Peckham; to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. 2459) for the relief of John C. Harker; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. ASHURST (by request):

A bill (S. 2460) to limit the operation of statutes of limitations in certain cases; and

By Mr. DILL:

A bill (S. 2470) for the relief of Erik Nylin; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. McADOO:

A bill (S. 2471) to authorize the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to adjust interest rates and maturities on obligations arising under subsection (a) of section 201 of Emergency Relief and Construction Act of 1932 held by it, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. LOGAN:

A bill (S. 2472) extending the classified civil service to include special-delivery messengers; to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

FIELD SERVICE POSITIONS OF HOME OWNERS' LOAN CORPORATION

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate Resolutions 132, 133, 134, 135, and 136, which are lying on the table. These are the resolutions which were submitted to the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] some days ago and have reference to the number of persons employed in various governmental activities.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRISON in the chair). Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I suggest that the Senator proceed separately with the resolutions.

Mr. DICKINSON. Yes; they will have to be taken up separately.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. What resolution does the Senator now desire to consider?

Mr. DICKINSON. Senate Resolution 132.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. That is the resolution calling on the Home Owners' Loan Corporation for information with reference to the number of persons employed in the field service in each salary grade, segregated by States, together with the names and addresses of all persons receiving in excess of $2,000 in each State?

Mr. DICKINSON. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I have no objection to the consideration of the resolution.

There being no objection, the resolution (S.Res. 132) submitted by Mr. DICKINSON on the 12th instant was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Home Owners' Loan Corporation send to the Secretary of the Senate the following information, to wit: Number of all persons employed in the field service in each salary grade, segregated by States, together with the names and addresses of all persons receiving in excess of $2,000 in each State.

FIELD SERVICE POSITIONS OF CIVIL WORKS ADMINISTRATION

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next resolution for which the Senator from Iowa asks consideration will be read.

The resolution (S.Res. 133) submitted by Mr. DICKINSON on the 12th instant was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Civil Works Administration send to the Secretary of the Senate the following information, to wit: Number of all persons employed in the field service in each salary grade, segregated by States, together with the names and addresses of all persons receiving in excess of $2,000 in each State.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. As I understand, this resolution calls for information analogous to that embraced in Senate Resolution 132 which had reference to the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, while the pending resolution has to do with the Civil Works Administration.

Mr. DICKINSON. That is correct.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

FIELD SERVICE POSITIONS OF AGRICULTURAL ADJUSTMENT ADMINISTRATION

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa asks unanimous consent for the consideration of another resolution, which will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 134) submitted by Mr. DICKINSON on the 12th instant was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Agricultural Adjustment Administration send to the Secretary of the Senate the following information, to wit: Number of all persons employed in the field service in each salary grade, segregated by States, together with the names and addresses of all persons receiving in excess of $2,000 in each State.

FIELD SERVICE POSITIONS OF FARM CREDIT ADMINISTRATION

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next resolution which the Senator from Iowa asks to have considered will be read.

The resolution (S.Res. 135) submitted by Mr. DICKINSON on the 12th instant was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Farm Credit Administration send to the Secretary of the Senate the following information, to wit: Number of all persons employed in the field service in each salary grade, segregated by States, together with the names and addresses of all persons receiving in excess of $2,000 in each State.

FIELD-SERVICE POSITIONS OF PUBLIC WORKS ADMINISTRATION

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The last resolution which the Senator from Iowa desires considered will be read.

The resolution (S.Res. 136) submitted by Mr. DICKINSON on the 12th instant was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Public Works Administration send to the Secretary of the Senate the following information, to wit: Number of all persons employed in the field service in each salary grade, segregated by States, together with the names and addresses of all persons receiving in excess of $2,000 in each State.

"A NEW MONETARY PROGRAM FOR THE NATION"—ARTICLE BY CHARLES MERZ

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, out of order, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD an instructive article by the prominent journalist, Charles Merz, on A New Monetary Program for the Nation. The article appeared in the New York Times of January 21, 1934.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times, Jan. 21, 1934]

A NEW MONETARY PROGRAM FOR THE NATION—THE FIVE MAIN POINTS OF THE ROOSEVELT PLAN, THE PURPOSES BEHIND THE PROPOSALS TO CONGRESS, AND THE DEBATE THEY HAVE AROUSED

By Charles Merz

The dramatic events of the last week have shaped a new monetary program for the United States. It is embodied in a bill drawn under the President's direction and now pending before Congress. At five important points this measure proposes to change the existing situation:

1. It would fix the limits for devaluation of the American dollar at from 50 to 60 cents in terms of its present gold value.

2. Within these limits it would authorize the President to manage the dollar by making such changes in its value as he finds necessary in order to stabilize domestic prices or to protect American foreign trade.

3. It would impound in the Treasury the vast stocks of gold now held by the Federal Reserve banks and assure to the Government whatever profit may result from an increase in the dollar value of this metal.

4. It would use part of this profit to create a stabilization fund of $2,000,000,000 which could be used by the Treasury for the purchase of gold, foreign currencies, and the securities of the United States Government itself.

5. It would provide ultimately for the return of the United States to a new and modified gold standard.

The present article is devoted to a discussion of these five points, to the debate they have aroused, and to their line of descent from the chief policies hitherto advocated by the Roosevelt administration.

I. DEVALUATION

If we begin with devaluation, let us first note that it does not involve any change in the appearance or relationship of the different coins and bills with which we are familiar. Whether the dollar is worth 50 cents or 60 cents or something in between, it will continue to represent 10 dimes, 20 nickels, 100 pennies. Physically it will be precisely the same dollar we now have in our pockets.

What will be changed, in case of devaluation, is the legal weight of the dollar in terms of gold. This weight is now set at 23.22 grains of fine gold. As long ago as last May Congress gave the President power to reduce this figure by as much as 50 percent. The new factor introduced last week is the proposal that the weight be fixed at no more than 60 percent in case of devaluation. Existing law gives the President his choice of any figure between 50 percent and 100 percent. The plan now before Congress would limit this choice to the narrower range of from 50 percent to 60.

Purpose of reduction

What is the purpose of reducing the gold content of the dollar to either 50 or 60 percent, when the public is at present forbidden to possess gold and when, as we shall note, the President actually proposes to stop coining it in future? The administration is acting on the belief that by reducing the theoretical gold content of the dollar it can increase prices of goods the dollar buys. Wheat is exchanged for dollars and dollars for wheat. If the dollar grows cheaper through reduction of its intrinsic value measured in gold or in foreign currencies, then (it is argued) more of the cheaper dollars will be needed to buy the same quantity of wheat and the price of wheat will rise.

There is considerable agreement, even on the part of those who are skeptical of the theory in its broader applications, that this is likely to happen in the case of certain commodities of particular importance to foreign trade. Thus, Dr. O. M. W. Sprague, formerly financial adviser to the Treasury, and more recently a critic of the plan for devaluation, agreed (in one of his articles published in the Times) that prices of goods exported or imported in large quantities are "directly responsive to changes in the value of the dollar as measured in foreign currencies." As the dollar falls in terms of British pounds, increasing the relative value of the latter, the price of cotton shipped to England tends to rise.

The trend of prices

That this has actually happened in the case of a number of commodities is suggested by the chart at the top of the page. The black line indicates daily fluctuations in the price of gold, measured in terms of dollars, during the last 3 months. The dotted line shows daily variations in Moody's index of the average price of 15 staple commodities: cotton, wheat, corn, wool, hogs, hides, sugar, coffee, cocoa, silk, rubber, copper, silver, steel scrap, and lead.

Most of these commodities are important either as exports or as imports. The index is therefore highly sensitive to dollar fluctuations. The chart shows the result. With considerable regularity the two lines follow the same course. When the price of gold rises—in other words, when the dollar falls in terms of gold—the average price of these commodities also rises. It falls with a decline in the price of gold; that is, with a gain in the value of the dollar.

Many critics of the legislation pending before Congress argue that here the matter ends. They do not believe that depreciation of the dollar has had, or is likely to have in future, a decisive influence in determining the prices of other commodities than those which are important in foreign trade.

An apparent discrepancy

They point out that while the dollar has fallen about 33 percent since the suspension of the gold standard by the United States last April the average of a long list of 784 commodities computed weekly by the Bureau of Labor Statistics has risen by less than 18 percent. They believe, moreover, that much of this rise is due to other influences than dollar depreciation. They call for a currency that will be stable in terms of gold and much closer to its present legal parity than 50 or 60 percent.

On the other side, and apparently in a majority in Congress, are the advocates of devaluation. They believe that England's departure from the gold standard checked the decline of prices in that country more than a year before the same result was achieved in the United States. They foresee a continuing rise of prices as the reduction in the gold value of the American dollar gradually makes its full influence felt. They believe that this rise will include, less directly, but inevitably, prices of other commodities than those exchanged in foreign trade. And they believe that such a rise is necessary in order to improve farm purchasing power, enable goods to be sold at a larger profit, and make possible the payment of domestic debts more nearly at the price level at which they were incurred.

II. MANAGEMENT

In the proposal to fix the gold content of the dollar somewhere between 50 and 60 percent of its present weight, the precise figure would be determined by the President. Why is he given this discretion?

Two reasons are offered by the authors of the plan. First, the President believes that because of world uncertainties it is not desirable in the public interest that an exact value be now fixed. There are negotiations to be undertaken with foreign nations necessarily concerned with the effect which the value of our currency may have on their own foreign trade. There are large elements of uncertainty in our domestic price structure. The President is not yet prepared to recommend a precise figure, and urges Congress to give him a margin of 10 points within which to turn around.

The second reason for this proposed grant of discretionary power inside the 10-point limit is that Mr. Roosevelt retains his faith in the wisdom of a managed currency. In various statements on monetary policy made since he entered office, he has said that he seeks "the kind of dollar which a generation hence will have the same purchasing and debt-paying power as the dollar value we hope to attain in the near future." In other words, having once achieved a satisfactory price level, he would attempt to maintain it—avoiding violent fluctuations either toward higher or toward lower levels, with consequent booms or depressions.

It is plainly with this goal in view that the plan now before Congress proposes to give the President power (within the limits of a 50- to 60-percent value) to alter the gold content of the dollar from time to time * * * whenever and as the expressed objects of this section in his judgment may require. The significance of these words becomes apparent when it is noted that the first of the expressed objects is to stabilize domestic prices.

The process visualized

Under this grant of power the President could attempt to stabilize domestic prices by altering from time to time the gold content of the dollar—always within the 10-point margin specified. If prices began to fall he could endeavor to check the decline by reducing the number of grains in the theoretical gold dollar, thereby making it less desirable in terms of wheat and cotton, and thereby (at least in theory) rallying the prices of these and other commodities. If, on the other hand, commodity prices threatened to rise too rapidly, he could reverse this process.

The difference between a 50-cent dollar and a 60-cent dollar may seem comparatively slight, but is actually a difference of 20 percent. This is a much larger figure than appears in the variation of commodity prices during more normal times than those we have witnessed recently. In the 7 years intervening between midsummer of 1922, when the first post-war deflation was completed, and midsummer of 1929, on the eve of the stock-market panic, the lowest monthly average of commodity prices ever computed by the Bureau of Labor Statistics was 94.1 in June 1927, and the highest was 104.5 in March 1923, and again in November 1925.

There is a spread of only 11 percent between these top and bottom figures. This is considerably less than the 20-percent variation in the gold content of the dollar which the plan before Congress leaves within the discretion of the President.

By giving him explicit power to vary the weight of the dollar from time to time the plan gives him for the first time explicit authority (which he may or may not use) to experiment with a currency so managed as to achieve stability in terms of commodities.

III. IMPOUNDING GOLD

In the President's judgment it is necessary, in order to maintain a proper relationship between currency and prices, for the Government to be the sole custodian and owner of the base or reserve of precious metals underlying its currency. This leads us to the third point in the program now before Congress, namely, the impounding within the Treasury of the Nation's entire stock of monetary gold.

At the present time this stock, amounting in round numbers to $4,323,000,000, is distributed as follows. There is in the Treasury $446,000,000; the Federal Reserve banks hold $3,566,000,000; there is in circulation $311,000,000.

The Treasury's gold consists chiefly of coin and bullion held in trust or in reserve against gold certificates, United States notes, and Treasury notes of 1890. The Federal Reserve banks' gold is pledged (to the extent of about two thirds of the total sum) against notes issued by the Reserve System. The $311,000,000 technically classified as "in circulation" includes not only whatever amounts of gold are now in hoarding but also whatever amounts have been lost, destroyed, or sent abroad without knowledge of public authorities over a long period of years. The figure of $311,000,000 is simply the arithmetical difference between the total amount of gold known to have been coined in this country or imported and the total amount either sent abroad through regular channels or at present in the hands of the Treasury and the Federal Reserve System.

Transfer to the Treasury

The proposal now made, in the plan before Congress, is to transfer to the United States the ownership and possession of the very large amount of gold held by the Reserve banks. There is a difference of opinion concerning the ethics of this action. It is described by some Members of Congress as theft by the Government of something which does not belong to it. Many other Members defend the plan, insisting that the Nation's gold belongs more properly to the public as a whole than to the Reserve banks and that nothing is now proposed which would alter the assets of these banks in relation to their liabilities. It is significant that Governor Black of the Federal Reserve Board has expressed the opinion that any enhancement of the value of the gold "arising solely through such monetary policy of the Government should inure to the Government."

The actual mechanics of taking over the gold would be as follows:

It would gradually be transferred physically to the Treasury's vaults in Washington, to the mints in San Francisco, Denver, and Philadelphia, and to the assay office in New York and elsewhere. (Part of it is already in these institutions, held there in safekeeping for the Federal Reserve banks.)

As the gold was transferred, payments for it would be made with gold certificates issued by the Treasury. But these certificates would not continue to be precisely what they are today—essentially warehouse receipts for the metal. Once the Federal Reserve banks had surrendered their gold, they could reclaim only such amounts of it (on presentation of their certificates) as were judged by the Secretary of the Treasury to be necessary to maintain the equal purchasing power of every kind of currency of the United States.

Position of the Reserve System

The transaction would not alter the position of the Reserve System. For the gold it turns in, it would receive certificates secured at all times, dollar for dollar, by gold in the Treasury. These certificates could be used as a backing for its own notes, and neither its liabilities nor its assets would be altered. Nor would its present power to issue additional notes be curtailed. The bill before Congress specifically amends existing law, in order to authorize the reserve banks to maintain reserves against their notes in gold certificates rather than in gold.

At the end of the process the reserve banks would have the certificates; the Government would have the gold. It is evident that, in case of devaluation, the Government would reap a profit from its ownership of the metal. For the dollar value of gold would be increased by a reduction in the amount of gold theoretically contained in each dollar unit. The plan before Congress expressly reserves this profit to the Government—at the same time casting upon the Government any potential loss which might subsequently be incurred through any decision to increase the gold content of the dollar.

With the gold now held by the reserve banks added to its own stock, the Treasury would have about $4,000,000,000. Devaluation to a 60-cent dollar would yield, in round numbers, a profit of $2,667,000,000. On the basis of a 50-cent dollar the profit would be $4,000,000,000.

IV. STABILIZATION

Out of this potential profit—to be realized when devaluation at a precise figure is formally proclaimed by the President—comes the fourth important change proposed last week: The creation of a stabilization fund amounting to $2,000,000,000.

The manner in which this fund would be managed is described in the pending measure. It would be used, within the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, for the purchase or sale, at home or abroad, of gold and foreign exchange, and such other instruments of credit or security as he may deem necessary * * * for the purpose of stabilizing the exchange value of the dollar at whatever figure might be decided upon by the President as the proper point for devaluation.

This purpose is similar to that which Great Britain seeks to accomplish through the manipulation of an equalization fund amounting, at present rates of exchange, to about $1,750,000,000. Great Britain has not formally devalued the pound; but there is a range within which the British Government desires to keep it, well below par, for the benefit of British foreign trade and the support of domestic prices.

Whenever the pound threatens to rise above the desired range, the managers of the equalization fund sell pounds for gold or foreign money, in order to depress the value of British currency in terms of foreign exchange. Whenever the pound threatens to fall below the desired range, the managers of the fund reverse this process.

Government securities

The bill proposing to establish our own fund is broadly enough drawn to authorize purchases not only of gold and of foreign currencies, but also of bonds of the United States Government. Such purchases may be made if they are regarded by the Secretary of the Treasury as essential to the stabilization of the dollar.

The President has estimated that within the next 6 months the Government will need to borrow $10,000,000,000, of which $6,000,000,000 is needed to cover new expenditures and $4,000,000,000 to redeem maturing obligations. Borrowing on this scale may tend to depress the value of Government bonds. Under the proposed plan, the Treasury would have power to support the market for its own securities, provided devaluation occurred at an early enough date to bring the stabilization fund into existence while the Government was still borrowing heavily.

Either a profit or a loss might result, of course, from the operation of the fund, depending upon the appreciation or depreciation of such securities and foreign exchange as the Treasury might purchase. The plan before Congress calls for an annual audit of the fund and a report to be submitted to the President.

V. NEW GOLD STANDARD

Finally, while a large part of the potential profit of devaluation would be utilized in the first instance in this manner, what would become of the actual gold taken over by the Treasury?

The plan provides that it shall be withdrawn from circulation and, together with all other gold owned by the United States, shall be formed into bars of such weights and degrees of fineness as the Secretary of the Treasury may direct. There would be no more eagles, double eagles, and half eagles. No gold shall hereafter be coined, and no gold coin shall hereafter be paid out or delivered by the United States.

The Nation's currency would continue to have the backing of an actual metallic reserve. But the gold standard now envisaged as an ultimate goal of the Roosevelt administration would differ in one important respect from the gold standard in effect before 1933.

It was one of the characteristics of this earlier standard, perhaps the only completely free gold standard in the world, that it imposed no restrictions internally or externally on the movement of gold. Such a system could be maintained only if the country's stock of gold were adequate to meet the demand. It was entirely adequate in normal times. But a stock valued at 4 billions could not possibly be stretched to cover 6 billions of paper currency and 43 billions of bank deposits, if all of the owners of paper currency and all of the owners of bank deposits suddenly wanted gold at once.

The experience of 1933

It was a panicky effort to convert credit into cash that brought on the banking crisis of last February, before the Roosevelt administration entered office, and this experience is responsible for the changes now proposed. Henceforth, if the present plan is enacted into law, the Nation's currency would have gold behind it but would not be convertible into gold. Gold coin would cease to be used as a medium of exchange within the United States (comparatively little use was made of it for this purpose before 1933); but gold in the form of bars could, with the approval of the President and the Secretary of the Treasury, be used by the Federal Reserve banks for the purpose of settling international balances.

It is interesting to note that in recommending this procedure the Roosevelt administration is pursuing a policy widely endorsed by financial opinion in other countries. Proof of the fact is to be found in the following resolution, unanimously adopted by one of the subcommissions of the World Economic Conference last summer:

"Under modern conditions monetary gold is required, not for internal circulation, but as a reserve against central bank liabilities and primarily to meet external demands for payments caused by some disequilibrium on foreign account. It is consequently undesirable to put gold coins or gold certificates into internal circulation."

International angles

It thus happens that a measure recommended by Mr. Roosevelt primarily because of national considerations is at the same time a measure which has received international support, because it promises greater economy in the use of gold, and thereby, in effect, an increase of the supply.

There are several passages in the message in which Mr. Roosevelt recommended his program to Congress showing at other points an interest in the international aspects of monetary control. The President expressed his "hope that, despite present world confusion, events are leading to some future form of general agreement." He emphasized for the first time since last May, the desirability of "some greater degree of stability of foreign exchange rates in the interests of our people." He spoke of the possibility of "a future agreement among the nations of the world for a redistribution of the world stock of monetary gold."

Such statements as these reveal a desire to avoid a war of currency depreciation and to seek instead, as rapidly as circumstances permit, the establishment of a new and perhaps greatly modified international gold standard.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Morning business is closed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I ask unanimous consent, after the conclusion of morning business and the remarks of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS], of which he gave notice yesterday, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of unobjected bills on the calendar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. SMITH. May I ask the Senator from Arkansas if he expects to have an executive session today?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I do expect, following the order for which I am now asking, that the Senate will proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, may I ask my leader, Would it be possible for me to work in a speech on the St. Lawrence Waterway Treaty?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes; I apprehend that the call of the calendar for unobjected bills will take a comparatively brief time; and, following that, it is my intention to move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business, in order that the treaty may be laid before the Senate.

Mr. COPELAND. Then, may I tell Senators that I hope to speak for not more than an hour on the subject, and I should like to have an audience for the first 10 minutes. After that I am willing to have Senators consult their pleasure.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. We shall try to grant the request of the Senator from New York.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Arkansas? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT—APPROVAL OF A BILL

Messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, who also announced that on January 20, 1934, the President approved and signed the act (S. 2125) to continue the functions of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, to provide additional funds for the Corporation, and for other purposes.

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY MAPS

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, on behalf of the Foreign Relations Committee I have had three maps prepared for the use of the Senate in the discussion of the St. Lawrence Treaty. I am simply inviting attention to them.

The first map, entitled "Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Seaway", shows the area tributary to the seaway as determined by the engineers and by the Interstate Commerce Commission, where joint rates meet, and so forth.

The second, or center map, entitled "Improvements to be made in connecting the channels of the Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence River under treaty pending before United States Senate", is an enlargement of the map which was submitted by the board of engineers of the Army as an accompanying document to the President's message. I have simply had it enlarged so it may be studied more easily.

The third map is a new map, not found in any of the reports. It has been prepared by the engineers at my request as Chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee. It shows the Mississippi water system. It also shows the development of the water system so as to increase the supply of water at low water on the Mississippi River, giving the figures at each junction and the amount of increase of water in the river. There will later be submitted a report from the board of engineers as to the amount of water necessary for the Mississippi River project.

LOANS BY FARM CREDIT ADMINISTRATION

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, yesterday in the discussions in the Senate some mention was made of the progress of loans being made by the Farm Credit Administration, including loans made by the Federal land banks. I desire to have printed in the RECORD a memorandum which has been submitted by the Farm Credit Administration showing the rate at which loans are now being made, the number of loans closed between May 1 and December 31 of last year, the amount and number of loans approved as of January 17, 1934, the total loans closed and approved of January 20, 1934, the amount under that item being $992,490,523.

May I add that the loans closed between May 1, 1933, and December 1, 1933, aggregated about $210,000,000, of which $140,000,000 were land-bank loans and $70,000,000 were Commissioner's loans. Loans are being disposed of or closed at the rate of from $5,000,000 to $6,000,000 a day.

This information emphasizes the importance of the bill that was passed yesterday.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BRIEF STATEMENT OF MORTGAGE LOANS BY FARM CREDIT ADMINISTRATION

Number of applications received May 1, 1933, to January 17, 1934, 528,549 for $2,189,000,000.

Loans closed from May 1, 1933, to January 20, 1934, $290,401,900.

Present rate of closing from five to six million dollars a day, or one hundred to one hundred and twenty-five million dollars per month.

Loans closed May 1, 1933, to December 31, 1933, about $210,000,000, of which $140,000,000 were land-bank loans and $70,000,000 Commissioner's loans.

Loans approved but not closed as of January 17, 1934, 303,507, amounting to $702,088,623, of which $413,555,784 represented Federal land-bank loans and $288,532,839 represented Commissioner's loans.

Total loans closed and approved up to January 20, 1934, amount to $992,490,523.

About 90 percent of proceeds of loans were used by farmers for refinancing indebtedness. Of this amount more than one third was used to refinance mortgages and short-term notes held by commercial banks. About $70,000,000 loaned to farmers for this purpose. The remainder used to refinance debts due insurance companies, merchants, joint-stock land banks, miscellaneous creditors, and to pay taxes. Some scale-down of indebtedness effected in 17.3 percent of Commissioner's loans and 3.3 percent of land-bank loans. Average scale-down of debt by Commissioner's loans, where scale-down occurred, was 23 percent.

In addition to any saving in principal, farmers refinanced will save about 25 percent of previous annual interest payments. Saving to land-bank borrowers by reduction in interest rate on mortgages outstanding about $11,000,000 per year for next 5 years. Saving in interest on new loans closed to January 1, 1934, about $2,700,000 a year.

Applications still being received at rate of 12,000 to 14,000 per week. Banks current on appraisals. Considerable delay in effecting scale-downs where necessary to complete loan. Very important to speed passage of bill as much as possible to avoid interruption of refinancing program.

GOLD VALUATION OF THE DOLLAR

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I am going to embrace the opportunity of answering a great portion of the mail that has come to my office during the last 2 or 3 days by the method of addressing the answers through the columns of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. That is due to the physical impossibility of attending to even a slight portion of the very heavy mail that has come in within the last 4 or 5 days, since the devaluation-of-the-dollar issue has been before the country.

As I read these letters, I think they are probably stimulated by the request that has been made over the air that Senators and Representatives should be addressed on the subject. The mail yesterday and today is comparable only with that which my office received when we were in the agitation for the cash bonus. At that time as many as 1,031 pieces of mail reached the desk in one of the five mails that are delivered every day. The mail yesterday and today has not been quite so enormous, but it expresses a sentiment and an intensity of feeling that is quite unlike that of the correspondence on the cash bonus.

Take it at random:

Please allow me to ask you to give your undivided support to the demand for the revaluation of the gold dollar and the remonetization of silver.

That is the general request. Some of the letters are not requests; they are like this:

As witnessed by our signatures below, we demand—please understand, demand—that you, as our duly appointed representative, representing this district, not the international bankers, central bankers, foreign interests, etc., favor the Reverend Charles E. Coughlin's unshackled commodity dollar.

That is signed by probably 50 different people.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WHITE in the chair). Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. FESS. I do.

Mr. LEWIS. Before the able Senator goes further, will he allow me to take advantage of the statement he has made to insert in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the fact that the volume of mail to which the able Senator has alluded as oppressing him is very similar in amount to that which likewise comes to active Senators on this side, and equally accounts for our utter inability to reply?

Mr. FESS. I thank the Senator, because I assumed that that was true of every Member of the Senate.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. FESS. I do.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask what suggestion the Senator from Ohio may have to relieve this congested condition in our offices. I think I can speak for every Senator on this side of the Chamber when I say that he cannot read his mail; he cannot answer it; he cannot give attention even to the telegrams that come in. His office force is wholly insufficient to handle the routine matters that come into his office.

In addition to what the distinguished Senator from Ohio has, we have those who desire offices. There are several Democrats who would like to have offices these days. [Laughter.] We have all that in addition to what the distinguished Senator from Ohio has to contend with, I imagine, because I do not think he would try to get many offices for Democrats.

Mr. FESS. It would not be any use.

Mr. LOGAN. I should like to hear some constructive suggestion as to what can be done. We work day and night, and cannot do one tenth of the things we are expected to do.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I cannot give any suggestion of relief. The only thing I can say is that not desiring to ignore the correspondence, as no Senator would like to do, I am taking this method—which might be regarded as an imposition on the Senate—of answering the mail.

The congestion in Senators' offices on matters of office-seeking is not so serious as the congestion on matters of legislation. I have not very much sympathy for Democratic Senators who are burdened on that score, but I do have the sympathy that I have for myself, for every Senator who desires to answer all his correspondence. It is simply an impossibility.

I brought to the Senate Chamber these packages of mail that came to my office yesterday afternoon and this morning. They are simply enormous. Not all the letters are couched in the same language. They are not all one-sided, either. Some of the letters protest against devaluation of the dollar; but the vast mass of the correspondence urges, in rather unthinking terms, that support should be given to these propositions. Some of the letters even ask us totally to abdicate all responsibility of expressing judgment and vote as rubber stamps because the President has asked that such and such a thing be done.

Mr. President, I have never subscribed to that theory of legislation. While I do not want to ignore this vast mail, I am not going to run away from any threats that are being made, nor am I going to show disrespect for, or ignore, requests. I do not mean by that statement that I am going to do what is wanted of me, but I will state why I cannot do what is desired.

Mr. President, if I had had no experience of any sort in the discussion of the money question, I might be somewhat disturbed by this enormous volume of mail; but, bad as it is, it does not hold a candle to the excitement of 1896, when the free and unlimited coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1 was announced as a cure-all for the economic ills from which we were suffering at that time.

When that theory was first announced, it swept the country just as the suggestion of the devaluation of the dollar is sweeping a certain class of thinkers in the country today; but it was more intense. It was the source of greater aggregations in the way of meetings and of greater demands. It was the occasion for a much finer type of oratory than we have had at this time anywhere, either in committees or on the floor of either Chamber.

It was on that occasion that, having been a teacher of finance in a university, I accepted challenges in debate ranging from college and university professors to Governors of the Western States. When I speak on the effort to bring about a fiat issue—whether it be by artificial decree of the Government in fixing a ratio or by the issuance of irredeemable certificates, it is fiat just the same—my judgment is not an impulse. It is not sudden. It is the result of study and open expression upon every occasion.

I was in Congress in 1913, when the Federal Reserve Act was passed. I was one of 37 Republicans in the House of Representatives who supported it, not only by my vote but by my voice. I offered an amendment to the Federal Reserve Act which was the only amendment of the 200 and more offered by Republicans that was accepted. That amendment was in these words:

After the word "repealed", strike out the period and add the following: "Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to repeal the parity provision of the act of March 14, 1900."

And then I quote that act in the amendment:

An act to define and fix the standard of value and maintain the parity of all forms of money issued or coined by the United States, to refund the public debt, and for other purposes.

That is the amendment that was offered in the House of Representatives by a Republican, and the only one that was accepted by the Democrats; and it was to preserve the gold standard in the Federal Reserve Act. It is true that the distinguished Chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee in the House, who is now the greatly honored senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], said he did not believe that that language was necessary in order to maintain the gold standard; that he rather thought the Federal Reserve Act did not operate to repeal the act of March 14, 1900, which placed the Nation on a gold basis; but he saw no particular harm in it. The amendment came to a vote, and after a discussion which lasted until 11 o'clock that night the vote was 299 for it and 68 against it.

When the bill came from the House to the Senate including that amendment, there was a change in the wording, but the change was not substantial. It still retained the gold standard in more specific terms than the bill had before the amendment was offered. So when the people of Ohio are propagandizing me to vote to devalue the dollar or to vote for the issuance of greenbacks, I do not hesitate to say that I cannot do it. That is not because it is a momentary opinion. It is my judgment that this is a great blunder, economic, governmental, and in every other way, except that if the devaluation were limited to debt-paying there might be some basis for that contention. However, in the last analysis it will not be beneficial even to the debt payer.

Mr. President, the proposal to devalue the dollar is only another form of repudiation to the degree to which the devaluation takes place. If we are to enter on the policy of devaluing the dollar, of course, I think everybody must agree that if it can be honorably done, the Government should take whatever profit is to be derived by that process.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Does the Senator mean by that declaration to assert that once a monetary standard is fixed, it can never be changed so as to regulate monetary units as of less value than exist at the time the change is made?

Mr. FESS. No; I do not mean anything of the sort.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Then what does the Senator mean?

Mr. FESS. I mean that if there is an obligation to pay a debt, and that obligation is represented by so many ounces of gold or grains of gold, it cannot be discharged by the payment of a reduced number of ounces or grains of gold. If the number is reduced, and the difference is represented by an issue of certificates, that part of it is fiat, and that much of the debt is repudiated.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Then, so far as the power of Congress to coin money and regulate the value thereof is concerned, it is inoperative and ineffective insofar as obligations existing at the time of the exercise of the power are concerned?

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I am not speaking of what Congress can do or what it cannot do. I have not entered upon the constitutionality of this sort of legislation. I am speaking of whether it is honest to undertake to scale down obligations by changing the medium by which the debt is paid without the consent of those to whom the obligations are due.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for one more question?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. If it is dishonest to exercise the power to coin money and to regulate the value thereof, a power vested in the Congress, then, under the Senator's viewpoint, that provision in the Constitution is inoperative unless the Congress chooses to do something dishonest. Is it not rather the better viewpoint that all contracts are entered into with a fair understanding of the existence of this power, and of the likelihood of its exercise, if, in the public interest, it becomes necessary to exercise it?

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, a code of ethics which would permit the Government to take advantage of a contract but would not permit an individual to do so is something to which I do not subscribe. Of course the Government can coin money, and regulate the value thereof. The Government can fix the standard of weights and measures. The Government can say that instead of 60 pounds of wheat making a bushel, 30 pounds shall constitute a bushel. The Government can say that instead of 3 feet being a yard, 18 inches is a yard. But I say such a thing would be a dishonest proposal if we should undertake to apply it to contracts already made; and the Senator himself must admit that.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Does not the Senator come back to the proposition advanced in my previous question, namely, that, in his opinion, once a standard of measurement or of value is fixed it cannot be changed honestly with respect to existing conditions or obligations? Is not that the effect of the Senator's contention, and does he not recognize that?

Mr. FESS. It is the effect, unless we are willing to admit that the Government can take property without consideration, can cancel an obligation without payment.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I do not regard the exercise of the power to coin money and to fix the value thereof as a taking of private property.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I cannot understand the attitude of my friend from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. May I say that it is equally difficult for me to comprehend the attitude of my friend from Ohio? [Laughter.]

Mr. FESS. I am not responsible for the inability of my friend to understand plain, ordinary logic.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Nor am I responsible for the inability of my friend from Ohio to understand plain logic. [Laughter.]

Mr. FESS. Plain logic can prove that the Senator cannot go out the door, and the Senator would rely upon plain logic in the face of the fact that he can go out of the door. I can prove to the Senator that he cannot pay his debts——

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator will have no difficulty in proving that. I admit it. [Laughter.]

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, let us get back to the fundamentals. Here is a proposal to take $4,000,000,000 of gold and, by a Government decree, make it eight billion overnight without adding a single red penny to the wealth of the country, and with the difference, which is purely fiat, pay the obligations of the Government. Yet men say that is not dishonest, that that is not taking value without consideration. That is precisely what this proposal is. As I stated before, if we proceed to bring about devaluation, then, of course, if there is any way to do it, whatever profit comes out of it should go to the Federal Government.

Mr. President, citizens have written me at different times asking where there is any justification for doubling the value of the gold now in the possession of the Federal Reserve banks. I stated that there was no justification for it and that it should not be done. But if it is done, we do not cushion the guilt in any way by taking the profit from those in whose possession the gold was, increased in value by our own decree. That is not honest.

The only contention I can see for this proposal is that the Government is in a bad state in regard to its obligations and needs money, and if it can create by fiat $4,000,000,000, by a decree of this sort, it will have that much money to apply upon its indebtedness if it is not applied in some other form. Even if it does that, that is only temporary, it is only a partial payment, and we will still have to struggle against the dangers of a break-down of our national credit.

In reading the President's message and giving it the most careful analysis of which I was capable, and then reading the bill which was presented by the chairman of the committee, obviously prepared at the White House to carry into effect the message, I find that the proposal is to limit the devaluation to from 50 to 60 cents on the dollar. The question is not as to the degree to which it should be limited; it is whether there should be devaluation without recompense to those whose property is being taken and at the cost of every citizen who is selling services.

If we devalue to the extent of 50 to 60 cents, the only question I can see in that, aside from what I regard as dishonest, is the degree to which the valuation should go. The devaluation will have a range of 20 percent; and if stability is necessary, if the purpose of devaluation is to stabilize, with a variation of 20 percent there can be no stabilization. The man who is engaged in business, who is making a contract to be executed, say, 6 months or a year hence, wants to know what money will be worth when that contract is to be executed; and if he cannot know what it is to be worth, he is not going to risk any investment. The Damoclean sword of uncertainly as to the value of money is suspended over business today, is preventing expansion in business, and is a deterrent, if not an absolute obstacle, against substantial recovery.

There is talk about stabilization, but when there is the suggestion of a variation of 20 percent in costs, there can be no stabilization at all, for if a man feels that he is risking a loss of 20 percent in cost, he is not going to launch into business.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LOGAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I interrupt the Senator for the purpose of asking a question. We are confronted, are we not, by two alternatives? Under the action of Congress last spring, which I joined the Senator from Ohio in opposing, the President already has an opportunity to swing the lack of stabilization through 50 points.

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The pending proposal brings the President back to 10 points. Might it be said, then, that this proposal is at least a first step back toward some degree of stabilization?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, may I ask if the able Senators from Michigan and Ohio will kindly extend their confidential communications to this side of the Chamber, so that we may get the benefit of the wisdom they are imparting?

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, for the information of the Senator from Illinois, I will say that the Senator from Michigan asked whether stabilization within a range of 10 points would not be more acceptable, or would not be a step closer to what we want than a variation of 50 points, such as we now find to be possible. My reply to him was that it would be more acceptable.

The only contention I desire to make is that a 20 percent range is not stabilization. It is no assurance to any business risk; and it must be recognized that there is no progress in business outside of venturesomeness. The very element that makes for expansion in business is that of venture, the running of a risk. The element essential to a revival of business is more or less that of venture. No new business is launched that does not involve the element of venture.

If we now add to the venturesome element, which involves uncertainty as to what the result will be, the other element of unstable currency, so that the contractor obligated under a contract does not know what will be the worth of his money when it either is to be paid by him or received by him, he is not going to engage in a new enterprise. So stabilization within a 20-percent range is a step in the right direction, but it is not real stabilization. If it could lead to something definite, fixed, we all would welcome such stabilization.

Replying further to the Senator from Michigan, he has in mind, I am sure, the same conviction entertained by me as to the present trend. I do not like it, but it is better than nothing. I do not want, however, to be put on the alternative side and be compelled to say I have got to accept this or else I have got to accept something worse. That is not sound procedure. The same idea is in the mind of the Senator from Michigan—I have not talked to him, but I think so—in regard to the Government taking over the profit. If the action proposed is to be taken, of course the Government ought to retain the profit, if it can be done legally and justifiably, rather than to allow the profit to go into the hands of those who are benefited by the decree of the Government. But I do not want to be put in a position, especially when there is neither rhyme nor reason for the act, of saying, "We are either going to have to commit an act of theft or else we are going to have to face great dangers in the future." That is not a sound principle on which to predicate any action.

The primal error was the original abandonment of the gold standard, which was done without rhyme or reason, and never up to this good hour has there been any explanation of why it was done. The error having been committed, there now are Senators on both sides of the aisle who will feel that devaluation probably is the best next step. So many who do not want to have such errors committed will find themselves in a compromising position, not wanting to vote for something they do not approve, and yet afraid not to cure in part a condition that now exists. I wish to say once for all that I do not qualify in the class that has to be strong armed by the statement, "If you do not do this, you are going to get something worse."

The limits of devaluation may be discussed from another standpoint, but before I come to that, Mr. President, I desire for a moment to consider the effect of this proposal on the present Federal Reserve System. As I previously stated, when a young man reading Twenty Years in Congress, by James G. Blaine, and the works of other writers on various subjects political in character, I was impressed, long before I ever thought of service in the Congress of the United States, by the argument that our national banking system must be revised; that under the then existing system it could only exist on the basis of a debt, as the currency was issued upon Government bonds, and the time would come when that system would have to be changed. When I entered Congress the revision of the banking system was one of the first subjects of major discussion, and, naturally, I was deeply interested in it. I do not want to see the system that has since been created broken down.

The step proposed, Mr. President, if I understand it correctly, is a direct assault on the very foundation of the Federal Reserve System. The Federal Reserve System was created in response to a wide general demand that currency be issued to correspond to the needs of trade. It was felt that as trade in certain seasons greatly expanded there ought not to be a fixed monetary system whereby the currency in circulation could not be increased; that there ought to be a system whereby if there should be demand for new currency, new currency could be safely issued, and if that demand should pass away then currency issued beyond the needs could be retired. It seemed that the Federal Reserve System, if properly operated, would do that very thing, and we thought the danger of financial crises had become a thing of the past; that the Federal Reserve System would be sufficient to respond to any needs of economic demand, and we therefore would avoid the cycle of periods of great prosperity being followed by years of severe depression.

The World War severely tested the Federal Reserve System, and yet, although there was an enormous overexpansion of credit which at times made it appear we were close to the abyss, we got through without any serious result to the System.

Then came the war-time inflation of business, with business being done on installments; when we followed the recommendation of a very popular writer that every man should not only have one automobile but should have two; when we lived on an artificial price scale that people were foolish enough to believe could be made permanent. This was continued until money flowed from the rural sections into the center of activity, as represented by the stock exchange, until the collapse was inevitable, although the symptoms of that danger had been foreseen and warnings had been issued by those high in the Government of the United States that danger was ahead. At that time the Federal Reserve System was again tested to such a degree of severity that some people even suggested that it had broken down. I hardly think that the statement that it has broken down is correct, although it is true that it could not handle such an artificial situation as had been created as the result of war inflation.

Now, Mr. President, an effort is being made to solve the problem that has come as an aftermath of the World War and to remedy the evils of the depression that is the direct result of the employment of unsound economic principles, not only of business but of banking by resorting to more unsound proposals and further suspension of fundamental principles.

We are now in the backwash of that war, and while it is true that the death of 10,000,000 of the flower of the world's manhood and the destruction of $100,000,000,000 of values and the mortgaging of much of the future, as the result of conducting the war, had a bad effect, the present occupant of the chair [Mr. BAILEY in the chair] now knows that no element in this backwash is so dangerous in its result as abandonment of sound principles of business. That is the calamity from which we are suffering today; and in this sea of mortgages, difficult to pay, it is now suggested that those mortgages should be paid by fiat money in a certain form, and that we should enter upon a new system of credit, the result of which no living man can foresee.

Mr. Young said yesterday, as I read his statement in the newspapers, that the expansion of credit by the act now proposed may reach from $30,000,000,000 to $40,000,000,000; Mr. Burgess stated that it may reach from $20,000,000,000 to $30,000,000,000; Professor Warren stated that those figures are too high, but that it may reach $7,000,000,000 and it may reach $17,000,000,000.

The field of variation, the realm of uncertainty in the mind of the authors of this proposal is 140 percent; he comes only that near being certain. It may be $7,000,000,000 and it may be $17,000,000,000—a variation of only $10,000,000,000, one and a half times the minimum, or a variation of nearly 150 percent.

Why does Professor Warren say that? Because he cannot know, as no other man can know, what the expansion of credit may be. Why does Owen D. Young say it will be from $30,000,000,000 to $40,000,000,000? It is because of the background of Mr. Young and his business experience. As will be recalled, he was the leading figure in the Dawes Commission, created to adjust the basis of Germany's payment of reparations, and later the head of the Commission which revised those figures, known as the "Young Commission." While Mr. Young cannot authoritatively state what the effect will be, I am more inclined to take the view of a man whose theory is reinforced by experience than the theory of someone who is in his cloister all the time.

I do not want to say anything unkind of my profession, but I cannot help but think of the famous statement of Brander Matthews, a distinguished professor of a great university. When he was asked why it was that so few college men ever became successes in business, he said, "I do not know, unless it be because they are so ignorant." [Laughter.] A hard statement to make; yet it is true that, while one can be absolutely certain in a theoretical way, his theory may never come within sight of the results attained in actual practice. And here we are launching upon a field of undetermined credit expansion which, if it is to reach the point which Mr. Young says it is likely to reach, then high prices instead of low prices will be the thing everybody will be complaining of.

There is another thing that is of very serious concern. The very breath of the Federal Reserve System is the authority for issuance of notes. To make those notes of current debt-paying legal-tender service there must be 40 percent of gold as a reserve upon which the value is based. If the remaining 60 percent can be maintained in gilt-edge securities, 40 percent will be all that is necessary in gold; but if, for any reason, it is impossible to have the 60 percent in acceptable securities, industrials and others, then the gold backing has to be increased in that degree. Naturally, when business is prosperous the gold reserve will be at the minimum of 40 percent, but when business gets to the low stage which it reached in 1931 after the breakdown in central Europe, the gold reserve must be increased because the value of industrials decreases. We reached a point, as the distinguished Senator occupying the chair will recall, where instead of having 40-percent gold reserve we had 80. That was not because the gold was necessary except to satisfy the law when such securities were not available.

Then it was that we enacted an emergency measure and permitted the deposit of Government bonds instead of gold, and in that way released nearly a billion dollars of gold. But, Mr. President, a Federal Reserve note is worth a hundred cents, no matter where it is used in this or any other country, because it says on its face that it is redeemable in gold or lawful money. The only thing that makes it current is the redemption clause.

During the Civil War when we were in dire need of currency we issued greenbacks to the amount of $60,000,000, but we did not call them greenbacks, because we made them redeemable in gold on demand. That issue of $60,000,000 never declined cne cent, because at any moment it could be redeemed in gold.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BAILEY in the chair). Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS. I should like the able Senator to give me his definition of lawful money. The Reserve note is payable in gold or lawful money. What does my able friend say is the meaning of "lawful money" when it is not gold?

Mr. FESS. Any money that is redeemable in gold under the act of 1900.

Mr. LEWIS. Does the able Senator feel, when the law says "gold or lawful money", that the words "lawful money" are not intended to mean money other than gold?

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, we have gold coins, silver coins, subsidiary coins in metals; we also have gold certificates, silver certificates—neither one of which is gold; and, in addition, we have national-bank notes, Federal Reserve notes, Sherman notes of 1890—a few of them—and Federal Reserve bank notes, which are not gold, but every dollar of which, under the act of March 14, 1900, is redeemable in gold. That makes them lawful money, and when it is said that they are redeemable in gold or lawful money, it means gold or money in existence which is redeemable in gold, and the Senator knows that to be so.

Mr. LEWIS. No; I cannot permit the Senator's expression to go unchallenged that I knew a thing and indicated something else.

Mr. FESS. Well, I will take it back.

Mr. LEWIS. The Senator ought to withdraw much of his speech, upon the same theory of the error he has fallen into.

Mr. FESS. No; I shall not withdraw anything at the suggestion of my friend except when I may refer to something he may have said.

Mr. LEWIS. I confess there is a great deal in what the Senator says as to the construction of the act of 1890.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield further to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. FESS. I will if the Senator has a question to ask but not for a lecture.

Mr. President, what does the bill which I am now discussing propose to do as it affects the issuance of Federal Reserve notes? Are they going to be issued on a gold base, as is now required under the law? No. Gold ceases to be a commodity; gold ceases to be monetary gold; gold might as well be thrown to the bottom of the sea; it is to have no use; it is to be taken out of the currents of trade and impounded. One cannot demand it, and, therefore, Federal Reserve notes have no redemption feature, and it is just the same as if gold were placed where it cannot be obtained.

What is the Government proposing as to the Federal Reserve notes heretofore issued, redeemable in gold and supported 40 percent by gold, and to the extent of the remaining 60 percent by securities? It is to take the gold coin and convert it into bullion, which is all right; to impound it in the Treasury, and then, for the profits which the Government has made out of seized gold, gold certificates, irredeemable, are to be issued in payment thereof, and upon this irredeemable certificate Federal Reserve notes are to be based and issued.

The scrip called a certificate is not money, because it cannot be redeemed except upon the option of the Secretary of the Treasury. A redemption based on the option of the Secretary of the Treasury, and not on the option of the one holding the scrip, is no redemption at all, as everybody knows. If for any reason the holder of that scrip could induce the Secretary of the Treasury to redeem it in gold, it would have to be in bullion and at a rate that nobody knows except the Secretary of the Treasury, because he is given the power to fix the amount that will be paid for the scrip.

Mr. President, I challenge anybody to say that that is not the very foundation stone of the Federal Reserve Act; and yet it is to be uprooted, root and branch. What is to become of the Federal Reserve notes? Are they anything but a promise? That is all. If a promise is the only thing to be considered of value, then let us start to issue greenbacks and do it to the extent that we can pay the running expenses of the Government and stop the burden of taxation. If we can create value to pay debts by issuing scrip irredeemable, then let the Government go to the limit.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. HASTINGS. I should like to inquire whether the Senator's conclusion is that the new currency is the kind of currency that has nothing back of it except the credit of the Government?

Mr. FESS. That is correct. That is all. The scrip upon which the Federal Reserve note is hereafter to be issued is a certificate which has back of it so much bullion, but the holder of it cannot demand bullion, let alone coin. He may ask for it and if the Secretary of the Treasury wants to give it to him he can do so. If he does not want to do so he will not do it and cannot be compelled to do it. If he does give it he will fix the amount he will pay.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. KING. I was interested in the statement of the Senator that bonds issued by the Government are a promise to pay, redeemable in whatever is the basic or primary money. Is there anything per se or fundamental back of the bonds of the Government, which aggregate today $25,000,000,000 or more, other than the credit of the country?

Mr. FESS. No. If the Senator wants to put United States bonds in the same category as legal tender, then his question is pertinent; but when he assumes that because a bond has nothing back of it except the credit of the Government and that therefore it should be treated as the currency of the country, I say that the two things are so widely different that I cannot see the analogy at all.

Mr. KING. Perhaps the observation just made by the Senator is entirely accurate. Nevertheless, if the Government of the United States has sufficient integrity and unimpaired financial strength and power as that its bonds, totaling billions of dollars, are current and purchased by the people, that people are willing to surrender their money for the purpose of purchasing the bonds, may we not assume that the Government, acting certainly with a modicum of wisdom anyway—even though the Democrats are in power—will be interested in preserving the credit of the country, so that nothing will be issued, whether we call it irredeemable or not, that does not have back of it the honor, the integrity, and the unimpaired credit of this great Republic?

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I am perfectly willing to concede all the Senator said as to the purposes of the Government. I am perfectly willing to concede that the Government will not of its own volition wish to repudiate its obligations. I have stated, and I state now, that I have never seen any utterance from the President that would indicate that he is for inflation, in the general sense of the term, of printing greenbacks or printing irredeemable money. But I stated previously, and I repeat that now, it is not a question of what the President's views toward inflation may be or are. The question is, What will be the eventuation of the policy of the President now as to gold? It is not what he wants to do. It is what he will feel compelled to do when the crisis is reached.

I did not want to enter this field of discussion, but I cannot feel at ease over the wild expenditures—wild in the sense of amount, because I do not mean in the form of expenditure. I cannot feel at ease when wondering how we are going to meet an obligation that is $3,000,000 an hour, $30,000,000 a day, counting 10 hours a day, 6 days a week, in violation of the N.R.A., every working day in the year, at the rate of $3,000,000 an hour. How are we going to meet it if it continues? That is what is already demanded of us, to say nothing about the rate of expenditure that is now going on. If the rate now in vogue keeps up it will be $15,000,000,000 a year instead of $10,000,000,000. I am assuming that rate will not keep up, but that we will require $10,000,000,000 stated in the President's Budget message.

I fear this is only a matter of relief at the expense of recovery, and, if my fears shall be realized, then next year we will have the same thing on our hands. Then what about the credit of the Government? I say to my friend from Utah that I do not charge him or his administration or anyone in authority—except now and then we will see a fugitive college professor probably who is favoring it—with wanting to repudiate. I do not charge that. I think they do not want to do that. My concern is, What will the policy compel them to do, and is there anyone here who can be entirely enthusiastic that the credit of the Nation is to be 100 percent all the time under these circumstances? What will be the effect on the credit of the Government when we want to sell our bonds?

I do not want to say anything that would in any way complicate the problem of the administration in its need for $10,000,000,000 that must be raised very soon. I am not so much concerned about the bond market, but I am concerned about the circulating media with gold ceasing to be both the media and the measure of value and the substitution of a variable quantity that ranges 20 percent and perhaps more. If anyone can get any encouragement out of such promises as that, they possess more credulity than I possess.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an inquiry?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. KING. I hope I do not misunderstand the implications of the Senator. I do not quite follow him, if he means that the policy of the valuation of gold per se increases the expenses of the Government that will be an inducement to the party in power or to my friends upon the other side of the Chamber to be more extravagant or inordinate in supporting appropriations than if we adhered to the gold standard. Yet, if I have followed the Senator, his position is that, if we devalue the dollar, we are bound to spend more money next year, perhaps $15,000,000,000 instead of $10,000,000,000. I did not quite follow the Senator.

Mr. FESS. No, Mr. President; I did not mean to state what the Senator is stating. If I made any statement from which it could be inferred that the devaluation of the dollar is going to require us to be more extravagant, I did not mean that. I do mean, however, though I have not said it, that the devaluation of the dollar is a first step toward the payment of obligations with money that is not of the standard. That I mean, although I have not said it, and that may open the door for further issues of that sort, though not because anybody wants to do it; but what I meant was this:

I think the Senator agrees with me that the program of expenditure that he and I are supporting, because it is a matter of humanity to do it, involves a lot of waste and extravagance that ought to be corrected; but that, of course, always happens in cases like this and in cases of war. I do not see the end of that program unless we stop it, and just how to stop it when once started is a very difficult problem for us all.

Mr. President, there is another phase of devaluation that is less important economically or governmentally, and more important socially and politically than anything that has been said; and that is that if the theory of the devaluators is carried out it will increase the prices of commodities. That point is in dispute. My good friend the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER], who is urging that we give recognition to silver at a fixed ratio, thinks devaluation of the dollar will not increase the price level. Nobody can be certain about it. Theoretically, it will. Practically, it remains to be seen. I should think anybody would concede that if we make 50 cents a dollar, when we go out to purchase goods with that dollar which is worth only 50 cents, we will have to pay a higher price for the things that are purchased. It is the old problem in arithmetic. If the divisor is decreased and the dividend left as it is, the quotient increases, or vice versa.

I think it is logical to believe that with the devaluation of the dollar there will be an increase in the price level. If there is not, then the whole theory upon which the proposal is based falls; for that is the one ostentatious and logical representation of those who are demanding it.

I think that is expressed in Professor Rogers' statement that devaluation will be beneficial to the farmer, and it will be beneficial to the debt payer. The farmer sells commodities. The price of his commodities will be increased. I think that is probably true. The debtor pays his debt in a dollar worth 50 cents. It is assumed that the commodity for which he had heretofore received a dollar he will now receive $2 for, and therefore, instead of his having $1 to pay on the debt he will have $2 to pay on the debt, which will make his debt paying easier. Of course, theoretically that may be true but, practically, the man who is in debt can pay only in the money that he has, and if he has not a commodity to sell for the money with which to pay his debt he will not in the long run benefit as a debt payer.

The dangerous thing here is that if this theory is correct, the man who now has a dollar worth 50 cents will find his purchasing power halved when he goes into the market. This procedure of decreasing the value of the dollar in order to pay debts and enchance the price of commodities may benefit some classes, but it is going to be a terrific injury to the vast majority of our people, because the great majority of Americans are rendering service in gainful occupations. They do not sell commodities; they sell services. Every man who works for wages will have a reflection of devaluation in the reduced purchasing power of his wages to the extent of the devaluation. Every man who works for a salary will have the same experience.

Go down to one of the department stores in this city. It is owned, we may say, by 15 men. They get a devaluation of the dollar in order to increase the price of their commodities. They employ 200 people. They increase the price of their commodities, and therefore 15 men benefit; but they increase it at the cost of the 200 people who do not sell commodities, but who sell services for wages and salaries. That represents vastly more than 50 percent of Americans, something like 78 percent; and it is proposed by this means, in the interest of increasing prices of commodities, to injure the 78 percent of people who do not sell commodities, but who sell services—something like 49,000,000 of our people.

Mr. President, that is the serious thing here. Not only that, there are over $17,000,000,000 of savings in the savings banks of America. That money has been deposited by the finest type of American citizenship—the person who is frugal, who is industrious, who at the end of a week has budgeted his expenses and put by a little for a rainy day. That amounts to nearly $20,000,000,000 today. What is to be done with that vast amount of savings? If the theory of the devaluation of the dollar to 50 cents is carried out, the savings of those people will be cut to that degree.

What else? There are 60,000,000 of our citizens who have taken out life insurance. There is scarcely a family in America that does not have some form or other of life insurance. The total of those life-insurance policies is over $100,000,000,000. Those are the people who look forward to old age, to a rainy day. What is it proposed to do with the $100,000,000,000? How will the 60,000,000 people be affected? The value of their policies will be cut in direct proportion to the increase of the price of goods or the devaluation of the dollar. The holders of those insurance policies outnumber 4 to 1 the debtors of America; and yet, on behalf of the person who is unfortunate in his inability to meet his obligations, we are proposing to reduce the savings of this group of American citizens!

Mr. President, I think the social element of this proposal is most serious. I do not know what is to be the outcome of a policy that is to say to the American citizen, "Do not save. You are foolish. There is no rainy day. Uncle Sam will take care of you when you get old. The Government will support you when you are out of work. You are foolish to save. Why do you not spend?"

There is not a virtue in the world so unpopular as national frugality. There is not a vice so popular as the spending of money. Nobody likes the tight-fisted. Everybody admires the open-handed. The popular fellow is he who showers his path with money; but what is to be the end in its effects upon our civilization?

Mr. President, when we forget this frugal, industrious class that is the very backbone of America, I think it is a serious thing. I will go as far as anybody to relieve the debtor through scaling down the obligation, reducing the interest, and giving him more time, if it is done in the interest of the public.

I am against foreclosures, and the needless taking over of property for debts. I will join anyone in attempting to relieve that situation. But I can never be led to do any injury irreparable to the best class of American citizens, people who are the very backbone of the United States, in order to do a thing that is of doubtful wisdom. That is the feature of this matter which disturbs me.

I asked a friend of mine in New York to give me a statement of his expense account. I knew the salary he was getting; he is one of the low paid men in one of the big corporations in New York. He replied:

> My rent is $50 a month. I could get it cheaper in the suburbs, but it would cost me $10 in the way of commutation to get there. I am paying $15 a month on furniture purchased when I first married, $37 for food, $8 for insurance, $7 for light and gas, $6 for laundry, $4 for clothes, $2 toward unemployment relief, and I aim always to lay aside about $4 a month in savings. It sums up $133. My salary is $140 a month. That gives me $7 for incidentals, such as illness, pressing clothes, hair-cuts, and so forth.

Suppose we increase the cost of living by cutting the dollar in two; how much will that young man have left to pay on his debts? That case can be duplicated by a million cases of people paying small sums periodically in order that they may have a home sometime. Now, the proposal is to increase prices, by manipulation of the money, to such a point that a person like that either could not pay anything, or would have to reduce his standard of living below the American standard. That is not wise, it is indefensible upon any basis whatever.

Mr. President, these are the reasons I give to my constituents in Ohio as to why I cannot support such an indefensible program as is undertaken to be written here on the monetary question. I repeat, if devaluation must come, the profit, of course, should go to the Government, if that can be accomplished legally and honestly.

I also repeat, nothing is so important as to stabilize; but stabilization should be accomplished by an undoing of what has already been done, and we should not now claim that because we have destroyed the elements of stabilization by going off the gold standard we cannot do anything more than what is proposed here. That is a poor excuse. Stabilization is the most important thing to be accomplished, but this proposal will not bring it about.

Mr. President, I have a very warm friend in Toledo who has written me upon this subject, not knowing just what was the proper position to take, and he asked me to give him my reaction. My address today is not an answer to him, but I have an answer, which I desire to have incorporated in the RECORD for his benefit.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JANUARY 19, 1934.

MY DEAR MR. CRANDELL: I have your letter inquiring as to my reaction on the proposed devaluation of the dollar. I can give it succinctly.

The abandonment of the gold standard and a substitution of the rubber dollar was the most severe stroke against the revival of industry that could have been taken. It created an uncertainty that prevented any business or industry from entering into a contract that would be executed 6 months hence or at any time in the future for the reason that one could not tell what the value of the dollar would be at that time. It would necessitate writing into the contract the terms upon which it was to be executed—that is, on the basis of the value of the dollar at the time the contract was made—which, of course would be regarded illegal by the group now in control. Hence the refusal of any industry to take any risk, either in enlargement or continuing production to fill a future contract. That difficulty accounts for the refusal of business to revive under the uncertainty of the value of the dollar.

While the Government made the gravest blunder in abandoning the gold standard, and thus creating this uncertainty, any movement to stabilize the dollar will be an improvement, as it is the sine qua non of recovery.

The proper course would have been to have avoided entering into such a maze of uncertainty by abandoning the gold standard; but, since that has been done, the proper course would be to resume the gold standard; but there has been a creation of such prejudice, much of which is due to a lack of understanding, against that movement that the next best step, if it could be taken, would be to resume payments on a gold basis at some fixed value.

Stabilization being essential to revive industry, it is argued, the only thing that is left that may be done under the present state of the public mind—that state being purely political—would be to devalue the gold dollar. I am opposed to it, first, because it is confiscation, on the one hand, and repudiation, on the other.

It is confiscation in that it is taking from the owner without his permission an article at $20.67 an ounce, for which the Government is offering to pay for foreign gold $34.45. The Government proposes by its own dictum to declare this gold, for which it pays $20.67 an ounce, to be worth in debt paying almost double that value, thereby creating by its fiat a profit of that amount with which it proposes to pay its own obligations as well as authorize all debts, public and private, to be defrayed by the devalued dollar.

In other words, the Government proposes the payment of debt by fiat paper in the form of bullion certificates, irredeemable, thus creating that much debt paying without increasing the wealth of the country by a single dollar. The proposal results in a confiscation by taking values without due process of law, and repudiation by debt paying through fiat certificates.

I am also opposed to it on the ground that in accordance with the theory of the program, the price of commodities is to be increased, which, in the final analysis will reduce in that degree the purchasing power of the dollar, which must fall most heavily on the vast majority of our people who are selling services instead of commodities. This is because salaries and wages do not go up with the cost of commodities, the result of the inflation of the dollar.

If we devalue the dollar, say, 50 percent, it means a 50-percent loss to labor, not because the nominal wage is reduced in dollars, but because the purchasing power of the dollar, which must be measured in the cost of living, will be reduced to the degree that the dollar is devalued.

Its chief hurtful effects will be reflected upon the break-down of the real wages of labor and what is known as the white-collared workers, and can be of nominal value only to the owner of commodities for sale and to the debtor, but in the last analysis, it will not be of real value to them. Its hurtful effects will extend to substantially all the people who are engaged in gainful occupations.

If a clerk in a store or a wage earner on the street is able to live on what he receives, and have a little left beyond the cost of living with which to pay on a home, he will under this scheme be compelled to extend all his wages for living expenses with nothing to be paid on a debt, or else reduce his standard of living to such a point that it will be in direct opposition to the standard which has become the envy of all of the people of other nations.

Then again, in all this there is a direct assault upon the foundation principle of the Federal Reserve System, which is permitted upon a gold basis with a 40-percent reserve to issue Federal Reserve notes to meet the trade demands. In this proposal we are eliminating the only feature, the redemption clause, that holds these Federal Reserve notes at par by substituting for the gold reserve written in the law bullion certificates. These certificates of themselves are worth nothing except the confidence that the holder might have in the Government's credit, which is a mere promise of the Government on identically the same basis as the greenbacks, since these certificates are irredeemable either on demand or in gold, the two necessary items to maintain the par value of currency.

Another most serious fact is that it is confiscation to the degree of the devaluation on all holders of insurance policies and owners of savings-bank accounts, which run beyond hundreds of billions of dollars and operate on more than 50,000,000 people, probably four times the debt represented by the mortgages that this proposal looks to scaling down. It will have a blighting effect upon all that large proportion of our population which, through industry and frugal habits, have laid aside something for the rainy day, which is represented not only by these insurance policies but by the nearly $20,000,000,000 in the various savings banks. To the degree that the price level is thus increased by the break-down of purchasing power through the devaluation of gold will be reduced these sums laid aside by this industrious class of our population, and in the final analysis it will operate upon the debtor as it does upon the creditor.

The Federal Reserve System loses its gold, for which is substituted the bullion certificate, irredeemable. This bullion certificate instead of gold becomes the basis of the issuance of Federal Reserve notes. This item destroys the very foundation on which the Federal Reserve System is built, and instead of basing the issuance of its notes to be used as currency upon a gold reserve required to be deposited in the Treasury, they will be issued on a basis of a certificate representing so much bullion deposited in the Treasury, which under the law ceases to have any value, because it is no longer a commodity for which there is an exchange price.

It is true that there is an effort to meet this irredeemable feature by writing into the proposal that within certain limits gold may be bought and sold, but that feature does not give value to the bullion upon which circulation can be safely based.

A gold certificate today is worth the $20 written on its face, because there is $20 worth of gold in the Treasury that up to the abandonment of the gold standard could at any time be demanded in payment of the certificate. That redemption feature, on demand, kept that certificate at 100 cents on the dollar. The same thing is true in the silver certificate, which by the act of 1900 was based on the gold standard, and the same thing is true of all the types of money we have had in use, except subsidiary coin—whether it be Federal Reserve note, Federal Reserve bank note, national bank note, Sherman note, silver or gold certificate. They were all redeemable in gold, which was the factor that made them pass throughout the world for 100 cents on every business counter in any corner of the globe.

I will, therefore, have to oppose such a procedure on the basis of common ordinary honesty in my desire to maintain the integrity of the Nation, and especially on behalf of the millions of wage earners and white-collared workers, including the debt payer, who is going to be reduced in his purchasing power to the extent of any increase in the cost of living due to this devaluation.

It is an amazing proposal wholly on the basis of the redistribution of wealth by the use of such a method of carrying on this enormous Government-spending program, which, if continued throughout the year, will reach $15,000,000,000, which, if unmodified, must lead to printing-press currency. When that step is taken we will be on the path that Germany took after the World War to the inestimable cost of all our citizens, with especially hurtful consequences to that class who had planned ahead of them for the future.

I am simply amazed over the lack of appreciation on the part of the average citizen to estimate these consequences. Mr. Bryan in his wildest dreams never approached anything equal to what is proposed here to be done.

Yours very truly,

——— ———.

Mr. FLOYD CRANDELL,
Toledo, Ohio.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, one word in conclusion. Nearly all of the letters to which I have referred evidently have come in response to a request made that Representatives and Senators be written to and asked to support the President in his policy. Let me say once for all, I will support President Roosevelt devotedly in everything in which I think he is right. I supported him on 6 of his 10 major recommendations in the special session, in some cases with a good deal of doubt as to the result.

I could not support turning over the agricultural industry to a Cabinet officer, and I would not do so now. I could not support a suspension of the antitrust laws and a substitution of a gentlemen's agreement for them, and attempt to regiment all industry and place the direction of it in Washington, D.C.

I could not support what I should regard as the most indefensible of proposals, the changing of the terms of a contract with the people of the United States by taking out a clause of the contract without the permission of the holder of the contract.

It does not suffice to say, "There are bloody bonds", as many of these letters say. Bloody bonds. Never was there such a campaign of bond selling since the morning stars sang together as that inaugurated by an able Secretary of the Treasury, now a distinguished Senator in this body. I responded to that campaign and did as other Representatives did, for I was then a Member of the House. I went to my home from Washington, at my own expense, which was the least a man could do, in order to help sell those bonds. We asked people to buy until it hurt, and I know that people bought when they had to sacrifice the absolute necessaries of life in order to do so.

It does not do to say these are bloody bonds. That is only thoughtless passion, without the exercise of any judgment whatever. There can be no excuse for changing a contract which had been entered into 30 days before. I could not stand for that.

I cannot stand for anything I regard as unfair or dishonest, even though it is done by the United States. A code of ethics denounced in the transactions of men is not holy when exercised by the Government simply because the Government is doing it.

I supported the President with considerable intensity on the floor in the consideration of the Economy Act, a measure most unpopular in Ohio but one which was necessary as I saw it. Some wrongs were worked into that measure which ought to be corrected, and I shall use my influence to have them corrected, but I should vote against a repeal of the act itself.

In the future, as in the past, I will chart my course to support the President in everything in which I think he is right. When the President chose to take men off the dole and put them on a pay roll, I thought that was a wise course, and I so stated. The only difficulty about it is that we do not know where it will ultimately lead, and we must all realize the danger. I say here and now that in things in which I regard the President as correct, he will have no more loyal supporter than I am; but in matters in which I think he is wrong, I will not hesitate to say so here or anywhere else.

The very fact that men are asking us to give the President support without thinking or without study makes it necessary to analyze and criticize everything that is proposed, and I propose to follow that course.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE—ENROLLED BILL SIGNED

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the enrolled bill (S. 2284) relating to contracts and agreements under the Agricultural Adjustment Act, and it was subsequently signed by the Vice President.

THE TARIFF

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I rise to make only a brief address and, finally, to ask that certain documents which I will present be incorporated as a part of my remarks.

The transformation from America's former method of progress, which has been the pride of her public men of the past during 150 years of development, surpassing other nations in economic and social progress, is to continue under the new monetary program as projected by the administration; it is typical of all its present policies.

The changes wrought by the "new deal" as it applies to the farmer and to big business, resulting in the elimination of the individual man and the small industrial group, underwriting and tolerating a monopoly at the expense of the consumer, are in keeping with the observations heretofore made by me. We have now new and strange transformations conceived by the "brain trust" and sent to the Congress as a part of the unfinished program to be finally made an integral part of the new deal. I have been wondering

Mr. President, what surprise is yet in store before this transformation is completed to the satisfaction of those responsible for the new deal. Are we now to have an enabling act conceived by these economic visionaries to authorize the Chief Executive of this Nation to undertake that Herculean task of lifting the face of nature?

If I understand the President's program aright, he contemplates making over the industrial structure of our Nation. The old America is in financial ruins we hear, and a new one is now being erected in modern Nehemiah fashion. Industrial recovery, handicapped by the uncertainties of business and finance, made so by regulation in the way of Government interference, now faces renewed perils in the proposal to classify all industry, agriculture included, in six groups, in accordance with the presumed economic importance of each branch of industry in the United States. Agriculture and mining, which some Members of this body may consider safe under the recovery program, face the possibility of tariff reductions under this plan if the formula now set forth by the administration is to be followed.

The details of this new tariff program, I find, have been set forth in considerable detail in articles which I have clipped from the New York Journal of Commerce. I do not know the writer of these articles, but I presume from a reading of them that he has but little interest in the subject of tariff other than from a news point of view. The stories merely set forth the facts, which are illuminating, and the articles are so informative that I shall later ask that they be made a part of my remarks and incorporated in the RECORD.

Mr. President, abandonment or sharp reduction of tariff protection for industries which have not shown themselves as well suited in American environment is contemplated as part of the program for the supposed rebuilding of a foreign trade, which foreign trade, according to the findings of the United States Tariff Commission, at its peak provided employment for less than 600,000 workers, this at a time when from ten to twelve millions of our people, formerly employed in domestic trade, are dependent upon either private or public aid. This reminds me of the old adage, "Penny-wise and pound-foolish."

The abandonment of certain industries now may prove as disastrous in the future as did the lack of encouragement and protection given to other industries, notably the chemical industry, in this country before the World War, which conflict demonstrated their vital necessity both in time of peace and war.

A complex plan for the classification of all domestic industries to determine the economic importance of each to the United States on which to base a long-range commission policy has been worked out, it is claimed, by those directly in charge of governmental affairs.

From the best information I can gather, no industrial leaders, representing either the employers or the employees, have been consulted regarding this plan by the wise men of this period, who, in most instances, have little if any practical knowledge of the subjects upon which they are passing judgment. Nor do they seem to be concerned if certain industries face a complete loss of their invested capital.

George N. Peek, former Agricultural Adjustment Administrator, recently ousted from the Department of Agriculture because of his inability to subscribe to the theories of the theorists in control, has been selected by the President to draw plans and specifications for the creation of a new foreign-trade administration to create markets in foreign countries for our agricultural products. Every avenue of trade abroad is to be explored in this campaign and in this country, and every individual industry is to be fingerprinted and dealt with under charts developed by the theorists in control.

The practical experience, however, will be, Mr. President, if we are to judge the future by the past, that the home trade is the only trade upon which the farmer can depend for a market for his products.

President Roosevelt, it is understood, plans to ask the Congress to enact legislation giving to him alone the power to set rates which may mean life or death for American industry—to manipulate tariff rates just as now he proposes to manage the currency of our country.

The president of the Pottery Workers Union of America informed me today that the pottery workers of this country are producing less than 50 percent of the pottery and china consumed by the American people yearly, due to cheap foreign competition which should be eliminated by an adequate tariff so that these workers would have at least 93 percent of the home market.

Our Nation has been sorely distressed, industrially and economically. If history correctly records the periodical depressions of the past some were as great or even greater in a distressful way to the generation of people who lived in those days. However, they did not theorize or carry on experimentations; they progressed out of such depressed periods through and by their own resourcefulness without interfering with any basic laws or by experimenting such as is the practice at the present time. This is sufficient to convince many of us that too much paternalism is a hindrance at this hour instead of an assistance. I do not feel, however, that the experiments now being made and those in contemplation will result in a greater degree of business improvement after they have been applied. The administration admits that the plans are nothing more nor less than continued experimentation. But when will this experimentation end?

I understand that the recently appointed Secretary of the Treasury has stated that the new program will give the administration a breathing spell—will lessen the tension until other steps are taken. I am wondering if the next step would be the early issue of non-interest-bearing bonds with which to redeem the outstanding obligations of the Government. I shall not be surprised if our financial experts tell us that we cannot raise sufficient revenue by taxation to meet the fiscal requirements of the Government.

The administration can hardly expect to increase returns from individual and corporate taxation if they continue to drive out of business such industries as do not qualify for continued existence under the plans of the theorists now in charge of the administration's mechanics.

Many of these industries are compelled to compete with the Government, financed with their own money, and in some instances it precludes them from doing business

Naturally those who believe in the theory of international free trade and have had no practical experience in the management or operation of industries cannot be expected to advocate or recommend tariff rates which will make it possible for American industry to furnish employment to American labor at wages which will permit American workers to retain the standards of living which are higher than those in operation in other parts of the world.

It is possible that some Members of the Senate may be interested in preserving or in maintaining the right of American industries to continue to operate in America; they may have overlooked the information contained in the articles to which I referred as printed in the New York Journal of Commerce during the past few weeks. For that reason, Mr. President, I ask that these articles be printed as a part of my remarks and inserted at this point in the RECORD. I also desire to have printed in the RECORD, as a part of my remarks, a copy of a radio address on this subject recently delivered by the Honorable Matthew Woll, vice president of the American Federation of Labor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from West Virginia?

There being no objection, the matters referred to were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ROOSEVELT TO SEEK WIDE TREATY POWERS ON RECIPROCAL TRADE—IS SAID TO WANT CONGRESS TO FOREGO RATIFICATION OF PACTS, TARIFF CHANGES—TARIFF LAW MACHINERY IS HELD CUMBERSOME—PROPOSAL BELIEVED TO CONTEMPLATE PLAN TO RAISE AND CUT RATES TO FORCE NATIONS INTO LINE

By Clarence L. Linz

WASHINGTON, December 10.—Congress will be asked to provide legislation granting authority to the President to make such changes in existing tariff rates as he may deem necessary as an inducement to foreign governments to enter into reciprocal trade agreements with the United States, it was learned here tonight.

Consideration will be given to this proposal as an incident to the liquor tax and tariff legislation that will be given a public hearing jointly by the House Ways and Means and Senate Finance Committees tomorrow.

It is understood that draft legislation already has been prepared by the administration. If this is adopted, the President would be permitted to make rate changes without resort to the present rather cumbersome machinery of the flexible provision of the Hawley-Smoot tariff law which has as its yardstick differences in costs of production at home and abroad. At the same time, under present plans, the approval of Congress to the rate adjustments and even the proposed reciprocal trade pacts themselves would not be required.

LONG STUDY IS MADE

For more than a year, the activity dating back to before President Roosevelt entered the White House, Democratic leaders have been studying the matter. It is asserted that now, when it has been found that the offer of an exchange with foreign governments for entry into our newly created liquor market is not a sufficient inducement to obtain for us broadened markets for our products abroad, this legislation is needed more than ever.

Means whereby the legislation in question can be enacted into law with minimum of opposition have been engaging the attention of administration leaders, it is understood. Fear is expressed by some that it might be couched in language giving the impression that the authority to be conferred on the President would be limited to the liquor market when in fact it would permit rate manipulation generally.

It is realized by the administration that downward revision of the tariff law is virtually impossible and any move in that direction would lead to further inequities occasioned by logrolling within Congress. It also is realized that resort to the flexible tariff provision of the law would be difficult of speedy success.

RESISTANCE ABROAD DEVELOPS

While foreign governments have shown marked interest in securing larger liquor quotas, they are not inclined to sell out their markets to get them. It is pointed out, for instance, that whereas our annual imports of distilled spirits hardly exceeded 4,000,000 gallons in peak years, domestic production has been as high as 93,000,000 gallons (1917). In wines the maximum of importations was 10,500,000 gallons in 1910, which is about 33 percent greater than normal, whereas domestic production runs up to about 60,000,000 gallons. The picture in respect of beer imports is even a sorrier one.

What the administration advisers will ask Congress for, it is said, will be legislation patterned after the flexible-tariff provision freeing the President of the necessity of securing congressional approval of such tariff bargaining as he may undertake in the future.

It has been represented to the President by Members of Congress in the quite recent past that it perhaps would not be difficult to secure passage of legislation permitting negotiation of trade agreements if the administration will have incorporated in that legislation a proviso that bargaining pacts be subject to ratification by Congress.

ATTITUDE OF SENATORS

It is reported in informed circles that many Senators would approve reciprocal trade treaties giving the United States concessions abroad on agricultural products in return for tariff reductions in the chemical and metal schedules of our law in particular. However, it may be that rate reductions in the agricultural schedule may come also, it is rumored.

Administration leaders, admitting the futility of seeking a general revision of the tariff, have let it be known to representatives of foreign governments in Washington that in seeking reciprocal trade agreements, loopholes would have to be found whereby our tariff wall may be pierced or vaulted. Apparently the State Department has been successful in getting a foothold to negotiate trade agreements with Colombia and Brazil, although at a standstill with Argentina because of the complexities of the problems presented by the latter.

On the other side of the question there are some 60 or more industries that have made inquiries as to the possibilities of securing relief from import competition which they claim they cannot meet.

JOHNSON MAKES REPORT

About a dozen of these have been reported to the President by General Johnson. As a result, the President yesterday ordered the Tariff Commission to make an investigation with respect to imports of wood-cased lead pencils. This is the first action taken by the Chief Executive under section 3 (e) of the National Industrial Recovery Act, governing imports which become competitive to domestic products manufactured under codes or the terms of the President's reemployment agreement.

Before 1933 lead-pencil imports were chiefly from Germany, but this year there has been a large increase in shipments from Japan since, whereas less than 1,000 gross came from that country in 1929, the first 9 months this year the total reached 75,000 gross.

As a prelude to a definite move for this proposed legislation, Senator COSTIGAN, Democrat, of Colorado, former member of the Tariff Commission, induced the Senate to direct the latter to undertake the work of analyzing the composition of the import and export trade of the United States with each of the foreign countries with which we have important commercial relations.

NUMBER OF REPORTS MADE

The Commission has made a number of reports under the direction of the Senate, and these will be considered incident to the study that will be made of the testimony presented in the joint tax and tariff (liquor) hearings beginning tomorrow.

A list of tariff and other trade restrictions since January 1, 1922, by countries, a discussion of alternative sources of each, an analysis of the invisible items entering into the balance of trade with these countries, and other significant economic and competitive facts affecting our trade have been furnished.

The Commission also has furnished information under the following categories:

1. Tariff classifications, including grades and styles and articles in basket clauses of the law, with respect to which there were substantial imports from abroad in 1919 and/or 1929, but which have substantially lessened or ceased, and the cause thereof.

2. Articles of which imports in either 1927, 1929, or 1931 have represented less than 5 percent of the domestic production of similar articles.

FIFTY-PERCENT AD VALOREM RATES

3. Articles on which tariff rates exceed 50 percent ad valorem and the quantities and values imported, and the domestic production in the years named.

4. Dutiable articles, the imports of which have increased in quantity or value since 1929.

5. Statistics showing quantity and value decreases of United States exports.

6. Extent of the exportation of American capital to build factories abroad.

7. Value and quantity of imports which are more or less noncompetitive with domestic production and in which foreign countries possess advantages in production, including seasonal advantages, or as to which the foreign product has some unusual appeal to purchasers in the United States, particularly in the case of Canada, Spain, Belgium, Italy, Czechoslovakia, Mexico, Argentina, Russia, China, and Japan.

8. Ways and means for tariff bargaining as may appear relevant for most advantageously promoting expanded trade between the United States and foreign countries.

PEEK PLAN TO EXPORT SURPLUS FARM CROPS UP TO PRESIDENT—FAVORS SETTING UP FOREIGN TRADE ADMINISTRATION TO CARRY OUT PROGRAM—MAY FORM ANOTHER UNIT TO UNDERWRITE DEALS—EXECUTIVE COUNCIL ALSO CONSIDERS MOVE FOR ROOSEVELT TO ASK WIDE POWERS TO ACT ON TARIFF

WASHINGTON, December 26.—A broad outline of policy for the development of new agricultural export markets was today placed before President Roosevelt by George N. Peek, former Agricultural Adjustment Administrator.

The report carries the results of the studies made by Mr. Peek and his associates at the direction of the President and contemplates, it is said, the setting up of a foreign-trade administration, which Mr. Peek will head, and possibly a corporation which would underwrite, in whole or in part, the sale of American agricultural products abroad.

SUGGESTS TARIFF POWERS

Coincident with this activity the President's executive council is understood to be working on a plan whereby Congress would give broad tariff powers to the President to enable him to carry out features of the Peek program.

The new foreign trade consultant declined to go into details of his proposals, following his talk with the President today, explaining that he is to return later in the week to go over the matter more fully.

For some weeks now representatives of the State, Commerce, and Agriculture Departments and of the Tariff Commission have been discussing the character of proposed legislation making possible the negotiating of reciprocal trade agreements with foreign nations, based on tariff-rate reductions, without requiring ratification by Congress.

While not overenthusiastic about the proposal, it is understood that the President has told its sponsors to go ahead and work it out to see what it looks like after it is reduced to writing. It is said to be the President's political instinct that Congress should be asked for nothing in the way of tariff revision beyond some obviously necessary changes in rates on wines, beer, and liquors.

The President is declared to realize that, unless it develops he is in complete control of the Congress, it might be a fatal mistake to set it to the task of making material changes in the tariff law. The same matter was before him last spring and all was in readiness to spring the plan on the Senate and House when the President is said to have sensed the possibility of a defeat of the legislation.

URGED TO ASK AUTHORITY

But the tempting possibilities of reciprocal trade agreements, made particularly manifest in the parceling out of liquor quotas, are being so attractively laid before him that the so-called "liberals" among his advisers are pressing Mr. Roosevelt to resort to this proposed departure from present tariff policies and ask Congress to divest itself of tariff rate-making powers, within certain specified limits, surrendering them to the Chief Executive.

The argument is that if it is useful to the Government to use the trading possibilities offered by our newly created liquor markets it certainly would be beneficial to the country to make permanent a system for bargaining for tariff benefits. The quota system, although much used in Europe recently, and is now applied to our liquor imports, is new to American foreign trade.

The President, since his inauguration, has leaned to the bargaining tariff principle, but his political astuteness kept him from pressing the matter strongly at the special session last spring and so far has kept him from reaching a determination as to what powers and in what manner, he would ask Congress in the form of appropriate legislation.

In order to effectuate the necessary administrative control to facilitate the negotiation of trade agreements, it is revealed in informed quarters, the sponsors of the plan propose that the President be empowered to prescribe more detailed classifications within any present tariff classification and to lower the applicable rates of duty within certain specified limits, presumably 50 percent. There is talk also of providing for the licensing of all importations of any general or detailed classification and for the allocation of American markets therefor on an allotment system.

FINDINGS SUGGESTED

For legal reasons, it is explained, the exercise of these powers should be made conditional upon the President making certain findings of fact. The proponents of the plan suggest that these findings be—(A) that such action is necessary to bring about satisfactory trade agreements, and (B) that such agreements adequately compensate the United States for any concessions granted in the domestic market.

The plan goes further than has been indicated in the gossip here, it is averred. It is declared by the tariff planners that if American export trade is to be restored to anything like its former proportions, the United States must enlarge its import markets and to do so must lower existing tariff barriers.

This leads directly to the setting up of a Government authority, possibly even the new Peek organization, which would survey the whole field of foreign and domestic commerce and arrive at conclusions as to the economic value of various industries. Some, it is pointed out, inevitably would be found, operating now under the protective tariff, to be uneconomic and should be sacrificed in order that a foreign country, producing similar goods at a lower price, might find a market for them here in order that such a country might be able to buy more of standard American products.

It is learned that the Tariff Commission has placed in the hands of Mr. Peek and his associates information showing not only our trade with foreign countries but the trade of the latter with each other, indicating markets abroad that might be opened or expanded for our goods and means for assisting them in getting their merchandise into our markets. This confidential document is said to be "one of the finest pieces of work" ever done by the Commission.

CITES NATIONAL PLANNING

"Standard American products" are denominated as agricultural products. It is pointed out that in respect to the latter there already has been undertaken a system of national planning with the attempt at avoidance of overproduction by acreage controls. Under the codes formulated by industries and the National Recovery Administration, there is the framework for national planning for the products of factories and mills.

Here is the start of allocation of all production among the different units of industry and agriculture. Therefore, it is argued, that if there is in fact to be national planning on so broad a scale, it is but natural that authority over import duties should be vested in the Government.

Because they consider tariff-making an essential part of the general scheme of things as they have worked it out, these liberals among the President's advisers are pressing the latter to approach Congress on the question of granting him authority to manipulate tariff rates when, in his discretion, this appears desirable. They contend that this would be no greater menace to industry, if menace it could be called, than the authority vested in the President under the National Industrial Recovery Act to dominate all industry. They add that if the program is to be carried out according to the general plans for economic recovery this new power is necessary.

TARIFF POLICY HERE NOW FACES CHANGE TO AID UNITED STATES EXPORTS—MAY DROP OR SHARPLY CURTAIL PROTECTION IN LINE WITH NEW UNITED STATES ECONOMIC POLICY—TRADES BEING CLASSIFIED TO DECIDE NEED OF DUTY—PURPOSE IS TO DETERMINE INDUSTRIES UNSUITED TO AMERICAN PROGRAM UNDER THE "NEW DEAL"

By Clarence L. Linz

WASHINGTON, January 1.—Abandonment or sharp reduction of tariff protection for industries "which have not shown themselves as well suited to American economic environment" is contemplated as a part of a program for the rebuilding of our foreign trade now being considered by the Executive Commercial Policy Committee of the Roosevelt administration.

A complex plan for the classification of all domestic industries to determine the economic importance of each to the United States, on which to base a long-range commercial policy, has been worked out by Committee experts, it was revealed here today.

This plan is believed to be the groundwork for the contemplated proposals to Congress which President Roosevelt last week made known he would present. It is an elaboration of the program which was to have been urged upon the National Legislature last spring.

PURPOSE OF PROGRAM

The primary purpose of the program appears to be the selection of those industries that legitimately may be "sacrificed" in the best interests of all, the President being authorized by Congress to be the judge. Leaders in House and Senate, it is learned, are awaiting the decision of the administration as to a new tariff policy before proceeding with the formulation of contemplated reciprocal trade legislation.

The experts of the Executive Commercial Policy Committee, of which Acting Secretary of State Phillips is chairman, have, in their memorandum, attempted to sketch a new line of principle to serve as the basis of a long-term policy. They assume that a bill is to be introduced in Congress to give the Chief Executive the power to modify existing duties upward or downward within limits, and to otherwise regulate imports, and the report is further intended to suggest the policy basis on which Congress and the country may be approached for the grant of power. In other words, it is a rough plan for the beneficial exercise of Executive power.

If the long-term commercial policy is to be established, it is contended, it will be essential that the Executive be vested with some measure of authority, not only to modify rates but to employ such other measures as may be deemed suitable for regulating import movement of goods.

POSITION OF CONGRESS CITED

The Executive alone, it is asserted, could develop a plan which represents the national outlook and which continuously demands necessary technical information. Tariff-making by Congress, it is pointed out, inevitably results in conflict and bargaining between local interests with no clear conception of the situation created for export industries.

Congress must pass on both the plan and the general policy and upon its execution, but cannot be expected to legislate details of a long-range plan, it is explained.

Each branch of the primary industries of the country (including in the term all agricultural and extractive industries) would be graded as a means of defining their place in the commercial policy scheme. Each industry would, after the fullest possible study, be placed in one of perhaps six broad grades or classes. These grades would be based upon a "complex basis", indicating the utility of the industry to the country and its proper place in the scheme of commercial policy.

Among the features of the industry suggested to be considered in grading, the following, it is said, will have a natural place: (a) economic suitability to the United States as measured primarily by past efficiency; (b) possible contribution to national defense; (c) wage levels and other indications of general social utility; (d) the number of people employed and size of vested interest represented; (e) geographical distribution; (f) alternative sources of foreign supply; and (g) mutual dependence for proper operation of each industry on others.

SUGGESTS GRADE PLAN

The report tentatively suggests that grades be developed somewhat as follows: Grade A would increase the normal export industries requiring substantial foreign markets if the economic relationships within the United States are to be brought into easy balance without large interior movements of operation embracing such products as exportable agricultural supplies (cotton, wheat, hog products, and apples) and those mass-production manufactures which have set the pace in raising wages and increasing per capita production of the country (automobiles, agricultural machinery, electrical apparatus, etc.). Some of the commodities in this grade might continue to carry protection; for others it would be wholly unnecessary.

Grade B industries might be those slightly less marked than those in grade A for general effectiveness, taking in industries which, on the whole, have shown the power to sustain themselves against foreign competition without assistance, which employ large numbers of workers and which turn out satisfactory products at reasonable prices. In this category would be various lines in the chemical and metal industries, much of our iron and steel production, staple textile industries, shoe industries, etc., the report suggests. Industries in this category, however, would be protected at this time of emergency from any marked increase in foreign competition.

INDUSTRIES IN GRADE C

Grade C would include industries that do not qualify under the preceding classifications on the ground of general effectiveness, but which are deemed in part or in whole essential to national defense—chemical industries, shipbuilding and, perhaps, certain minerals. But in some instances in respect of these commodities and services instead of tariff protection it is suggested in the report some form of subsidy arrangement might prove preferable.

Towards commodities in this grade, decision would have to be reached as to the minimum protection necessary to sustain the minimum deemed necessary for national defense, it is suggested by the experts. It might be found in the case of certain of these commodities advisable to supersede ordinary tariff arrangements by market allocation arrangements under which minimum domestic production would be assured without closing the market to foreign production and thereby maintaining unnecessarily high prices, they explained.

In connection with the whole grading process, but more particularly with the industries in this grade, it is admitted, account would have to be taken of the most available geographical sources of supply.

TRADES CONSIDERED UNSUITED

Grade D would cover a large variety of industries which have not shown themselves well suited to American economic environment. They might be assured of a certain maximum measure of protection but, beyond that, would be required to sustain themselves against foreign competition. This grade might be divided in two subgrades according as to whether the particular branch of the industry was an important factor in maintaining other branches, whether suited, or according to the numbers employed, etc.

In this intermediate grade D would come a great number of minor industries, and, as an example, textile specialties requiring too much changing of pattern and design to be successful in the United States are named. It is suggested also that there are certain types of glove manufacture and certain branches of agriculture, such as hides, falling in this category.

Grade E would include, under the plan, industries that have some foothold in this country but which, on the whole, are a burden because they possess so weak an economic basis or because they have exhausted their basis. It is averred that these industries at the present time often have the highest rates of duty and "despite that fact are only struggling along."

ITEMS ARE LISTED

"Manganese, chromium, quicksilver, laces, and other typical hand-labor industries and certain agricultural products, such as pineapples", are listed by Committee experts as evidences of what they have in mind.

"If it were not for long tradition through which the sugar industry has established so strong a place for itself," they added, that industry would probably be put in this classification. In these grades would probably come minor or luxury branches of industry requiring large amounts of hand labor and employing only small numbers of workers; for example, certain types of the "higher class woolens and certain types of wine and spirits production."

Grade F would embrace the commodities for the production of which the country is wholly unsuited and which are primarily at present on the free list—coffee, tea, tin, rubber, and bananas.

"Care should be taken", the report concludes, "against the expectation that the plan could be fulfilled in detail. Likewise care would have to be taken to make it perfectly clear that no immediate tariff adjustment was in contemplation."

LEADERS WILL URGE PRESIDENT TO FOREGO ASKING TARIFF POWER—SENATORS FEAR CONSEQUENCES FOR HOME STATE PRODUCTS UNDER SUCH PROGRAM—LONG LIST OF ARTICLES WOULD BE HIT BY PLAN—REPUBLICANS SEE DEMOCRATS FACED WITH STRONG PROTESTS ESPECIALLY ON ALL FARM GOODS

WASHINGTON, January 14.—Fearful of the possible loss of the protection against foreign imports now accorded the commodities of their respective States, Members of the Senate were said tonight about to urge upon President Roosevelt that he refrain from asking Congress to grant him the broad tariff powers he favors.

This became known when it was indicated by the President that he awaited the return to Washington of Secretary of State Hull to go into the matter; that the report contemplating planned economy for the United States with the classification of all commodities into groups ostensibly for the survival of the fittest, and the Peek report proposing to create the foreign-trade administration, are already on the President's desk, and that the Senate Democratic policy and the Democratic steering committee recently held meetings at the Capitol at which these matters were discussed.

ARTICLES ARE LISTED

Long-staple cotton, olive oil, citrus fruits, winter vegetables, copper, asbestos, casein, cattle, and hides, among a multitude of things, were listed by the Senators as hardly entitled to the tariff protection made possible by the Hawley-Smoot tariff law, if the rules proposed by the commercial policy committee of the administration are to prevail.

The long-staple cotton duty of 7 cents per pound is a sort of fetish in Mississippi where, it is said, Senator PAT HARRISON, chairman of the Senate Finance Committee for perhaps the first time in 15 years, is experiencing political difficulties.

From the standpoint of California, tariff reduction on olive oil, oranges, lemons, citric acid, and even agar-agar is anathema to Senator MCADOO of that State, and he so indicated the fact, aided by the opposition also voiced by Senator HARRISON, in the meetings of the policy and steering committees.

Senator FLETCHER is jealous of the protection afforded the leading commodities (from a tariff, if not an economic standpoint) of Florida, including pineapples, citrus fruits, and winter vegetables.

ATTITUDE ON COPPER

The copper bloc in the Senate was elated when it secured tariff protection in the revenue bill for that commodity, having failed to get it in the tariff bill. They have felt that in its present position the copper duty would not be subject to reduction under the flexible-tariff clause, but under the administration's protective-tariff policy there is no such guaranty.

The home State interest of Senator ASHURST, of Arizona, in copper and asbestos, has heretofore been manifested. Senator WHEELER, of Montana, has a similar interest in the red metal, and he is joined by Senator KEY PITTMAN, of Nevada, President pro tempore of the Senate.

The 75-percent duty on hit-and-miss rag rugs is looked upon as an aid to Georgia, and Senator GEORGE, of that State, it is asserted, would not like to see it disturbed. This Senator also found it difficult not to accept the present high rates of duty on rayon.

Senator ASHURST does not like the idea of the possible invasion of winter vegetables from Mexico. The chance of a reciprocal trade agreement with that country that would open our doors to these has been under consideration by certain railroad officials who have in view increasing the refrigerator-car service of their roads in such event.

POSITION OF OTHER SENATORS

Senator TYDINGS, of Maryland, also is interested in the tomato tariff—and in rayon duties. Senators CONNALLY and SHEPPARD, of Texas, doubtless would receive the protest of their constituencies if cattle duties were to be disturbed.

The Senators named are members of the Democratic committee. The personnel of the all-powerful Democratic steering committee includes Senators JOSEPH T. ROBINSON, Arkansas; FLETCHER, Florida; ASHURST, Arizona; SHEPPARD, Texas; KING, Utah; MCKELLAR, Tennessee; GEORGE, Georgia; COPELAND, New York; WHEELER, Montana; TYDINGS, Maryland, with LEWIS, Illinois, and BLACK, Alabama, ex officio. Senator GEORGE alone of the group was absent from the meeting when about 45 minutes was devoted to the tariff matter.

The Democratic policy committee, which spent about the same amount of time on the same subject, it is said, consists of Senators ROBINSON, Arkansas; HARRISON, Mississippi; PITTMAN, Nevada; GLASS, Virginia; WALSH, Massachusetts; DILL, Washington; BARKLEY, Kentucky; WAGNER, New York; CONNALLY, Texas; BULKLEY, Ohio; BYRNES, South Carolina; GORE, Oklahoma; and MCADOO, California.

CONGRESS VIEWS OUTLINED

The feeling in Congress generally has been that agricultural rates under the new deal are sacrosanct and not to be disturbed. Now there is the feeling, for instance, that the influence held in some quarters responsible for saving the plate-glass duty from a reduction in the face of a Tariff Commission report said to justify a cut is capable of forcing a showdown on certain favored farmer rates.

It is only a step backward through automobiles, it is pointed out, through tires and brake linings, to textiles (tire fabrics) and long-staple cotton. Automobile manufacturers do not seek justification for tariff protection for their product. They are interested in finding markets abroad for automobiles and subscribe to the theory that one cannot sell in a country from which this Nation will not buy. On the other hand, in face of a 7-cent per pound duty, the Tariff Commission lists long-staple cotton in the group of "dutiable articles more or less noncompetitive and with respect to which foreign countries possess advantages."

Like the automobile manufacturers, President Roosevelt and his advisers are desirous of opening up foreign markets, but for agricultural products. Thus far a great deal of resistance has developed abroad to such program. Italy, it is asserted, is as much or more interested in increasing her United States markets for olive oil as in selling more women's wool felt hats and hat bodies here, now at the subject of tariff discussion.

REPUBLICANS LESS CONCERNED

Republican Senators, in lobby conferences that have been going following the airing of the administration's proposed new tariff program, declare that their Democrat colleagues have more to fear than they have. Republicans point out that in the drafting of the Hawley-Smoot law the Democrats in some instances were able to get tariff protection for their home State products without showing their own interest, and in other cases by joining in logrolling proceedings such as brought about the tariff on lumber and copper among other commodities.

Now they will have to do their own fighting because the onus is on their party.

The Peek report proposes the setting up of the foreign-trade administration, to which would be delegated some of the foreign-trade functions now possessed by the State and Commerce Departments in particular, and possibly also those of Agriculture. It could not be ascertained what part the Tariff Commission would play, but assuredly it will be prominently in the picture.

The Commission already has furnished very voluminous reports, on some of which, it is said, the planned-economy program was predicated. For instance, in this scheme the right of tariff protection would be questioned in the case of commodities not deemed particularly well suited to the economic environment of the United States.

REPORTS REFERRED TO

One of these reports tells also of dutiable articles of which imports have represented less than 5 percent of the domestic production; tariff classifications with respect to which imports have substantially lessened or have ceased; articles on which the tariff rates exceed 50 percent ad valorem; separate lists showing agricultural products carrying tariff rates in excess of 50 percent, the equivalent ad valorem of present rates based on average prices from 1920 to 1929 and, among other things, the extent of exports of capital from the United States employed in production abroad.

The discussions which prompted this story were not to be interpreted as exclusively defending the present existing and heretofore adopted tariff policies of the Government but rather to point out the obstacles to the inauguration of a new and revolutionary program.

In foreign circles in Washington it is asserted that even with the limitations that are placed upon the Roosevelt administration, the so-called "exhaustive explorations" of commercial advantages discussed in official quarters are more exhaustive of foreign than of domestic possibilities.

REACTION IN COLOMBIA

In Latin America, it is reported here, the reciprocal trade agreement that was signed on December 15 by Acting Secretary of State Phillips and Dr. Fabrio Lozano Torrjos, on behalf of Colombia, is being ridiculed. El Spectator, of Bogota, contained a cartoon by Arango of a man crucified attacked by buzzards, apparently intending to show American domination.

"In Colombia", a report to Washington asserted, "the treaty had the worst reception imaginable, judged by the statements made by the press of all parties.

"The big complaint is against the development of Colombian national industries having been promoted under shelter of high tariff on imports which now, to satisfy the United States, is to be lowered, much to the detriment of those claiming to have made strong investments to establish new industries."

The treaty has not yet been made public, but it is said that on our part the United States covenants not to impose tariff duties on coffee and platinum, it being expected, of course, that there are other concessions, although probably of like character.

WASHINGTON, January 21.—A picture of affairs in Latin America was presented to President Roosevelt late this afternoon by Secretary of State Cordell Hull, who returned to Washington today from his tour of South America and attendance at the Montevideo Economic Conference.

Invited to take tea with the President, the White House visitor is understood to have related in detail during a conference of about an hour and a half those things which are of particular interest to the United States developed by and revealed to the State Department head in his travels.

CUBAN SITUATION DISCUSSED

In this discussion, it is said, the Cuban situation loomed big. Mr. Hull returned to Washington about 5 days ahead of his schedule, it being presumed that this was occasioned by the Cuban situation and the desire of the President to initiate his proposed new tariff policies so as to be able to do something more or less spectacular evidencing our friendship for our neighbors on this hemisphere.

It was indicated late last week that the President was preparing to discuss with the Latin American Governments the matter of recognition for Cuba. It also was made manifest that we would take steps to give our approval to the new Government in Cuba within a week or 10 days. To accomplish both of these desires the President sought from the head of his Cabinet data concerning intimate viewpoints and political repercussions in the countries to the south of us.

It has been made known that just as soon as the Cubans set up a goverment strong enough to give evidences of some degree of permanency, the United States would want to take some forward steps toward aiding the island Republic with its economic problems. To that end renewed study has been given to the report of the Tariff Commission which, it is said, would justify a rate of reduction on Cuban raws of up to 55 cents per 100 pounds.

PROCESSING TAX SEEN

While it is probable that such reduction would be followed by the application of a processing tax of perhaps one half cent per pound upon all sugars, it is figured Cuban producers would benefit at least one fourth cent per pound on their exports to the United States based on a quota of 2,000,000 tons annually; this of itself would mean an added income to the Cubans of at least $10,000,000.

The main concern here at this particular moment is how to deal with South American countries. Brazil has been slow to accept proposals for a reciprocal trade agreement, perhaps deterred from speedy action by the sentiment in South America against such agreements, it having been said in the press of Colombia that the pact with that country threw open its markets to United States industrial products while offering little of real value in return.

It could not be learned whether the President discussed with Mr. Hull the matter of the enactment of the Johnson bill which would deny this market to new securities offered by defaulting nations. This was given consideration by the President last Wednesday and again on Thursday when Senate leaders visited the White House.

EFFECT ON SOUTH AMERICA

Such legislation would have a very definite effect upon South American countries.

The Peek plan, proposing coordination of all Government activities having to do with foreign trade and the creation of a foreign-trade administration, and the proposal of the Commercial Policy Committee for the classification of all industries of the United States into six major groups for tariff and reciprocal trade agreement purposes are on the President's desk awaiting to be taken up with Secretary Hull.

It was reported in Washington tonight that the State Department would oppose any elaborate plan for the coordination of activities such as was presented by George N. Peek, former Agricultural Adjustment Administrator, in a chart given the President.

For instance, if carried out literally, this program would bring into the proposed foreign trade administration the Tariff Commission, consular and commercial attaché activities of the Department of State, and foreign-trade functions of the Commerce and Agricultural Departments.

Such program would be far too ambitious to please other Government agencies. When whittled down to proper dimensions, it was asserted here tonight, the Peek organization would parallel the Agricultural Adjustment Administration or the National Recovery Administration.

PEEK STATUS STRESSED

That would leave intact the permanent agencies of the Government and leave the Peek organization an emergency agency.

Possibility is foreseen of setting up as a subsidiary of this a financing corporation which would receive monetary aid from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to assist in the promotion of Russian trade. Other governments, it is pointed out, have provided aid to exporters to the extent of from one third to two thirds of the amount of sales to the Soviet. The Roosevelt administration has been giving some consideration to such plan, although nothing definite has been arrived at.

In the event of providing financing for sales to Russia, the terms of credit naturally would have to be worked out. It is said that the maximum allowance would be 4 years, in the case of capital goods, while on such things as cotton and commodities going immediately into production and sale the terms would range from a comparatively few months to the maximum of 4 years.

INTEREST IN LONG-RANGE PLAN

The proposal to group all industries under a national planning scheme has evoked a great deal of interest throughout the country, judging from the volume of letters received in Washington.

Experts working on Tariff Commission reports are developing units of industries that might well be spared without menacing the economic stability of the Nation. One group, it is indicated, has been giving attention to the chemical schedule finding any number of commodities which might suffer a slight loss of protection without menacing the industry. In fact, it is admitted that some branches of capital industries would find it extremely difficult to justify duties contained in the Hawley-Smoot Tariff Act.

Reference has been made to coal-tar products. Decreased imports in 1932 were attributed by the Tariff Commission to transfer of production to foreign-owned plants in the United States, production at these plants having increased substantially in recent years. There were practically no imports of low-priced dyes (sulphur, black, and indigo).

DYES ARE LISTED

It is stated that a separation could well be made in the paragraph of the law covering dyes, so that a rate lower than that prescribed might be provided for types of dyes which we do not manufacture in quantities sufficient to meet domestic requirements. It will be argued that high-priced dyes should not be made to bear the burden of resisting rates merely to bolster the domestic industry by inducing use of products in substitution of the imported ones.

Whiting has been selected among others as a commodity which, perhaps, does not warrant present protection.

The United States has imported as high as 80,000,000 pounds in 1 year. The chalk is imported and ground in the United States, and it is asserted this business could be left to Belgium, France, or the United Kingdom.

Manganese compounds and salts are referred to as products which might well be imported, if it is decided against fostering manganese production in the United States. Antimony oxide, antimony sulphides, and salts and compounds are listed as good subjects for admission from abroad if China or the United Kingdom is given entry into American markets.

The duty on menthol is so high, it is argued, as to discourage imports. It is charged that this duty has been made too high in the interest of hardwood distillation, the commodity now being produced synthetically. With a tariff of 18 cents per gallon, imports of synthetic methanol, which began in 1925 and reached a peak of 1,710,470 gallons in 1927, dropped almost to nothing in 1932.

BUTYL TARIFF HIGH

Similarly, the tariff on butyl acetate is so high that none comes in, although formerly considerable quantities were imported and there was rather a notable case of dumping of the product. Interest has been shown in the possibility of reducing the tariff on all solvents and solvent materials which are used in the paint and varnish and automobile industry. It is pointed out that in 1933 there was a shortage in production of acetic acid and imports from Canada were necessary. Imports were the highest on record and were attributed to the pick-up in the automobile industry.

Reports of the Tariff Commission, it is said, show many opportunities for tariff reductions to afford a market for foreign products. Warning is given, however, that for some of these, great care must be taken, because even a slight reduction might bring disastrous results in the home market.

Secretary of State Hull is not particularly concerned with such individual items just now, it is indicated, but is more interested in setting up a new foreign-trade policy for the Government. However, the knowledge that such a program is under consideration is concerning affected interests, who are attempting to figure out where they would stand under the operation of the Hull-Peek program.

PROTECT EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUNITIES FOR AMERICA'S WORKERS

(Radio address delivered by Matthew Woll, president America's Wage Earners' Protective Conference and vice president American Federation of Labor, Tuesday, Dec. 19, 1933)

To the worker, employment is of supreme importance. The right to "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness" loses much of its significance to the worker where he is denied the right to work. For regular employment means both security and self-support. It means a stable citizenship. Wage earners and small-salaried employees are indeed grateful for the many efforts being made to provide employment for the millions of those unemployed.

There are those who hold that it is impossible to restore economic equilibrium to the United States while the rest of the world is either in the throes of internal disruption or upon the verge of bankruptcy and that, therefore, economic as well as political isolation is more and more an anachronism. It is they who are most vociferous in their declamations that the cure for the present depression and for unemployment is the development of the export market.

Our attention is constantly directed to the estimated loss of $2,000,000,000 a year due to our reduced foreign trade. Varying and conflicting statements are prescribed as to the number of workers that would be reemployed, if exports were encouraged.

But what are the facts?

In 1929 the Ways and Means Committee of the Congress issued a report showing that there were some 45,000,000 American workers gainfully employed interested in or affected by tariff legislation. This report also made it very clear that there were but some 600,000 industrial workers actually employed, in peak times, in producing manufactured goods for export.

The United States Tariff Commission, in a report recently sent to the United States Senate, states. I quote:

"The number of factory workers engaged in producing articles for export fell from about 658,000 in 1929 (the peak year) to 364,000 in 1931, a decrease in round numbers of 300,000."

After referring to the total number of persons engaged in industrial and agricultural production for export employed in 1929, who were unemployed in 1931, the Tariff Commission further states. I quote:

"The aggregate decrease in employment resulting from the reduction in all exports (both agricultural and manufacturing) between 1929 and 1931 was, therefore, in the neighborhood of 500,000."

In other words, the Tariff Commission's investigation indicated in effect that if our exports were increased to the amount having prevailed before 1929, but 500,000 would be reemployed in both industry and agriculture. This represents less than 4 percent of our industrial workers who have been unemployed. Wage earners of America may, therefore, be rightly alarmed at the urgency of the proposal made to increase our exports when it is self-apparent that increased exports must necessarily be accompanied by an increase of imports and, therefore, a consequent and perhaps greater loss of domestic employment due to an enhanced foreign competition in our home market.

In hundreds of thousands of instances the question of tariff rates means employment or unemployment to American industrial workers. Raise tariff rates in certain commodities and you make possible continued employment and the maintenance of proper standards of living and conditions of life. Lower rates and the reverse happens. For these reasons great uneasiness prevails amongst hundreds of thousands of our industrial workers who are unable to understand the undue stress which is being laid upon the value of export trade.

Workers are also aware of the fact that our manufactured goods for export are produced mainly in mechanized mass-production factories, operated by concerns known for their indifference or hostility to labor and where labor costs are relatively small. The report of the Tariff Commission evidences that of the 294,000 industrial workers employed in 1929 in production of manufactured goods for export who were unemployed in 1931, 175,000, or 48 percent, were formerly employed in the production of metals, machinery, and automobiles. I need not dwell on the type of working conditions or the wages paid to these workers. The employers in the class just referred to are conspicuous for their evasion, if not denial, of the right of workers to organize and to bargain collectively—industrial relations made mandatory under the N.R.A.

The exigencies of the Recovery Act have focused more and more attention upon the proposal of arriving at reciprocal agreements whereby detailed and selected concessions are made in return for similar ones. These agreements are sought through bilateral treaty negotiations rather than multilateral arrangements. To date only one such treaty has been signed. Colombia has agreed to certain concessions on American goods in return for our promise to retain coffee and bananas on the free list. While this treaty has been signed, it must, of course, receive the required legislative ratification before it goes into effect.

This policy of reaching reciprocal agreements is one which may not be inconsistent with the Recovery Act. By a studied selection, a number of commodities can be found which are not produced in important quantities in the United States and which are regularly supplied in considerable quantities by foreign countries. Similarly, we ship certain articles to other countries without competing with important domestic industries within their borders. In this field, though greatly limited, trade may be fostered without injury to domestic industries of the contracting states.

However, labor is apprehensive and greatly disturbed lest authorization be given to agents of the Federal Government to enter into reciprocal trade treaties with foreign governments and, as an incentive to foreign nations, reduce or enable the reduction of our present tariff duties by 50 percent without further action either on the part of Congress or the Tariff Commission.

Such unrestricted legislative authorization would prove extremely dangerous. Then, too, a complicating factor lies in the so-called "most-favored-nation clause" in a number of existing treaties. On this subject, however, Secretary of State Hull made an important pronouncement at the Pan American Conference at Montevideo only a few days ago. For years the United States has maintained that the most-favored-nation clause automatically conceded to all countries which had this clause in a treaty with a given country the same concession which the latter country gave to another. Secretary Hull has now accepted what may be called the European view, which is that the other countries receive the concession only on condition that they make the same reciprocal concession for which the favor was granted.

In venturing into and applying the method or process of trade treaties with foreign governments it is essential that workers should have an opportunity to be heard. It is equally important that participation of labor, as at present made possible and available through an appeal to Congress and through direct representation on the Tariff Commission, should in no way be lessened, but be increased.

All evidence available leads to the conclusion that the President regards the recovery program as coming first; that tariff concessions must not be made at the expense of domestic recovery; and that he still looks upon domestic affairs as coming first, as expressed in his inaugural address. It is equally evident that he intends to steer our domestic economy upon a solid basis before dipping his oar too deeply into foreign waters.

Labor realizes that unfortunate delays are encountered in the present method of adjusting tariff rates through the Tariff Commission with the approval of the President. However, we believe much of the unnecessary delay is due entirely to restrictive rules and requirements of law which could and should be corrected so as to permit the rendering of decisions in a shorter space of time.

One of the causes for delay on the part of the Tariff Commission is the necessity, under the present rules, to make investigations in foreign countries. Several foreign nations resent our investigators' seeking information. In other cases, owing to the limited appropriations at the disposal of the Tariff Commission, conditions have so changed by the time the investigation is concluded and a decision is to be rendered that the industry in question has been irreparably injured.

This is not said in criticism of the personnel or the work of the Tariff Commission. Indeed, situations referred to are due solely to a procedure made mandatory by law. Many workers believe that great good would come by freeing the Tariff Commission of restrictive rules now in force. Certainly that method should be tried before any other procedure is followed and which may result in great apprehension, confusion, and doubt.

America's workers are also aware of the fact that our present tariff policy confers the greatest benefits upon those countries, especially the Asiatics, where labor conditions are the most repressive and intolerable.

American labor favors a tariff policy wherein imports will be valued on the basis of the value of the imported article in the United States—a policy better known as the "American valuation"—and not upon the depreciated as well as manipulated values of foreign countries.

Many foreign countries have monopolized industries. More are doing so. Soviet Russia has monopolized all industry and agriculture. Its Government is the sole producer and distributor of all things. Japan and other nations have monopolized the match industries of their countries. They prevent the entry into their countries of matches made in America. Japan also holds the world-wide monopoly on natural camphor. Germany holds a monopoly on many chemicals. These are but a few of many illustrations.

Indeed, the tendency toward state or national control of imports as well as exports is rapidly increasing and to such an alarming extent that the question may well be raised as to whether or not reciprocal trade treaties do encourage and strengthen foreign cartels and trusts and as against our national attempt to prevent monopolization at home.

As against all these agencies for increased export trade, reciprocal trade treaties, and other devices urged to that end, America's wage earners raise the more important issue of enlarging our domestic purchasing power and of increasing and protecting our home markets.

Government statistics clearly indicate that more than 93 percent of the products of American labor and American agriculture are consumed in America. While this is an average figure of all commodities and includes such important commodities as cotton, which is widely exported, it does indicate how great a domestic market we have in our own free-trade area. This great American consumption of American goods is largely due to the high standards of life and work which prevail in our country, and have been established in the main through the untiring efforts of American organized labor. Our present problem is rather that of extending this home consuming power in view of the constant losses which our producers of cotton, wheat, lumber, and other products have suffered and will increasingly suffer in the world markets by reason of a constantly growing competition from other nations.

There is little hope of recovery of our lost foreign trade, whether or not there is a change of political and governmental attitudes which have been or hereafter may be assumed on questions of foreign debts, tariff duties, allotment of domestic content, patent laws, and other devices used to regulate international as well as domestic trade and commerce.

Regardless of how we balance advantages and disadvantages, the fact remains that the foreign market is not so desirable as the home market, either for capital or for labor. Goods exported must be sold at world prices in competition with goods produced by poorly paid, pauper, or even forced labor—and the certain result of large exports is always that labor of the chief exporting countries, such as England and Germany, is forced to accept lower wages in order to be able to compete effectively in the foreign market. In other words, the predominance of the foreign over the home market totally destroys the benefits of the protection of labor. What the Nation needs, and is beginning to know it needs, is not great economic dependence upon the foreign market but exactly the opposite—greater economic independence.

Tariff legislation is of vital importance to American workers. Again, the proper interpretation and the enforcement of tariff legislation are also of vital importance to our industrial workers.

After several years of continued agitation, American labor was successful, during the last few years, in having inserted in the appropriation bills a requirement that Government moneys be used in purchasing materials the products of America.

Only recently our attention was called to the fact that one Government bureaucrat insists upon using Government moneys, appropriated for relief of the unemployed, to purchase asphalt produced in South America, where labor receives but a pittance for working 70 or 80 hours per week, because the cost of this South American asphalt per unit is a little cheaper. Thus, instead of the money being spent as Congress intended, we find hundreds of our engineers, our refinery workers, and our oil-field workers denied an opportunity of employment.

To spread employment among these American asphalt workers, the code authority has just recently found it necessary to issue an order reducing the working hours—these workers are paid by the hour—from 48 hours to 36 hours for a period of 3 months. Naturally, the weekly earnings of the American workers suffer a reduction of 25 percent.

In closing, I might well suggest that when we spend our money for American products we retain the products and the money in our own land, thus contributing to the relief of the millions of our own who are unable to secure employment.

STUDIES OF THE GREAT LAKES-ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY (S.DOC. NO. 116, PT. 3)

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NEELY in the chair) laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which was read, as follows:

To the Senate:

I transmit herewith for the information of the Senate a report on land and water transportation. The report includes an analysis of Interstate Commerce Commission data furnished by the Interdepartmental Board on the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence project.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 23, 1934.

Mr. PITTMAN. I ask unanimous consent that the message of the President and the report, with illustrations, may be printed as a Senate document for the information of the Senate and that the message and report thereafter may lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection the message and the accompanying report, with the illustrations, will be printed and lie on the table.

THE CALENDAR

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In accordance with the order previously entered, the calendar, under rule VIII, is in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Costigan	Johnson	Robinson, Ark.
Ashurst	Couzens	Kean	Robinson, Ind.
Austin	Cutting	Keyes	Russell
Bachman	Davis	King	Schall
Bailey	Dickinson	La Follette	Sheppard
Bankhead	Dieterich	Lewis	Shipstead
Barbour	Dill	Logan	Smith
Barkley	Duffy	Lonergan	Steiwer
Black	Erickson	McAdoo	Stephens
Bone	Fess	McCarran	Thomas, Utah
Borah	Fletcher	McGill	Thompson
Brown	Frazier	McKellar	Townsend
Bulkley	George	McNary	Trammell
Bulow	Gibson	Murphy	Tydings
Byrd	Glass	Neely	Vandenberg
Byrnes	Goldsborough	Norris	Van Nuys
Capper	Gore	Nye	Wagner
Caraway	Hale	O'Mahoney	Walcott
Carey	Harrison	Overton	Walsh
Clark	Hastings	Patterson	Wheeler
Coolidge	Hatch	Pittman	White
Connally	Hatfield	Pope
Copeland	Hayden	Reynolds

Mr. FESS. I again wish to announce that the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF], the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. HEBERT], the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK], and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] are necessarily detained from the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Ninety Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

SUPERVISION OF FOREIGN COMMERCIAL TRANSACTIONS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the agreement previously entered, the Calendar of Unobjected Bills is in order. The clerk will state the first bill on the calendar.

The bill (S. 882) to provide for the more effective supervision of foreign commercial transactions, and for other purposes, was announced as first in order on the calendar.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, that bill is pending upon a motion to reconsider entered by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]. I agreed with him this morning that the bill should go over temporarily—that is, go over from this particular call of the calendar. There would be no difficulty, in my opinion, for the Senator from Arkansas and myself to agree upon the measure, but I was advised this morning that certain Departments of the Government that are now dealing with the measure desire a brief delay in order that they may reach their conclusions. I want to serve notice, however, that at the earliest opportunity, at the convenience of the Senator from Arkansas, I shall ask the Senate to proceed with the motion to reconsider and determine its policy in reference to this particular bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 506) conferring upon the President the power to reduce subsidies, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. WHITE. I ask that the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The joint resolution (H.J.Res. 93) to prohibit the exportation of arms or munitions of war from the United States under certain conditions was announced as next in order.

Mr. JOHNSON. Over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1403) to authorize the merger of the Georgetown Gaslight Co. with and into Washington Gas Light Co., and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 752) to amend section 24 of the Judicial Code, as amended, with respect to the jurisdiction of the district courts of the United States over suits relating to orders of State administrative boards was announced as next in order.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN], who opposes this bill, is at present engaged in one of the Senate investigations. He asked me to consent that this bill go over, and I do so at his request and with the idea in mind that at the next calling of the calendar or in the interim, upon motion, the bill may be taken up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

HARRY H. HORTON

The bill (S. 308) to authorize the award of a decoration for distinguished service to Harry H. Horton was read, considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President is hereby authorized to cause the recommendation for the award of a decoration to Harry H. Horton, formerly private, first-class, Medical Detachment, One Hundred and Forty-eighth Regiment Field Artillery, American Expeditionary Forces, for distinguished conduct in the vicinity of Malancourt, near Montfaucon, France, on or about October 12, 1918, to be considered by the proper boards or authorities, and such award made to said Horton as his said conduct merits.

THE CLASSIFIED CIVIL SERVICE

The bill (S. 583) relating to the classified civil service was announced as next in order.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah give a brief explanation of the bill?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, this measure is designed to correct a situation which, I think, to some Senators—certainly to myself—was rather objectionable. By Executive order there were blanketed into the civil service in the various departments, without examination by the Commission, a large number of individuals. This measure is to rescind that order so that those who were blanketed in will have to take an examination in order to retain their positions, just like other persons who now come into the civil service.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I think I am in sympathy with what the Senator wants to accomplish, but I should like to know a little more about the basis of the bill and its history.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will say that this bill is to aid and build up the civil service rather than to detract from it. I say that for this reason, that those who were blanketed into the civil service were not required to take examinations, whereas in the future such blanketing will not take place, but employees must undergo a civil-service examination in all cases.

Mr. FESS. Will the Senator allow the bill to go over? I think probably I will agree to have it considered after I shall have had an opportunity to look into it a little further.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

MIGRATORY BIRD SANCTUARIES, ETC.

The bill (S. 1658) to supplement and support the Migratory Bird Conservation Act by providing funds for the acquisition of areas for use as migratory-bird sanctuaries, refuges, and breeding grounds, for developing and administering such areas, for the protection of certain migratory birds, for the enforcement of the Migratory Bird Treaty Act and regulations thereunder, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. I ask that the bill go over.

Mr. WALCOTT. Mr. President, may I request the Senator from Utah to withhold his objection until I make a brief statement?

Mr. KING. I withhold the objection temporarily.

Mr. WALCOTT. Mr. President, I will explain briefly the purpose of this bill. There is no question about the very serious diminution in the number of our migratory waterfowl. Several years ago the Norbeck-Andresen bill was passed authorizing $8,000,000 to be expended for sanctuaries and refuges for migratory waterfowl, which constitute a great natural resource of the country. We have never been able to get more than a very small portion of that money; in all, only about $1,200,000 over some 6 or 8 years has been appropriated by the Congress. That is a very trifling sum for what is needed.

There are now available surveys according to which we would be enabled to buy at very low prices per acre marshlands, waste lands that are worth nothing for any other purpose, for the breeding, the rearing, and conservation of waterfowl by the million. The diminution in the number of waterfowl today is chiefly the result of the draining of their natural feeding areas, marshlands. In many instances the draining has been brought about by reclamation projects of the Federal Government, on many of which the people who have settled have lost everything they had.

If we can restore these areas, rewater them, and buy the marsh areas and swamp lands, lands that are not used for agricultural purposes, we can restore a very valuable food supply for the people of the United States, a tremendously valuable resource that ought to be self-sustaining and yield a tremendous dividend, not only in the form of food but in the creation of great recreational possibilities.

I am exceedingly anxious that the Senate give consideration to this measure. It seems to me of great importance, and I wish very much, indeed, that the bill could be considered at this time.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. WALCOTT. I yield.

Mr. DILL. This is the same bill, in another guise, over which the Senate fought for many weeks some years ago. Its authors have changed this measure so that instead of a Federal license one must procure a stamp from the post office, but the net result will be to put Federal game wardens in every State of the Union where migratory-bird sanctuaries are located. To that feature some of us are extremely opposed.

There are other features of this bill that need very careful consideration. It must be amended, in my judgment, if it is going to serve the sportsmen of this country in the way it is intended to serve them.

I wish to say to the Senator that it seems to me out of the question to take this bill up by unanimous consent. If it is taken up at some time so that amendments may be worked out and properly presented, that would be a different question; but certainly, I think, three fourths of our people, indeed three fourths of those who are for this bill, have not any conception of the fact that it is going to bring Federal game wardens into the States all over the Nation, a thing to which our people generally are much opposed.

Mr. WALCOTT. Mr. President, I may say that that is a very small factor in the bill. There are only 24 game wardens for the entire United States now attached to the Geological Survey. Such a small portion is reserved for that purpose that I would be willing to see that provision stricken out.

Mr. DILL. If the bill is passed, provision should be made that whatever money is to be used for the wardens should be turned over to the States and used for State game wardens in carrying out the enforcement under Federal supervision. The plan of having Federal game wardens in addition to the State and county game wardens is going to cause a tremendous lot of trouble and I think defeat whatever good there might be in the bill.

Mr. KING. Let the bill go over.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I wish to say that in my opinion the bill under consideration is quite different from the bill that was so energetically attacked in the Senate a number of years ago. In the first place, the bill then under consideration, which was offensive to a great many of us in the Senate, attempted to deal with nonmigratory game as well as migratory game. It will be remembered that Senators said the farm boys would have to get Federal licenses to shoot rabbits. But the pending measure is limited exclusively to licenses to shoot migratory birds.

Be that as it may, whether it was proper for the United States Government to take charge of migratory birds, it did take charge of them and the Supreme Court held the act to be constitutional, and so we have charge of them. We have a treaty with Canada which has been made for the purpose of trying to protect ducks and birds of that kind from extinction. There is no doubt we will obtain a treaty with Mexico along the same lines for the purpose of trying to preserve migratory birds and waterfowl.

The special Commission on the Conservation of Wild Life Resources had hearings and invited every game organization in the United States to be present. We invited all the game commissioners of the United States to be present, and practically all of them attended. There is no question that the natural sanctuaries for migratory birds in this country are practically gone. The marshes have been drained. Reclamation has destroyed many marshes. The encroachment of agriculture and of industry and of cities and population has practically destroyed the feeding and resting places of ducks passing from their northern summer homes to their winter homes in the southern part of the country.

We cannot get an appropriation from the Federal Government in sufficient amount to provide resting places, sanctuaries, and feeding grounds for these migratory birds. We have tried it, but Congress will not appropriate. There is but one way we can do it, and that is to raise the money directly. If anyone can think of a better way than to require the man who wants to shoot ducks and geese to buy a stamp for $1 and attach it to his State license, we have never heard of it. All this money is to be used for the purpose of acquiring and maintaining resting places, feeding and breeding grounds, and bird sanctuaries. Whether we should have it under the care of the State game wardens or under the care of the Biological Survey or under the care of special wardens is a matter that is quite immaterial to the main purpose of obtaining feeding and breeding grounds and sanctuaries.

I think this is a matter of vast importance. I know it is not desired to debate the measure now; but I think it well, as the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. WALCOTT] has called attention to the fact, that the bill is certainly worthy of consideration.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I want to express my complete concurrence in what the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. WALCOTT] and the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] have said on this subject and about this proposed legislation. I think no one could be more restless under the invasion of States by Federal authority than I am. I should hate to see a swarm of Federal officials invading in increasing numbers my own State. I could not stand examination upon the detailed terms of this bill; but I know its great purpose, and with that I am in sympathy. It may have defects, but I submit to the Senator from Washington that these may be corrected. Injustices in the operation of the legislation, hardships which may result or defects which may appear, may all hereafter be cured; but we cannot bring back the migratory birds that have disappeared and that will continue to disappear through the months of delay in providing them with feeding and breeding and resting grounds.

No one who has been interested in the subject of our migratory-bird life can but be impressed with the disappearance of these migratory fowl. They have gone until but a small fraction of those that once flew the air and rested upon our streams and our lakes and our bays can now be seen. I should very much like to take a real forward step in this field of conservation.

I appeal to the Senator from Washington to let the bill be considered; and then as its deficiencies appear, let us remedy them, but in the meantime let us move to save the bird life of America.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I have, as other Senators have, a love of bird life, and I want to see something done in the matter of preserving it. However, I am so opposed to what may be done under the bill as it is written that I would not under any circumstances consent to its passage at this time if I could help it.

There is another thing about the bill that must be amended. There is nothing in the bill to prevent regulations permitting the use of these sanctuaries for shooting purposes. That is what was in the back of the minds of officials of the Department of Agriculture when the other bill was before the Senate. There are a number of amendments which should be incorporated in the bill before it is passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On objection, the bill will be passed over.

TURTLE MOUNTAIN CHIPPEWA INDIANS OF NORTH DAKOTA

The bill (S. 326) referring the claims of the Turtle Mountain Band or Bands of Chippewa Indians of North Dakota to the Court of Claims for adjudication and settlement was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That jurisdiction be, and hereby is, conferred upon the Court of Claims, with right of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States by either party, notwithstanding the lapse of time, statutes of limitations, waiver, release, settlement heretofore made or directed by any act of Congress, to hear, adjudicate, and render judgment according to right and justice and as upon a full and fair arbitration, on any and all claims not heretofore determined and adjudicated on their merits by the Court of Claims or the Supreme Court of the United States, arising under any treaty, ratified or unratified, act of Congress, agreement or understanding, verbal or written, Executive order, or treaty with any other tribes or nations of Indians by the authorized agents or representatives of the United States relating to, affecting, or violating the land occupancy or other rights of the Turtle Mountain Band or Bands of Chippewa Indians of North Dakota, including the band of Chief or Thomas Little Shell, and other isolated Bands of Chippewas of North Dakota and Montana.

SEC. 2. Any and all claims against the United States within the purview of this act shall be forever barred unless suit be instituted or petition or petitions filed as herein provided in the Court of Claims within 5 years from the date of the approval of this act, and such suit shall make the Turtle Mountain Band or Bands of Chippewa Indians of North Dakota party or parties plaintiff and the United States of America party defendant. The claim or claims of the band or bands aforementioned may be presented separately or jointly by petition, subject, however, to amendment. The petition or petitions shall be verified by the respective attorney or attorneys employed to prosecute such claim or claims under contract with the Turtle Mountain Band or Bands of Chippewa Indians, approved by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the Secretary of the Interior, as provided by law. Official letters, papers, documents, reports and records, or affidavits on file in the Interior Department, or certified copies thereof, may be used in evidence; and the Departments of the Government shall furnish to the attorney or attorneys of said Turtle Mountain Band or Bands such treaties, agreements, papers, reports, correspondence, affidavits, or records as may be needed by the attorney or attorneys of said band or bands of Indians.

SEC. 3. That if any claim or claims be submitted to said court it shall determine the rights of the parties thereto, notwithstanding lapse of time, statutes of limitation, waiver, or release, and any payment which may have been made by the United States upon any claim so submitted shall not be pleaded as an estoppel, but may be pleaded as a set-off in any suit; and the United States shall be allowed credit subsequent to the date of any law, treaty, or agreement under which the claims arise for any sum or sums heretofore paid or expended for the benefit of said Indians.

SEC. 4. That if the Court of Claims shall determine that the United States, under the provisions of any agreement or understanding, verbal or written, Executive order, law, or treaty referred to in section 1 hereof, has unlawfully appropriated or disposed of any property belonging to the said Turtle Mountain Band or Bands of Chippewa Indians, or its or their members, or to which the said Indians had the right of title by occupancy; or if the said court shall determine that the United States, under the provisions of any such agreement, Executive order, law, or treaty, herein referred to, under mistake of fact or duress obtained title to or the cession of any land from the said Indians for an inadequate consideration; or if the court shall determine that the United States obtained cessions of land from said band or bands of Indians without obtaining the consent of a majority of the male adult members thereof; or if the court shall determine that the United States, to the loss of said Indians, appropriated to its own use or to the use of any other Indian tribe or band, or permitted white settlers to occupy and acquire title under the public land laws of the United States, to any lands in North Dakota, the title and occupancy of which by long possession by the said Indians had been acknowledged by other tribes and by officials of the United States; or if a portion of the land so claimed by the said band or bands was taken from them by an Executive order for the benefit of any other band or tribe of Indians, without compensation to the said Turtle Mountain Band or Bands of Chippewa Indians, the damages shall be confined to the reasonable money value thereof at the time of such appropriation: Provided, That if the Court of Claims shall determine that the United States, by reason of any delay on the part of its agents or authorized representatives, in submitting for ratification any agreement with the said Turtle Mountain Band or Bands of Chippewa Indians, for the purchase or cession of any land so occupied and possessed by them, or that the Congress of the United States, contrary to the understanding of or oral promise made to said Indians, unduly delayed the ratification of any such agreement whereby any such lands were ceded to the United States, to the detriment and loss of the said Indians, then the said court is hereby authorized to award and enter judgment, as justice and equity may demand, for damages due to such delay at 4 percent per annum of the stipulated or agreed amount set out in any such agreement ceding such lands to the United States, and to compute such interest from the date the said agreement was signed or executed by the said Indians; and with reference to all claims which may be the subject matter of the suits herein authorized, the decree of the court shall be in full settlement of all damages, if any, committed by the Government of the United States and shall annul and cancel all claim, right, and title of the said Turtle Mountain Band or Bands of Chippewa Indians in and to such money or other property.

SEC. 5. Upon the final determination of such suit or suits the Court of Claims shall have jurisdiction to fix and determine a reasonable fee, not to exceed 10 percent of the recovery in each instance, together with all necessary and proper expenses incurred in preparation and prosecution of the suit, to be paid to the respective attorneys employed by the said band or bands of Indians, and the same shall be included in the decree and shall be paid out of any sum or sums found to be due said band or bands of Indians. The court shall have jurisdiction and is hereby further authorized to determine what amount of the recovery, if any, shall be awarded to the respective bands who bring suit hereunder.

SEC. 6. The Court of Claims shall have full authority by proper orders and process to bring in and make parties to such suit any other tribe or band of Indians deemed by it necessary or proper to final determination of the matters in controversy. A copy of the petition shall in such case be served upon the Attorney General of the United States, and he, or some attorney from the Department of Justice to be designated by him, is hereby directed to appear and defend the interests of the United States in such case.

SEC. 7. The proceeds of all amounts, if any, recovered for said band or bands of Indians less, fees and expenses, shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the Indians decreed by said court to be entitled thereto, and shall draw interest at the rate of 4 percent per annum from the date of the judgment or decree: Provided, That actual costs necessary to be incurred by the Turtle Mountain Band or Bands of Chippewa Indians as required by the rules of the court in the prosecution of this suit shall be paid out of the funds of said Indians in the Treasury of the United States, upon proper vouchers, to be examined and approved by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

BILLS PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 1975) to provide for loans to farmers for crop production and harvesting during the year 1934, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. SMITH subsequently said: Mr. President, may I be permitted to say that the reason why the bill we have just passed over was permitted to go over without a statement from me is that I understand that the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] has requested that there be a conference in reference thereto. I do not want the impression to go out that I sat here and allowed what I consider to be the most important bill affecting agricultural interests to go over upon a mere objection.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I am prompted to make an observation in view of the objection which was made. I understood that the matter was in conference, and that during the discussion a day or two ago there was an understanding that there should be a conference and a consideration of the measure, and that no definite agreement had been reached, but would be within a short time. Therefore, I objected to the consideration of the bill today, in view of the understanding heretofore reached.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection having been made, the bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 163) for the relief of Capt. Guy M. Kinman was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

ANTON W. FISCHER

The bill (S. 1651) for the relief of the estate of Anton W. Fischer was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold the objection until the report of the committee is read?

Mr. KING. I have no objection to withholding it.

Mr. SCHALL. May the clerk read the report of the committee? I am sure there is no objection to this bill.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, may I address a parliamentary inquiry to the Chair for information?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state the parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. LEWIS. I assumed to have an arrangement this morning with Senators on opposite sides, interested in the matter of the treaty, that we would proceed today with the arguments touching the St. Lawrence Treaty, my desire being that the eminent Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] should take the floor, and that the able senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] opposing, would follow. I have understood that that was to begin at 2 o'clock. May I ask what has transpired that interferes with that understanding as to an executive session?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that the arrangement was to consider unobjected bills on the calendar as soon as the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS] concluded his address.

Mr. LEWIS. Preceding entrance upon the discussion of the treaty?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes. That is the Chair's information.

Mr. LEWIS. If such is the amendatory understanding, of course, I accede to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SCHALL] has asked that the report on this bill be read.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator from Minnesota if he is sufficiently familiar with the facts to detail them briefly, in order that we may determine the merits of the claim?

Mr. SCHALL. Yes, Mr. President. This is an overtax of an estate in Winona to the amount of a few hundred dollars.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Minnesota yield?

Mr. SCHALL. I yield.

Mr. LOGAN. Having made the report in this case, I will state to the Senator from Utah that this man Fischer was compelled to pay nine-hundred-and-odd dollars in taxes. Afterward it was found that he had overpaid some $423. He had made claim for a refund. The Treasury Department held that he was entitled to a refund of $147 only, because the rest was barred by limitation. Recently the Court of Claims, in a decision, held that in a similar case the refund was not barred by limitation; so this man is clearly entitled to the money, and there is not anybody to dispute the fact.

Mr. KING. I withdraw the objection.

Mr. SCHALL. I thank the Senator.

Mr. KING. Let me ask the Senator from Kentucky whether this was merely a mistake of facts, or was it a mistake of law?

Mr. LOGAN. A mistake of facts. In making the calculation this man was overcharged in his tax. The same Department corrected the overcharge afterward and admitted the mistake, but said that they could not refund more than a part of the amount paid, because the rest was barred by limitation. Afterward the Court of Claims held that it was not barred by limitation; so this bill is to refund the balance of $275.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to refund, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the estate of Anton W. Fischer, late of Owatonna, Minn., the sum of $275.98, under existing rules and regulations, said amount having been illegally collected from said estate, as stated by letter of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue dated February 7, 1923.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 172) for the relief of the First Camden National Bank & Trust Co., of Camden, N.J., was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. I object to that bill. Let it go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

CHICAGO, NORTH SHORE & MILWAUKEE RAILROAD CO.

The bill (S. 1069) authorizing adjustment of the claim of the Chicago, North Shore & Milwaukee Railroad Co. was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Comptroller General of the United States is hereby authorized and directed to adjust and settle the claim of the Chicago, North Shore & Milwaukee Railroad Co. for reimbursement for materials furnished and labor supplied in repairing Chicago and Eastern Illinois gondola car no. 93962 that was accidentally damaged on July 24, 1928, while spotted on Government tracks at Fort Sheridan, Ill., and to allow not exceeding $120.39 in full and final settlement of said claim. There is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $120.39, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for payment of said claim.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 1504) for the relief of Walter J. Bryson Paving Co. was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. I should like an explanation of that bill, Mr. President. Let is go over. I make the objection upon the ground that Mr. McCarl states that he finds no merit in the claim.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

BENJAMIN BRAZNELL

The bill (S. 1426) for the relief of the estate of Benjamin Braznell was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to reopen and allow the claim of the Braddock Trust Co., executor of the estate of Benjamin Braznell, late of Pittsburgh, Pa., and refund the sum of $2,323.47, the balance of taxes illegally collected, under existing laws and decisions.

B. & O. MANUFACTURING CO.

The bill (S. 1782) for the relief of the B. & O. Manufacturing Co. was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Comptroller General of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to settle and adjust the claim of the B. & O. Manufacturing Co. under contract no. 12429, dated May 28, 1929, for extra expense in recutting material for trousers delivered to said company by the Navy Department, and to allow not to exceed $1,597.52 in full and final settlement of said claim. There is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,597.52, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to pay said claim.

WARREN J. CLEAR

The bill (S. 406) for the relief of Warren J. Clear was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Warren J. Clear, captain, United States Infantry, the sum of $737 in reimbursement for the loss by earthquake and fire of personal property in Tokyo, Japan, on or about September 1, 1923, while he was serving as an attaché, American Embassy, Tokyo, Japan.

WILLIE B. CLEVERLY

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 407) for the relief of Willie B. Cleverly, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, on page 1, line 6, after the words " sum of ", to strike out " $160 " and insert " 124.23 ", so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Willie B. Cleverly the sum of $124.23 in full compensation for money expended by him in doctor's and hospital bills growing out of an injury which he received while in the performance of his duties as temporary surfman at the Point Allerton Station of the United States Coast Guard on January 13, 1924, at which time the said Cleverly was filling a vacancy in the personnel at that station.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 1683) for the relief of the Standard Dredging Co. was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

DEPARTMENT OF FORESTS AND WATERS, COMMONWEALTH OF PENNSYLVANIA

The bill (S. 1115) to authorize the Department of Agriculture to issue a duplicate check in favor of Department of Forests and Waters, Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, the original check having been lost, was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That notwithstanding the provisions of section 3646, as amended, of the Revised Statutes of the United States, the disbursing clerk of the Department of Agriculture is authorized and directed to issue, without the requirement of an indemnity bond, a duplicate of original check no. 2675700, drawn November 19, 1931, in favor of Department of Forests and Waters, Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, for $345, the original check having been lost.

JOHN T. LENNON AND GEORGE T. FLORA

The bill (S. 1074) authorizing adjustment of the claims of John T. Lennon and George T. Flora was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Comptroller General of the United States is hereby authorized and directed to allow John T. Lennon and George T. Flora $25 each in full and final settlement of their claims for blood furnished May 4 and May 11, 1926, respectively, for transfusion to Harvey J. Shoppe, a patient in a Government hospital. There is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $50 for the payment of such claim.

LEBANON EQUITY EXCHANGE, OF LEBANON, NEBR.

The bill (S. 750) for the relief of the Lebanon Equity Exchange, of Lebanon, Nebr., was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to receive, consider, and determine, in accordance with law but without regard to any statute of limitations, any claim filed not later than 6 months after the passage of this act by the Lebanon Equity Exchange, Lebanon, Nebr., for the refund of Federal income and profits taxes collected from the said Lebanon Equity Exchange for the year 1920 in excess of the amount properly due: Provided, That in the settlement of said claim there shall be no allowance of interest.

FRANCIS B. KENNEDY

The bill (S. 1079) authorizing adjustment of the claim of Francis B. Kennedy was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Comptroller General of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to settle and adjust the claim of Francis B. Kennedy, narcotic agent, as reimbursement for money (private funds) of which he was robbed while investigating charges against Frank De Mayo and others at Kansas City, Mo., May 28, 1928, and to allow in full and final settlement of said claim in the sum of not to exceed $350. There is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $350, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to pay said claim.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 256) for the relief of Milburn Knapp was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. I should like an explanation of that bill. Let it go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. STEIWER subsequently said: Mr. President, I was temporarily absent from the Chamber at the time Senate bill 256 was passed over. I think there is no objection to it. If there is any objection, I should like to obtain unanimous consent to return to the bill in order to ascertain what is the nature of the objection, if any.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request made by the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. KING. I object. I shall be glad to talk with the Senator from Oregon about the bill, and I think there will be no difficulty concerning it at the next call of the calendar.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I should also like to look into the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill has been passed over.

The bill (S. 1680) for the relief of the estate of George B. Spearin was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. I should like an explanation of that bill, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This bill was introduced by the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND].

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, in preparing for a speech I am about to make, I have not kept track of the calendar. If the bill may go over without prejudice, I shall be glad to make the explanation later.

Mr. KING. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over without prejudice.

FARMERS' GRAIN CO., OF OMAHA, NEBR.

The bill (S. 751) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States to refund to the Farmers' Grain Co., of Omaha, Nebr., income taxes illegally paid to the United States Treasurer was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to refund, from moneys not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $2,186.36 to the Farmers' Grain Co., of Omaha, Nebr., this sum being paid illegally and through error by said company as income taxes to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and covered into the United States Treasury.

ELIZABETH B. EDDY

The bill (S. 1219) to carry into effect the finding of the Court of Claims in the claim of Elizabeth B. Eddy was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the legal representative of the estate of Elizabeth B. Eddy, widow of Charles G. Eddy, of New York, N.Y., the sum of $602.92, and the said sum is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purposes of this act.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 1076) authorizing adjustment of the claim of the Franklin Surety Co. was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. I should like an explanation of that bill, Mr. President. Let it go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

BEATRICE I. MANGES

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 376) for the relief of Beatrice I. Manges, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with amendments, on page 1, line 5, after the words "sum of", to strike out "$5,000" and insert "$1,000, and $50 per month in an amount not to exceed $2,500", and in line 7, after the word "Ohio", to strike out "as damages" and insert "in full settlement of all claims against the Government", so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Tresaury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,000, and $50 per month in an amount not to exceed $2,500, to Beatrice I. Manges, of Cleveland, Ohio, in full settlement of all claims against the Government for injuries received November 7, 1918, when a United States Army truck collided with an automobile of which she was an occupant.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

C. M. WILLIAMSON AND OTHERS

The bill (S. 2) for the relief of C. M. Williamson; Mrs. Tura Liljenquist, administratrix of C. E. Liljenquist, deceased; Lottie Redman; and H. N. Smith was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I will ask my friend from Idaho [Mr. POPE] to make an explanation of that bill, as to why there was any liability upon the part of the Government.

Mr. POPE. Mr. President, in 1910 the Government agreed to construct an irrigation project on the Fort Hall Indian Reservation and entered into contracts with the settlers. In the case of these claimants the contracts were carried out by them; the payments were made to the Government of some $22 an acre; but the Government failed entirely to comply with its part of the contract and furnish water to these claimants.

For a number of years water was furnished by the claimants themselves. Their laterals were dug, and they furnished the water to their own lands. Later on the Government, recognizing that breach of contract, constructed a siphon and furnished water for some of the settlers in that locality; and before that time—the time of the original construction—other settlers in the immediate locality were furnished water. The money was not returned which was paid by these settlers, and damages were incurred by reason of a direct breach of contract by the Government. That was recognized, and for two sessions of Congress the bill has been approved by the committees of the Senate.

The bill was passed by the Senate in the Seventy-first Congress and was also passed by the Senate in the Seventy-second Congress. It was approved by the House committee in the Seventy-second Congress, but did not receive consideration by the House. So we feel that the settlers are entitled to this relief.

Let me say further that the committee, in making its report, said that it had no doubt the full amount which was first asked, $13,000, would be awarded to the claimants in court privately, but that it had reduced the amount to $8,000 for the reason that an interest claim was included, and for the further reason that some pumps had been sold for $1,000. That is the reason why the reduction is made to $8,000.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to make two suggestions which I think are pertinent to this measure.

First, if there is any liability, ought not that liability to be a charge against the funds of the Reclamation Service? As I understand the Senator, the project is one which comes under the jurisdiction of the Bureau of Reclamation.

Mr. POPE. No; it is within an Indian reservation, under the direct control of the Government, and the contract was made by the Secretary directly with the settlers by virtue of the Government's control over Indian reservations.

Mr. KING. The Senator knows that on the Indian reservations there are a number of what might be denominated reclamation projects which were constructed in some instances by or under the direction of the Bureau of Reclamation. I was wondering whether this would fall within that category.

Mr. POPE. No; I think it would not. I was not familiar with the claim before the bill was introduced, but it does not fall within the reclamation law, as I understand it. There was an agreement made by the Secretary of the Interior directly with these settlers under the law relating to Indian reservations.

Mr. KING. Was it by an act of God—that is, the failure of nature to give enough of a snow supply to furnish water in the spring for irrigation purposes—or was it by reason of some default on the part of the Government?

Mr. POPE. It was by reason of a default on the part of the Government in two respects. In the first place, they represented to the settlers that this land was irrigable land, and that under the project to be constructed the water would be furnished to them, and they entered into a written contract to that effect. The settlers relied upon that, paid their money, kept up their payments, paid their assessments during all that period of time when they were not furnished water, and the Government recognized them. The Department of the Interior has approved this claim as being proper.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I shall not object to the bill, but I want to make this observation, that I fear this will be an entering wedge to a large number of claims which will be presented, because we know that the Bureau of Indian Affairs, under past administrations, entered upon a large number of so-called "irrigation or reclamation projects" right in the teeth of physical evidence that they would fail, and right in the teeth of recommendations adverse to the projects made by competent engineers. The waste and extravagance and the folly of the Indian Bureau in many of these irrigation projects calls for the severest condemnation.

I know that many of the white settlers were induced to enter upon these lands under false representations, and I know that the Bureau of Indian Affairs failed to make good the representations which were made which induced a large number of people to settle upon the lands. However, it is a past transaction; but this is not the end of these claims which will be presented to the Government, I fear.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to C. M. Williamson; Mrs. Tura Liljenquist, administratrix of C. E. Liljenquist, deceased; Lottie Redman; and H. N. Smith, in accordance with their respective interests, the sum of $8,824.10. Such sum represents the amount expended by them in installing a pumping plant and making necessary connections to bring water to their land, on the Fort Hall Indian Reservation, and the amount paid by them to the Idaho Power Co. during the years 1920 to 1927, inclusive, for power to operate said pumping plant.

PUBLIC SERVICE COORDINATED TRANSPORT OF NEWARK, N.J.

The bill (S. 1084) authorizing the adjustment of the claim of the Public Service Coordinated Transport of Newark, N.J., was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. I would like to have an explanation of that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY], who introduced the bill, is not in the Chamber at the present time.

Mr. KING. I ask that it go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

UNION SHIPPING & TRADING CO., LTD.

The bill (S. 1192) for the relief of the Union Shipping & Trading Co., Ltd., was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. I would like to have an explanation of that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER], who introduced the bill, is not in the Chamber at the present moment.

Mr. KING. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

PENNSYLVANIA R.R. CO.

The bill (S. 1082) authorizing adjustment of the claim of the Pennsylvania R.R. Co., was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

POTOMAC ELECTRIC POWER CO., OF WASHINGTON, D.C.

The bill (S. 1083) authorizing adjustment of the claim of the Potomac Electric Power Co., of Washington, D.C., was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Comptroller General of the United States is hereby authorized and directed to adjust and settle the claim of the Potomac Electric Power Co. for the balance necessary to reimburse it for the amount actually expended by said company in making electrical service connections from its mains to the control room on the east bascule draw span of the Arlington Memorial Bridge and to allow said company a balance of not to exceed $2,157.25 in full and final settlement of said claim. There is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $2,157.25, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for payment of said claim.

WILLIAM T. STILES

The bill (S. 1087) authorizing adjustment of the claim of William T. Stiles was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Comptroller General of the United States is hereby authorized and directed to settle and adjust the claim of William T. Stiles for blood furnished October 11, 1926, for transfusion to Charles E. Williams, a patient in a Government hospital, and to allow in full and final settlement of said claim an amount not in excess of $25. There is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $25 for the payment of such claim.

FAIRMONT CREAMERY CO., OF OMAHA, NEBR.

The bill (S. 749) for the relief of the Fairmont Creamery Co., of Omaha, Nebr., was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

ELIZABETH BOLGER

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 785) for the relief of Elizabeth Bolger, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, on page 1, line 4, to strike out "$5,000" and to insert in lieu thereof "$1,000", so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay Elizabeth Bolger the sum of $1,000 in full settlement of all claims against the Government on account of personal injuries sustained as the result of the carelessness of the driver of Navy automobile no. 637, on April 5, 1919, in Brooklyn, N.Y.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ANTHONY J. LYNN

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1429) for the relief of Anthony J. Lynn, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, on page 1, line 6, to strike out "a sum equal to" and to insert in lieu thereof the words "the sum of $254.40, said sum representing", so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay to Anthony J. Lynn, formerly a private, Company G, Thirty-first Regiment United States Infantry, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $254.40, said sum representing the whole amount of pay and allowances of which he was deprived by reason of proceedings against him in 1919 on false charges of burglary and the sentence of courtmartial rendered in such proceedings.

Mr. KING. I would like to have an explanation of that.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, the explanation is very simple. The claimant here was a soldier in the Siberian Expedition in Russia. He was charged with robbery and burglary, was convicted, and sentenced to a Federal prison for 15 years, which sentence, I believe, was afterward reduced to 10 years.

Later the woman and her son who had testified against the man appeared before the proper Army authorities and admitted that they had sworn falsely. He was then granted a pardon, restored to the Army, and this is a bill to pay him his regular compensation from the time he was arrested until he was restored to the Army, $254.40.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WOODHOUSE CHAIN WORKS

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 177) for the relief of Woodhouse Chain Works, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with amendments, on page 1, line 6, to strike out "$1,841.75" and to insert in lieu thereof "$352.93"; and on line 9, after the word "Department", to strike out the comma and the words down to and including the word "Germany", in line 3, page 2, so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Woodhouse Chain

Works the sum of $352.93 in full settlement for extra work for which the Government agreed to pay under supplemental contract to contract no. 448 with the Navy Department.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

KORBER REALTY, INC.

The bill (S. 1221) authorizing adjustment of the claim of Korber Realty, Inc., was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Comptroller General of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to adjust and settle the claim of Korber Realty, Inc., under lease no. VBr-806, dated April 28, 1931, on account of failure to restore to former condition quarters occupied during the period ended June 30, 1932, by the Albuquerque office of the Veterans' Administration, and to allow not to exceed $500 in full and final settlement of said claim. There is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $500, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for payment of the claim.

SCHUTTE & KOERTING CO.

The bill (S. 1085) authorizing adjustment of the claim of Schutte & Koerting Co. was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Comptroller General of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to adjust and settle the claim of Schutte & Koerting Co., under contract NOs-2018, dated December 27, 1926, for certain experimental work in the manufacture of valves for submarines, and to allow not to exceed $7,337.10 in full and final settlement of said claim. There is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $7,337.10, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for payment of said claim.

WALTER THOMAS FOREMAN

The bill (S. 1075) for the relief of Walter Thomas Foreman, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

LITTLE ROCK COLLEGE, LITTLE ROCK, ARK.

The bill (S. 1347) for the relief of Little Rock College, Little Rock, Ark., was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to reopen and allow credit in the property accounts of the Little Rock College, Little Rock, Ark., in the sum of $1,451.41, representing certain articles of ordnance, quartermaster, and engineer property for which the said Little Rock College is held liable on reports or surveys, as follows: Nos. 7, 8, 11, and 12, approved January 13, 1926, and no. 10, approved January 5, 1926.

M'KIMMON & M'KEE, INC.

The bill (S. 1081) for the relief of McKimmon & McKee, Inc., was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay to McKimmon & McKee, Inc., successor to the Raleigh Insurance & Realty Co., of Raleigh, N.C., out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $71.59 in full satisfaction of all claims for payment of premiums on policies of fire insurance written in 1918 by such Raleigh Insurance & Realty Co., covering certain goods of the value of $95,000, more or less, while in the process of being laundered for the United States Army by the Model Laundry, of Raleigh, N.C.

JAMES R. YOUNG

The bill (S. 1089) for the relief of James R. Young was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay to James R. Young, successor to the Union Trust Co., of Raleigh, N.C., out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $226.25 in full satisfaction of all claims for payment of premiums on policies of fire insurance written in 1918 by such Union Trust Co., covering certain goods of the value of $245,000, more or less, while in the process of being laundered for the United States Army by the Model Laundry, of Raleigh, N.C.

GREAT AMERICAN INDEMNITY CO. OF NEW YORK

The bill (S. 356) for the relief of the Great American Indemnity Co. of New York was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

E. WALTER EDWARDS

The bill (S. 1073) for the relief of E. Walter Edwards was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. WHITE subsequently said: Mr. President, may I call the attention of the Senator from Utah to Order of Business 211, Senate bill 1073, for the relief of E. Walter Edwards? I understood the Senator asked that the bill go over.

Mr. KING. I did.

Mr. WHITE. I merely desire to call attention to the fact that this measure is identical in fact and in principle with two other bills which we have just passed.

Mr. KING. I withdraw my objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay to E. Walter Edwards, successor to C. B. Edwards & Bro., of Raleigh, N.C., out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $106.30, in full satisfaction of all claims for payment of premium on a policy of fire insurance written in 1918 by C. B. Edwards and Bro., covering certain goods of the value of $127,000, more or less, while in the process of being laundered for the United States Army by the Model Laundry of Raleigh, N.C.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Arkansas whether the further call of the calendar cannot be suspended, so that Senators who have prepared addresses and have maps on the wall of the Senate may now proceed?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I understand that the Senate has about completed the call of the calendar under its order, and I think we had better proceed to the end of the calendar.

Mr. LEWIS. Very well.

MARY AGNES RODEN

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 375) to reimburse the estate of Mary Agnes Roden, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, on page 1, line 5, to strike out "$5,515.48" and to insert in lieu thereof "$5,000", so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $5,000 to Sophie T. Walsh, administratrix of the estate of her deceased sister, Mary Agnes Roden, in full settlement of all claims against the Government of the United States for injuries received by said Mary Agnes Roden on December 11, 1926, when a United States mail truck collided with her at Lexington Avenue and Thirty-fourth Street, New York City.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NANNIE SWEARINGEN

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1496) for the relief of Nannie Swearingen, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, on page 1, line 6, to strike out "$5,000" and to insert in lieu thereof "$50 per month in an amount not to exceed $5,000", so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated and in full settlement against the Government, the sum of $50 per month in an amount not to exceed $5,000 to Nannie Swearingen to compensate her for the death of her husband, who was struck by a Government-owned postal motor vehicle on November 26, 1926.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PATRICK HENRY WALSH

The bill (S. 170) for the relief of Patrick Henry Walsh was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay to Patrick Henry Walsh, of Weehawken, N.J., out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $3,000 in full satisfaction of all claims against the United States for damages on account of injuries resulting from being struck by a United States mail truck at Jersey City, N.J., on December 19, 1924.

AUXILIARY BARK "QUEVILLY"

A bill (S. 1934) conferring jurisdiction upon certain courts of the United States to hear and determine the claim by the owner of the 4-masted auxiliary bark Quevilly against the United States, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I notice that the alleged negligence in this case, if there was any, occurred nearly 20 years ago. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

STEAMSHIP "W. I. RADCLIFFE"

The bill (S. 1935) to amend the act of March 2, 1929, conferring jurisdiction upon certain courts of the United States to hear and determine the claim by the owner of the steamship W. I. Radcliffe against the United States, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I reserve the right to object. I ask for an explanation.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, this is a bill to authorize the owners of the steamship mentioned to go into court and undertake to establish their claim for injuries to the vessel. I think I am right in saying that a similar bill passed the Senate in the last session, but a mistake was made in the name of the ownership of the vessel, and this bill is introduced for the purpose of correctly stating the names of the owners of the vessel.

Mr. KING. When is it alleged that this collision occurred so as to warrant any judgment against the United States? I think it was away back in the time of the World War. There ought to be some statute of limitations. Some of these claims are hoary with age. Let it go over.

Mr. WHITE. Of course, if there is a statute of limitations, it will be pleaded in court.

Mr. KING. I do not want to revive it anyway.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under objection of the Senator from Utah, the bill will be passed over.

DELAWARE RIVER BRIDGE, NEW JERSEY

The bill (S. 2029) was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the time for completing the construction of the bridge authorized by act of Congress approved August 24, 1912, to be built by the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. and the Pennsylvania & Newark Railroad Co. across the Delaware River near the city of Trenton, N.J., which has heretofore been extended by Congress to August 24, 1934, is hereby extended for a further period of 3 years from the last-named date: Provided, That it shall not be lawful to complete or commence the completion of said bridge until plans thereof shall again be submitted to and approved by the Chief of Engineers and by the Secretary of War.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

TOLL BRIDGES IN THE STATE OF OREGON

The bill (S. 1985) relating to the amortization of the construction cost of certain toll bridges in the State of Oregon was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That so much of the act entitled "An act granting the consent of Congress to the State of Oregon to construct, maintain, and operate a toll bridge across the Umpqua River at or near Reedsport, Douglas County, Oreg.", approved June 13, 1933, the act entitled "An act granting the consent of Congress to the State of Oregon to construct, maintain, and operate a toll bridge across Yaquina Bay at or near Newport, Lincoln County, Oreg.", approved June 13, 1933, the act entitled "An act granting the consent of Congress to the State of Oregon to construct, maintain, and operate a toll bridge across Coos Bay at or near North Bend, Coos County, Oreg.", approved June 13, 1933, the act entitled "An act granting the consent of Congress to the State of Oregon to construct, maintain, and operate a toll bridge across the Siuslaw River at or near Florence, Lane County, Oreg.", approved June 13, 1933, and the act entitled "An act granting the consent of Congress to the State of Oregon to construct, maintain, and operate a toll bridge across Alsea Bay at or near Waldport, Lincoln County, Oreg.", approved June 15, 1933, as requires the amortization of the cost of the bridges and approaches therein authorized within a period of not to exceed 15 years from the completion thereof, is hereby repealed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That completes the calendar.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its clerks, announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 6670) to provide for the establishment of a corporation to aid in the refinancing of farm debts, and for other purposes, requested a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. JONES, Mr. FULMER, Mr. DOXEY, Mr. HOPE, and Mr. KINZER were appointed managers on the part of the House at the conference.

REFINANCING OF FARM DEBTS

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 6670) to provide for the establishment of a corporation to aid in the refinancing of farm debts, and for other purposes, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, agree to the conference requested by the House, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. FLETCHER, Mr. GLASS, Mr. WAGNER, Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH, and Mr. TOWNSEND conferees on the part of the Senate.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business for the consideration of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Deep Waterway Treaty.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

GREAT LAKES-ST. LAWRENCE DEEP WATERWAY TREATY

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the treaty between the United States and the Dominion of Canada for the completion of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence deep waterway, signed July 18, 1932.

Mr. COPELAND obtained the floor.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

Mr. COPELAND. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. I recognize the importance of the subject, and would suggest the desirability of a call of the roll for the purpose of bringing Senators into the Chamber. I am unable for the time being to remain, however; and with the permission of the Senator from New York I should like to request that following his remarks an editorial published in the Baltimore Sun of January 22, 1934, and a letter dealing with the St. Lawrence waterway from H. M. Stratton, President, Donahue-Stratton Co., Milwaukee, Wis., addressed to me, be printed in the RECORD in connection with the debate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(The editorial and letter appear in the RECORD at the conclusion of Mr. COPELAND'S remarks.)

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I thank the Senator for suggesting a call of the Senate, but I think that is unnecessary. I know how busy the Senators are and how heavy the mail of their offices is, and I do not wish to call into the Chamber any Senators who are worthily occupied away from here.

I wish to speak about the controverted question of the St. Lawrence waterway as calmly as possible. I recognize that there are two sides to the question, and certainly every Senator has a right to take any position which his judgment causes him to assume.

I have long been an opponent of the proposed waterway, and, of course, what I shall have to say will be in opposition to the treaty.

If any argument in favor of the St. Lawrence deep waterway caused me momentarily to question the convictions I reached 25 years ago, I should take another glance at the map. That would give proof sufficient to me that no American should favor the project.

Even though Senators have other duties, I ask them to remain in the Chamber long enough to enable me to point out on the map of a portion of North America some of the things which enter into the consideration of this question.

We have here an excellent map of the United States and a part of Canada. I want Senators to see that after Lake Ontario discharges its waters into the St. Lawrence the river touches only 166 miles of our country.

I was born in the Great Lakes region. I spent the first 40 years of my life there. I have known many Canadians and loved them. Certainly there is no feeling of harshness or unfriendliness that could lead me to take the position that I do.

The waters of Lake Ontario are projected into the St. Lawrence River, and almost immediately we come to the Thousand Islands. These were described by a Canadian poet, who said:

> When the angels took Eden on high,
> Some flowers fell from the garden divine;
> Dropping into the great river,
> They became the Thousand Islands.

So here they are in all their beauty.

Just below the Thousand Islands we come to the international section of the waterway; and this is, in my section of the country, the hotly debated part of the whole project.

After 166 miles forming the boundary between the United States and Canada, where New York has equal riparian rights with Ontario, or the United States equal rights with Canada, the St. Lawrence River appears to desire to run away from Yankeeland. I wish Senators to see on the map that no part of the St. Lawrence River is within our boundaries, no part of it is within our country, and only for 1½ percent of its entire length does it border upon our country. Ninety-eight and one-half percent of the St. Lawrence will be found entirely within the Dominion of Canada. I am anxious to have the Senate appreciate that fact. I am anxious, too, to have Senators observe that the green line on the map, the boundary of our country, is in no way whatever related, except in this 1½ percent of its length, to the St. Lawrence River. The St. Lawrence is entirely outside our territory, except the limited section of the river touching the State of New York.

Another thing I wish Senators to observe is that the St. Lawrence River, running north and east, going away from the United States all the time, has a length of 1,185 miles to the Straits of Belle Isle, where the waters of the river enter the Atlantic Ocean. For only 166 miles of that distance are the waters of that river in contact with our country.

I will ask Senators also to observe that the point where the waters of the St. Lawrence enter the Atlantic Ocean is 1,000 miles east of Lake Ontario and 700 miles north of the boundary of the United States at the point of the river's source. The river goes as far north as Hudson Bay, which in my youth I thought was close to the North Pole.

I beg Senators to bear these facts in mind when they consider the expenditure of American money in the development of a waterway which is essentially a Canadian waterway. I have often referred to it as an all-British waterway.

I now wish to speak about distances, and while doing so will get away from the map.

If one were to go by this waterway from Lake Ontario to Portland, Maine, or Boston, his craft must sail 1,200 miles. By the shortest way, through the Gulf of St. Lawrence and north of Nova Scotia, it is 1,500 miles to New York Harbor. Two or three hundred miles additional must be included if the craft is to reach Philadelphia or Norfolk, while Savannah is more than 2,000 miles away from the Great Lakes.

I need not point out to the Senate that when there is such a steaming distance as that, with the cost of coal to consider, and the element of time to consider, it makes an almost impossible waterway so far as the Atlantic seaboard is concerned.

At this time I am not going to say more about that feature of the proposal, but perhaps a little later I may do so. I wish, however, if I may, to show by this map how far we are going afield when we talk about building a waterway, largely with American money, to carry traffic from the Great Lakes to the sea.

In order that I may get away from the map, I want to speak about another waterway, the New York Barge Canal. I am not going to press the matter; I, myself, have no enthusiasm for any deep waterway to the sea; but I want to take advantage of the opportunity of having the map before us. That will show Senators that proposed route from the Great Lakes to the Atlantic seaboard would require 1,500 miles' travel; this is in contrast to a route through the barge canal down the Hudson River to New York, a distance of 325 miles, of which distance 125 miles, the portion on the Hudson River, has already been deepened at Federal expense to carry ocean-going vessels. There is at Albany today a terminal which is being extensively used by vessels from the other side as well as by our own bottoms going to Albany, or sailing from Albany by way of the Hudson River. So we have to contrast a route from Canada through Canadian territory, 1,500 miles from New York, with a route which would be all-American, which would go through our own territory the short distance of 325 miles.

I may leave the map for a moment, but I hope Senators will never have obliterated from their memories the picture on the map, because, to my mind, a glimpse at the map is conclusive reason why we should be against this proposed waterway.

Mark the difference, if I may repeat, in distance between Lake Ontario and the ocean between the two routes. From Lake Ontario to Albany is 164 miles, and from Albany by the Hudson River, already dredged to carry ocean freighters, to the ocean is a distance of 150 miles, or a total of 314 miles. When a cargo is taken to Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Norfolk, or Baltimore, the distance is hundreds of miles less than by the all-British route.

The advocates of the Canadian plan place great emphasis upon the idea that it is much nearer by way of the St. Lawrence and the Great Lakes to Liverpool, where wheat would go, than it is by the all-American canal. It is stated, for instance, that the distance between Montreal and Liverpool is 2,760 miles, but that route is through the Straits of Belle Isle, north of Newfoundland, between Newfoundland and Labrador, and it cannot be used even during a considerable portion of the so-called "open" season; even when the lower part of the river is open it is impossible to go through the Straits of Belle Isle, for reasons which I shall attempt to demonstrate to the Senate.

The distance from Montreal to Liverpool, when the route taken is to the south of Newfoundland, is 3,007 miles. This route will have to be taken through a large part even of the open season. When a vessel goes down the river below Anticosta Island it must pass through the Gulf of St. Lawrence south of Newfoundland; it is not possible through a large part of even the open season, if I may repeat, to go through the Straits of Belle Isle. So the usual distance from Montreal to Liverpool is 3,007 miles, which is approximately the same distance as between New York and Liverpool, which is 3,166 miles. To put it in a word, the St. Lawrence route is 159 miles shorter than the all-American route; that is all. The Straits of Belle Isle are far removed from the United States and all our ports.

There is no United States port after leaving Massena, N.Y., where the Mellon aluminum works are located. There is nothing to appeal to American commerce all the way from Lake Ontario to the shores of Europe.

Let me call attention to the fact, too, that the time consumed between Duluth and New York City by the St. Lawrence route would be 12 days, as contrasted with 7½ days over the all-American route.

If the Barge Canal, which Congress has already voted to take over, should be deepened sufficiently to take ocean vessels, which can now go to Albany, the trip could be taken in 7½ days. A ship sailing out of Lake Ontario would require to go around through the Gulf of St. Lawrence to New York 12 days. Through the Barge Canal to Albany down to New York there would be a saving of 4½ days. Anyone familiar with vessel transportation realizes how much greater is the expense involved where 12 days of sailing are necessary instead of 7½ days.

By the St. Lawrence it would take 4 days longer for a cargo from Duluth to go to the Panama Canal than by the New York route; it would take 4 days longer to go to Seattle, and practically the same time to go to Gibraltar.

Regarding this project, there will always be two schools of thought. The St. Lawrence route is held in high favor in the West, but many thinking Americans feel that if the money of the United States is actually to be expended in canal building it should be spent wholly within the borders of our country. The American plan would involve an initial expenditure of more money; but as I have already pointed out, it would be hundreds of miles shorter, and consequently the service rendered by it to shipping would be very much greater.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HATCH in the chair). Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. Appreciating the fact that there may be a variance in any estimates, can the Senator give us an idea as to the probable difference in cost between the all-American route he has just been describing and the proposed St. Lawrence seaway?

Mr. COPELAND. I would say that, at the outside, the difference would not exceed $150,000,000.

Mr. CLARK. And that would all be spent in the United States in the employment of American labor and the purchase of American materials?

Mr. COPELAND. Yes; and would be for the relief of unemployment in America instead of for the relief of unemployment in Canada.

Mr. President, the American plan would cost a little more money, but the man is not born who knows how much the St. Lawrence plan will cost. I wish the Senate could see, as I did, a moving picture of the St. Lawrence River in the springtime at the break-up of the ice. I have the greatest respect in the world for engineers; to me they are the supermen, amazing men; I almost stand in awe of what engineers can do. But when I saw in that picture the great bergs of ice crashing through the waterway, breaking up ice of lesser thickness, I wondered how it would ever be possible for engineers, with all their skill and genius, to build controlling works to make possible the effective navigation of the St. Lawrence River.

As I have previously said, the all-American route would be very, very much shorter, and consequently navigation would be that much more expeditious. The all-American route would be open for a slightly longer season. If Senators know the climate of Quebec, if they have ever been to Quebec in attendance upon one of the ice carnivals, they know how tightly the waterways are tied up during the winter season.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Is it not true that in view of the weather in the neighborhood of the proposed canal and the innumerable slides that have occurred there from time to time, in the opinion of the Senator it would be extremely difficult to arrive at a figure of cost of the canal within several million dollars?

Mr. COPELAND. I truly think so. I think it would be extremely difficult.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I should like to state for the information of the Senator that I have in mind the construction of the Panama Canal. When our Government made purchase of the Panama Canal, at which time I believe we paid the French Government $40,000,000 and at which time we paid for the Panama Railroad an amount approximating $10,000,000, it was estimated that completion of the Panama Canal according to the plans contemplated at that particular time would cost $139,000,000. Of course, I understand that several years thereafter, at which time General Goethals went there at the instance of the Government, he made an extremely accurate estimate of the cost of the canal, which was $375,000,000, and it actually did cost about $3,000,000 less than that, and he completed it, according to my information from the War Department, 1 year sooner than its contemplated completion.

But I bring to the attention of the Senator at this time that immediately after or about the same time our Government made purchase of the Panama Canal, it was then estimated that the completion would cost only $139,000,000.

Mr. COPELAND. That is correct. The able Senator is entirely correct in his figures as I understand it.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. COPELAND. Certainly.

Mr. PITTMAN. It has been reported by the Army engineers two or three times that the plans upon which the first estimates were made were not nearly as extensive as the plans upon which the second estimates were made and that therefore there was no relation whatever between the estimate of $139,000,000 and the estimate of $375,000,000, because our Government between the time of the estimates had decided, according to the Army engineers, to adopt a very much larger and more extensive plan. Be that as it may, undoubtedly the estimates of the last board of engineers were very accurate.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I quite agree with the Senator that the last estimates made were entirely accurate, but at the same time I should like to make inquiry of the able Senator from New York if it is not true that even after the ratification it would be possible to make certain changes that would increase the cost estimated at the present time? I think that one thing further to be taken into consideration is the fact that materials to be used may increase in cost. It has been said that the engineers who have figured on the various and sundry projects have not missed the point far, but at the same time we must take into consideration that the price of materials may change and the price of labor may change.

I beg the Senator's pardon for having interrupted him at such length.

Mr. COPELAND. I thank the Senator from North Carolina. He has added value to the argument. I had not intended to discuss at all the question of cost. I am familiar with certain figures, namely, those with reference to the Welland Canal, which was originally estimated at $40,000,000 and actually cost $128,000,000; the Manchester Ship Canal, which I have seen and admired, the original estimate of which was $40,000,000, while its ultimate cost was $80,000,000. The original estimate of cost of the Panama Canal was $140,000,000, and the ultimate cost proved to be $375,000,000. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] has suggested, that was because conditions which were met as the work progressed made those increases necessary, but I assume we would have to take into consideration that that might well happen in connection with the canal now under consideration.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. COPELAND. Certainly.

Mr. PITTMAN. I do not like to have the Senator misunderstand me or, if he does misunderstand me, to unconsciously misinterpret what I said. I did not say it was by reason of additions to or changes in the plans. I said the estimate of $139,000,000 was based on one plan and that the estimate of $375,000,000 was based on an entirely different plan, a more extensive plan and completed plan. The $375,000,000 estimate was an accurate estimate and the actual cost came within that figure. I do not want it understood that it was because they kept making additions and changes that the cost increased.

Mr. COPELAND. Far be it from me to dissent from the facts. I have but one thought, and that is to attempt to have Senators see the general proposition as I see it, and to do that fairly and certainly not by distorting the language or expressed thoughts of others. But no man who ever built anything, I do not care whether it was a house or a boat or what it might be, has failed to find that it cost him more than was estimated in the beginning.

I know that in the construction of the Barge Canal through the State of New York the original estimate was $62,000,000 and it cost the State $176,000,000. I am not speaking about the original Erie Canal, but the widening and deepening of the canal in recent years. It cost nearly three times as much as the original estimate.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. I know the Senator does not desire to digress to a discussion of the question of cost because it is not included within the scope of his original address; but I should like to ask the Senator if he does not think the devaluation of the dollar must be taken into consideration in arriving at the estimate of cost? In order words, the engineers who made the estimates were not taking that into consideration at all, were they?

Mr. COPELAND. I think it is entirely proper for the Senator to make the suggestion. Therefore if we do not raise the original estimates we have to multiply them by two in order to meet the devaluated dollar.

I want to make more complete answer to a question asked a few moments ago by the Senator from Missouri. Other estimates have been made about the cost of the canal. I am not going to refer to Mr. Cooper's estimate. We have heard a lot about that. The general board of engineers placed it at $543,000,000; Dr. Moulton at $999,000,000; Mr. Cooper, since we have mentioned him, at $1,350,000,000. Mr. E. P. Goodrich, the consulting engineer, whom I happen to know, a man of great ability and the highest integrity—I would trust him as I would trust my family doctor and have confidence in his professional conclusions—has said that the St. Lawrence waterway will cost $1,054,000,000. As I have said, however, I had not thought to go into that phase of the question.

I was speaking about the American canal, which would involve a little more initial expenditure of money; and I think an estimate made on that particular enterprise—so short and with engineering conditions so common in engineering experience—would be very accurate. It may well be that the initial cost of the New York canal would be no more than the cost of the St. Lawrence waterway; but, at any rate, it would be hundreds of miles shorter. It would be open for a longer season. As between the canal in New York State and the St. Lawrence Canal, the difference in the season would be at least 3 weeks in favor of the former. I am saying that to the Senator from Washington, because he asked me the question, and that is the conclusion reached from such figures as I have been able to find.

For the purpose of the national defense the New York route would be of greater service to the Nation. The all-American route coincides with the present lines of railroad travel and leads to the same terminals on the seacoast. Such a canal development, it is thought, would be less disturbing to commerce and trade during the part of the year when either water route would be closed by ice.

A great many surveys have been made by the Federal Government, the New York State authorities, the Canadian Government, and recently by an International Joint Commission. The result of these surveys is that we have at our command a mass of scientific and statistical material.

With this before him it is possible for any citizen to master the problems involved and to form for himself a conclusion as to which route is preferable. Both are considered feasible from an engineering standpoint. There never has been any question of that on the part of any of the engineers who have investigated. Each has its particular advantages. Each has its engineering and scientific backers. It may be said in all truth that a given citizen may form his own conclusion and, no matter what it may be, find himself in company with thousands of distinguished citizens who take a like view. Unfortunately, he will find himself in opposition to other thousands of equally distinguished citizens who are just as insistent that the other route is preferable.

ICE AND FOG ON THE ST. LAWRENCE

Whichever way is determined upon, the most we can expect of such a canal is that it shall be serviceable for not to exceed 8 months of the year. In 50 years the latest the St. Lawrence was open for navigation was the 14th of December. Three times only was it open past the 8th of December. Usually it closes about the 20th of November.

During the same period the earliest date it ever opened was the 29th of March. One year it opened on the 3d of April. Usually it opens about the 20th of April and occasionally as late as the 1st of May. One year it was the 7th of May. As a matter of fact, then, the St. Lawrence can be depended on for only a little more than 7 months of the year.

It is not alone, however, the absence of ice in the river itself that insures safety of navigation between the Great Lakes and the sea. I speak from actual observation, having crossed the ocean twice between Montreal and Liverpool.

I well recall a certain Sunday morning in July 1896. The reason why I remember the month and the year is that when we got to Quebec newspapers were brought out to the boat, and they said that William Jennings Bryan had been nominated by the Democrats for the Presidency. I was the only person on the ship who had ever heard of him before, and that was merely by accident.

The ship I was upon was the first one that season to attempt the passage of the Straits of Belle Isle. You see, every ship before July went south of Newfoundland; so our ship was the first one that year to go through the Straits of Belle Isle. In spite of the fact that navigation opened on the 24th of April, there was so much ice and so much fog in the Gulf of St. Lawrence and off the Straits of Belle Isle that it had not been deemed safe to take the northern route until our ship attempted the passage.

Did you ever see a fog in those northern waters? A fog bank is just as real as a snow bank, and when the bow of the boat runs into it, it is cut off from view as if it had run into a huge drift of snow.

Well, finally, after several days of fog and ice, because we had to feel our way through the Gulf of St. Lawrence, we reached the Straits of Belle Isle. As we entered the Atlantic, my steward called me at daybreak. He said there was an iceberg in sight and that I had better get up and see it, because another one might not be sighted on the trip. As a matter of fact, we saw 75 icebergs during that day and the next.

If you know anything about an iceberg, with nine elevenths of its bulk under water, and nobody knows how it may project under the water from its sides, and you have fog, you know very well that you are not going to make any time on your steamship. As a matter of fact, the temperature of the water was being taken every few minutes, in order to determine whether or not we were approaching ice, because it was so foggy that we could not see the icebergs.

No candid person conversant with the physical conditions of the lower St. Lawrence, and of that route to the sea, can fail to acknowledge that through a greater part of the year there is not uninterrupted passage between Montreal and the open ocean. I speak of this in no spirit of disparagement, but simply to bring to mind the embarrassments and dangers of this particular route, as compared with another one equally available which is not burdened by these objections.

EXPORT TRADE

The most ardent advocates of the St. Lawrence route are the wheat producers of the Northwest. If the proposed canal were to be used exclusively for the exportation of wheat and flour, I should frankly admit that the St. Lawrence route is superior to the all-American.

If the waterway from the Great Lakes to the sea were to be used exclusively for the carriage to Liverpool in cargo lots of automobiles, furniture, or stoves from Detroit or other western ports, I should say that the St. Lawrence route is preferable. For any cargo that is to be taken in bulk from any one port on the Great Lakes directly to Liverpool, I should admit at once the superiority of the St. Lawrence route.

If there could be profitable operation of a one-way service between the Great Lakes and Liverpool, the St. Lawrence would hold first place. Unfortunately for the advocates of the St. Lawrence route, water traffic cannot succeed on a one-way basis. Unfortunately for the St. Lawrence route, water traffic to and from the Great Lakes is not confined to bulk cargoes or to export trade. A very large percentage, probably in excess of 75 percent of the traffic between the Great Lakes and tidewater, is sure to be of package freight for domestic distribution.

WHEAT EXPORTATION

I was born on a farm. All my early life I spent in a home dependent on wheat. My nearest relatives today are farmers, raising more or less wheat for which they get more or less money—mostly less. My father was in the milling and grain business. Certainly I cannot be accused of any lack of interest in the wheat farmer. If I believed the St. Lawrence waterway would lighten the burden of the American wheat grower, I would be for it, no matter what the New York Chamber of Commerce, frequently referred to in this debate, might think about my stand.

May I say in passing that I had conviction on this subject long before I lived in New York and doubtless before I ever knew there was such a body as the New York Chamber of Commerce. My sense of fairness and personal acquaintance with many members of that great institution, however, give me a greater degree of respect for the chamber than apparently held by some Members of the Senate. Certainly I am not aware that the New York organization has been at all offensive in the statement regarding the St. Lawrence project. I speak of this because reference has been made on repeated occasions to the New York Chamber of Commerce as if it were the great beast back of this opposition to the canal. I have not had that particular pressure brought to bear upon me, but sometimes I am overlooked by New Yorkers.

For myself, I think it would be better if we settled the issue upon its merits without undue excitement over what its proponents or opponents may attempt by use of propaganda.

A discussion of a waterway to the sea would amount to nothing unless its possible relationship to wheat exportation were given particular attention. This I shall attempt to discuss briefly.

The American wheat farmer is confident that the St. Lawrence Canal will benefit him materially. He has dreams of cheap freight rates and greater revenue in consequence.

It must be admitted that every dollar saved on freight charges is a dollar made for the farmer. He will benefit directly by economies of this sort. This is true of export trade, as it is of domestic. This I shall concede, of course.

The exigencies of the World War created an unheard-of demand for American wheat. For the 4 or 5 years before the war the exports from the United States averaged about 100,000,000 bushels annually. In 1915 there was a jump to 335,000,000.

The war interfered with European—particularly Russian—production, a condition continuing till the end of 1923. Since that time there has been gradual improvement in foreign wheat crops. In consequence, by 1925 our exports fell to 108,000,000 bushels, including flour converted into terms of bushels of wheat. It was better than this in 1926 and 1927, but has now declined to about 135,000,000.

AMERICAN WHEAT A DECLINING CROP

But this does not tell the whole story. A study of Canadian wheat prospects as against American is most illuminating.

In 1910 Canada planted 8,000,000 acres with wheat and exported 56,000,000 bushels. By 1928 she planted 25,000,000 acres and exported 422,000,000 bushels. In 1931 she exported 50 percent more wheat than the United States. She is rapidly outstripping us in wheat growing and exportation. The Dominion has 80,000,000 acres of the best wheat land on earth ready for wheat when there is a demand for it. She now has 27,000,000 acres of wheat against our 55,000,000. In spite of our increase in population, there has been a steady decline in our acreage of wheat, while at the same time there has been a trebling of the production of wheat and the number of acres in wheat in Canada. With cheaper lands and labor and greater productivity in Canada, we are in real danger.

Contrast the figures I have given with conditions in the United States. In 1910 we had 45,000,000 acres in wheat, jumped to 75,000,000 in the one year, 1919, and have settled back year by year, until at present we have only about 55,000,000 in wheat acreage.

In short, our increase in wheat production is practically nil, in spite of the great increase in population, while Canada has trebled her acreage and products in less than 20 years. That progressive nation will continue to increase her acreage and exports of wheat.

To me the logic of the situation is irresistible: Within a very short time the United States will disappear as a wheat exporter. Because blood is thicker than water and because of materially lower prices of production, Great Britain will prefer to import Canadian wheat and eventually the Liverpool market will be lost to us.

My nature is such that I would rather a thousand times preach the gospel of hope than that of despair. But, after all, it is sensible to meet issues as they are, and not play the ostrich by shutting eyes to the truth.

With the increasing production of wheat in Russia, the Argentine, and Australia, as well as in Canada, how can we hope to maintain our former position as an exporter of wheat? Long before the St. Lawrence project could be finished we would find other uses for our land and for the wheat we produce. Australia has doubled her production in 10 years, South America is increasing rapidly, and nobody knows what Russia may produce. The domestic market must be depended on for the absorption of our wheat crop.

May I say in this connection that we have neglected the domestic market? Within a few years our domestic consumption of wheat and wheat products has decreased 120,000,000 bushels, and is declining at the rate of six or seven millions annually.

I regret this, because, as a physician, I am interested in preserving and bettering the public health. Regardless of what current statistics may show as to the sickness and death rates, there can be no doubt that the underfeeding, or improper feeding, particularly of the children, must result disastrously. The next generation will suffer for the deprivations of this period. Nothing could give greater guaranty of good health and long life than a material increase in the consumption of bread and milk.

You may think this statement has little to do with the St. Lawrence Canal. But, after all, it is closely related to it. If our people were properly fed, there would be no wheat to export, and then we would not worry over the treaty.

In what to me is always a fascinating volume, the "Yearbook of Agriculture", are some interesting plates. I want Senators to look at these plates, in order to see the shifting of wheat acreage.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. REYNOLDS. The Senator just spoke of a very interesting part of the subject which he has under discussion in regard to wheat. I might state to the Senator, for his information, that I have been informed that Australia alone is thoroughly capable of growing a sufficient amount of wheat to supply adequately the needs of every country of continental Europe. I might state, further, that although Russia for the past several years has had occasion to import several million bushels of wheat—in 1930 I think the importations amounted to something like 25 or 30 million bushels—Russia being in area twice the proportions of the United States, it has been estimated by reliable people familiar with the subject that if they were to cultivate all the land that is peculiarly adapted for the raising of wheat, that one country alone would be able to supply the needs of the entire world. I am in hearty accord with the Senator when he says that the time will come when we will not be a wheat-growing country, that our lands will be utilized in other directions.

I can very well see, I might say to the distinguished and able Senator from the State of New York, that the people of Canada are vitally interested in seeing this waterway completed, because Canada at present is the wheat-growing country of the world, and it is quite natural for us to feel and to know as a matter of fact, that the Canadian people are desirous of this waterway being completed in order that they may be provided with better facilities for making exportations of their grain.

Mr. COPELAND. I agree with the Senator, and directly I shall show that this St. Lawrence project is of tremendous importance to the wheat growers of Canada—of Saskatchewan, Alberta, and Manitoba. It will be valuable to them because they will have advantages which our farmers do not have, by reason of the lower railroad rate which they enjoy, and which I will discuss in a moment.

I wish now to refer to the Agricultural Yearbook. On pages 141, 142, and 143 of the 1933 issue are maps showing the distribution of wheat acreage in the years 1869, 1889, 1899, 1909, and 1929.

I give these references so that readers of the RECORD, who may, perhaps, be interested, may refer to this handbook, which is a public document and available to any citizen.

The maps on the wall show the distribution of wheat acreage in the United States, and since this waterway is to be a Canadian waterway, it is right that we should glance at the maps a moment.

The great sections here on the map [indicating], Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and Alberta, are the great productive wheatlands of the world, I may say. There is acreage there sufficient to do exactly what the Senator from North Carolina suggested—to raise enough wheat to supply the whole world, if they want to, because in addition to the 27,000,000 acres under cultivation there are 80,000,000 more acres of the richest wheatlands in the world lying in those Provinces of Canada.

It is certainly remarkable how the areas of wheat production have shifted during a period of 60 years. The bulk of wheat available for export is now produced in an area incapable of benefit by any waterway from the Great Lakes to the sea.

I wish every wheat farmer in America had a copy of this Government publication and could see for himself what is happening to the industry. Let me quote from page 143 of this report:

> The hard winter wheat region had expanded still more by 1929 when it constituted the most important wheat-growing region of the United States, and produced the great bulk of wheat available for export.

The figures show that in 1930, out of a total production in the United States of 524,000,000 bushels, 56 percent of the whole, or 293,000,000 bushels, came from the soil of Nebraska, Kansas, Oklahoma, and Texas. Surely, with the Missouri and Mississippi Rivers and the Gulf, these States cannot be very enthusiastic over a waterway to the Atlantic. With greater interest than any other section, because it raises the exportable wheat, this area must look south and not east. Manitoba, Alberta, and Saskatchewan, in Canada, have far more at stake in the St. Lawrence waterway than any wheat-growing section of the United States. Consequently, they have far more interest in the St. Lawrence project than has any wheat section in the United States.

I am often surprised at the enthusiasm over the recognition of Russia, when I think that all Russia need do is to consider the meager cost of feeding the labor, with no thought whatever of what they shall pay labor. They can sell wheat in Liverpool at 20 cents or 10 cents a bushel above the cost of production and yet undersell by 50 percent any other country in the world. But all of us living in the Western Hemisphere and interested in wheat exportation have reason to shudder over what Russia, with its soil, climate, and serf labor, will do in supplying wheat for the world.

Certainly that country can give Europe its full supply. It is only because of blood relationship that the colonies of Britain will suffer less than we do.

FREIGHT RATES ON WHEAT

May I return now to discuss the freight rates and to consider briefly the relative advantages of the St. Lawrence project to Canada and the United States. Comparison of freight costs and facilities may be interesting.

Duluth in our country and Fort William in Canada are the extreme western lake ports through which wheat is shipped for domestic consumption in the home country or for export to Europe. The rates by water from these two cities to the Atlantic seaboard are approximately the same.

Whether a canal is built or not, then, Americans and Canadians are on the same basis so far as water transportation is concerned. But they are not on the same competitive basis when we consider the rail rates from points of production to the lake-head.

There is little difference between the rates from the Dakotas to Duluth, but Montana and other points farther west are at a considerable disadvantage. For example, the rate from Butte, Mont., is 44½ cents per hundred, while it is only 26 cents from Alberta and Saskatchewan points. This gives the Canadian shipper an advantage of about 18 cents a hundred, or about 11 cents per bushel.

In addition, the Canadians have the benefit of the differential rate afforded her colonies by Great Britain.

What do these figures prove? They show conclusively that the St. Lawrence waterway will not better the prospects of the American wheat farmer. He will continue to be on the present basis of competition with his neighbors across the line. As the Canadians increase their acreage, the cheaper rail rates in Canada, to a considerable extent, and the sentimental tie between England and her colony, to a greater extent, will cause Canadian exports of wheat to increase still more while ours continue steadily to decline.

There is no hope, as I see it, that the digging of a canal to the sea will help the American farmer to dispose of his wheat. There is one advantage, however, although it must be shared with the Canadian wheat exporter. I refer to the possibility of loading a ship at the lake-head and sending it directly to Liverpool. This will save the "fobbing" charges—elevator service, storage, brokerage, insurance, and so forth—at Buffalo and New York, or in Montreal, as the case may be. Perhaps a few cents a bushel might be saved in this way. This amount, added to the saving by water transportation over all rail or part rail to New York, might amount in normal times to 4 or 5 cents a bushel. But I seriously doubt it because of my conviction that the St. Lawrence Canal would be so essentially a one-way route that the present rates could not be materially reduced.

In calling attention to the better freight rates over the Canadian National Railways, which are operated by the Government, it is proper to refer to the losses incurred in the operation of these lines. This deficit averages about $60,000,000 per year.

The wheat farmers get the benefit of lower rates, fixed in the charter of the National Railways at 26 cents a hundredweight, but the National Railways carrying the wheat are operated at a loss of $60,000,000, made up by general taxation in Canada.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. REYNOLDS. With particular reference to what the Senator from New York has just said, I wish to say I am under the impression that our Government has loaned the railroads of this country about 3,000 million dollars. I will ask the Senator if that is the correct amount.

Mr. COPELAND. I do not know the exact amount. I will say it is a lot of money.

Mr. REYNOLDS. About $3,000,000,000. It strikes me that by providing competition for those railroads, in which our Government is financially interested, we are thereby tending to prevent our Government from collecting the principal or the interest upon that enormous loan.

Mr. COPELAND. This diversion causes me to say that if we really want to give employment to American labor by some such project as we are proposing, and to provide more shipping facilities that can be used throughout the year, we had better take the money and build three freight railroads between Boston and Chicago, which could be done for less money than the proposed canal would cost.

As I said a moment ago, the loss of the National Railroads of Canada is about $60,000,000 per year. Were the proper proportion of this loss added to the rates on wheat, there would be less advantage to the Canadian shipper.

But no matter how it is figured, the fact remains that no waterway to the sea can possibly overcome the growing menace of Canadian competition in wheat exportation and the effect of the shifting wheat production in our country. As it is to assist the marketing of this commodity, particularly, that America has an interest in the waterway, we should face the facts as they are. To do so now will save heartburnings in the future.

THE ST. LAWRENCE A ONE-WAY ROUTE

I view the St. Lawrence route as one bound to be limited in its uses almost exclusively to eastbound traffic. Its value to Americans is confined to the advantage it offers in the exportation of bulk cargoes from the Great Lakes. If there is enough wheat to fill a ship, or if one port should have enough automobiles or any other product, to complete a cargo for Liverpool, it would go somewhat quicker, if not more cheaply, than by the American route. But that is all that can be said for the St. Lawrence waterway. For the shipping of domestic freight to or from the West, the Canadian project has almost no value to America.

One has but to study the Montreal traffic situation to see how valueless the St. Lawrence is to the American merchant receiving goods from the East.

We do not have to imagine it. There is a waterway there now in actual operation. Barges go back and forth through the canals of the St. Lawrence. So we do not have to resort to imagination. We can make use of figures of a waterway actually in use.

In a recent year, of the lake carriers arriving in Montreal with grain, coal, and flour, no less than 2,670 returned westward without cargoes. There was absolutely nothing for them to take west. These are the official figures obtained from the Lachine Canal office, Montreal.

The boats in question came down from the Great Lakes carrying cargoes and went back empty, just exactly as vessels would do if the proposed waterway is built. They will go from the Great Lakes, down the St. Lawrence River and over to Europe, and will come back empty, or else carry cargoes we do not want, brought into competition in shipload lots with American production.

There need be no expectation of better conditions merely as a result of deepening and widening canals which are already in existence.

To my mind, it is absurd to think the St. Lawrence route would profit the Great Lakes ports, or the great western population of our country. A one-way water system could never pay, and this route could never be anything but a one-way system. What is produced in Europe that the Midwest wants in ship-cargo lots? Regardless of the doubtful advantages to the decreasing exportation of wheat, what else is there to expect from a through line to Europe, entering the sea a thousand miles from our own eastern and southern Atlantic seaboard?

The American railways carrying freight to and from tidewater are handling goods for domestic consumption. If I am correctly advised, 85 percent of all the traffic is of this type.

If this is true, the only kind of a waterway that will benefit the great masses of American shippers is one which will cheapen or facilitate the carriage of freight for domestic consumption. There is but one route to serve this purpose. It is the one which coincides with present-day railway development.

There are several reasons for this statement. In the first place, any waterway from the Great Lakes to the sea will be open, at best, but 8 months in the year. During the other 4 months, and usually nearly 5 months, the railways must be depended on as they are at present.

This being true, is it not wise to parallel the railway lines as nearly as possible? Then the same terminals at tidewater, the same brokers, the same bankers, the same offices, can be used the year round. There can be no doubt, it seems to me, that satisfactory trade arrangements can be made best by such a plan, if we are to engage in such an enterprise at all.

As a nation we have determined upon the Illinois-Ohio-Missouri-Mississippi waterway. With a policy of internal canals already established, it is illogical to go beyond our borders with another route to the sea.

I can see the reason for the Mississippi and Missouri developments through the heart of our country, but contrast those developments, Mr. President, with a waterway which leaves immediately the boundary of our country and runs a thousand miles east and seven hundred miles north of the United States at the source of the river. I cannot understand how it is possible for anyone, after even a glimpse at the map, to favor the St. Lawrence waterway.

LABOR AND THE CANAL

Is it not well to suggest, too, that it is pretty venturesome in a time like this to impose on the railroads the competition of the seaway? As the Senator from North Carolina has just suggested, they owe us $3,000,000,000. How are they ever going to pay if they are to be still further embarrassed? How will they ever repay the billions they owe our country?

Shipping from over all the world might be attracted by the novelty of fresh-water navigation, but I doubt it. Salt-water sailors, you know, Mr. President, are not fond of fresh water. To attempt to take a sea-going vessel into the Great Lakes would frighten the average deep-water sailor so that he would have to be put on double rations for the rest of the voyage.

Nobody has studied the economic possibilities sufficiently to know with reasonable certainty what might happen if the St. Lawrence waterway should be opened. One of the protests we have made in New York against this project has been that no economic survey has been made. I was told on the floor of the Senate last year, when I called attention to this, "Oh, yes, an economic survey was made on the last day of the hearings." So I took the hearings and I found that on February 10, 1933, the last hearing was held, at which the "economic survey" was presented to members of the Senate committee.

The subcommittee met, pursuant to the call of the chairman, at 11 a.m.

"At 11 a.m."; and I find at the end the words—

Whereupon, at 11:50 a.m., the hearing was closed and the committee went into executive session.

Therefore, for a period of 50 minutes the economic survey was presented, presumably. As a matter of fact, no Member of the Chamber, in my opinion, has yet thoroughly studied the economic conditions and possibilities associated with the building of this proposed canal.

If the waterway proved to be popular there would be such an upset in railroad traffic as to drive thousands of workers into the already too long bread lines. I can see how the maintenance of road men, the operatives of the railroads, their clerks, and other employees associated with them would go into the bread lines—coal miners and car builders would be without labor. That would surely happen if the brilliant prophecies regarding the St. Lawrence Treaty advocates should be realized.

As a matter of fact, the authors of the treaty gave little hope to American labor in writing the document, and, even though it has been repeated here time and time again, for the purpose of my own discussion I call attention to article 3 of the treaty. When I speak in private conversation of article 3 and say that the facts I am about to relate are contained there, always I am told, "No; that is not in the treaty; that could not be in the treaty." But what does the treaty say?

Insofar as possible in respect to the works to be constructed by the Commission, the parts thereof within Canadian territory—

And most of the work in the international section, where the money is to be spent, would be in Canadian territory——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I cannot permit the Senator's statement to go unchallenged. I inquire if the Senator has seen the letter of the Assistant Chief of Engineers, General Pillsbury, on that subject, a letter addressed to the chairman of the Power Authority of the State of New York, in which he shows conclusively that only one fifth of the work to be done with United States funds expended for Canadian labor and materials will be on the Canadian side of the international boundary line?

Mr. COPELAND. Let me take the language of the treaty exactly as it is. The treaty continues—

Or an equivalent proportion of the total works—

Therefore at least one half of the work in the international section will be paid for out of the funds of the United States to Canadian labor, to Canadian engineers, and for Canadian material.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No; the Senator is absolutely mistaken insofar as the official figures are concerned. In that connection, if the Senator will permit me to do so, I should like to read a letter from General Pillsbury to the chairman of the New York Power Authority, dated October 20, 1933. It is as follows:

In accordance with your request for information on the percentage of funds furnished by the United States under the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Deep Waterway Treaty which will be expended for American labor, material, and so forth, I take pleasure in advising you that of the total amount of estimated expenditures of American funds of $257,992,000 for both navigation and power work approximately 80 percent will be expended by the United States engineers with United States labor and United States materials. The remainder under the terms of the subparagraph (b) of article 3 of the treaty will be for work executed by Canadian engineers and Canadian labor and with Canadian materials for work within Canadian territory to be constructed by the temporary St. Lawrence International Rapids Section Commission. Approximately 60 percent of the total cost will be expended on work in the State of New York.

Mr. COPELAND. Has the Senator finished?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I have.

Mr. COPELAND. Very well, Mr. President. I do not care what any engineer or anybody else has written; I wish to put in the RECORD and have Senators hear what the treaty says. This is what we have before us, not the report upon it of some engineer. Quoting from page 3 of the hearings, in article 3 of the treaty, paragraph (b), it is provided:

That, insofar as is possible in respect to the works to be constructed by the Commission, the parts thereof within Canadian territory, or an equivalent proportion of the total of the works, shall be executed by Canadian engineers and Canadian labor and with Canadian material.

Mr. President, I may not know much about the English language, but I do not have to have an engineer tell me what that means. It means that at least half the work done in that canal, whether on the Canadian side or on the American side, shall be paid for out of funds supplied by the United States Government for Canadian engineers, Canadian labor, and Canadian material.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Of course, Mr. President, if the Senator from New York wishes to set himself up as an authority over and above the engineers who have studied this project, who have made estimates, who have broken the figures down into their component parts, and have officially stated not only to the representative of the Senator's own State, the New York Power Authority, but to the President of the United States upon their responsibility to him as Commander in Chief of the Army, that 80 percent of the funds are to be spent in American territory for American labor and materials and under the direction of American engineers, I cannot hope to argue with him on the subject; but it does seem to me that the opponents of this treaty should give some consideration to the fact that these reports which have been made to the President of the United States at his direction, and upon which he himself has spent a great deal of time, and which he has transmitted to the Senate under the official responsibility of his office, should have consideration rather than the opinion of any Senator, even one so distinguished as is the Senator from New York.

Mr. COPELAND. I am very much obliged for the encomium just applied to me in the remarks of the Senator from Wisconsin, but I am not talking about any opinion given by an engineer or by anybody else. I assume that the Senator from Wisconsin has taken refuge back of the entire cost of the canal, considering all phases of it. I frankly said that I am discussing the International Rapids section of the canal, and that is the section which is of the greatest interest to my State.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The International Rapids section is the section that I am now talking about, and that is the section to which the Assistant Chief of Engineers' letter is, in part, directed.

Mr. COPELAND. I am not surprised that the Senator from Wisconsin or anyone else who is so determined upon the ratification of the treaty should find all the reasons he can to sustain his position. I want to say for the RECORD in order that anybody who may read the RECORD in the future may understand my position, that I am not depending upon what any engineer says or upon any statement which has been sent in from outside by anybody, lawyer or Senator. I do not care who may have given the statement to the Senate, I wish to state for the RECORD that we find in the treaty what I have referred to, and the treaty is what we have before us. We are considering the treaty, not what somebody thinks about the treaty. We are considering the language of the treaty, and the treaty itself provides that—

Insofar as is possible in respect to the works to be constructed by the Commission, the parts thereof within Canadian territory, or an equivalent proportion of the total of the works shall be executed by Canadian engineers and Canadian labor and with Canadian material.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield further, of course the Senator understands, as we all do, that the estimates upon which the treaty is predicated were worked out by the joint board of engineers. All the allocations of cost, every phase of the actual construction work, are part and parcel of the treaty because it is upon the basis of the study made by the joint board of engineers that the treaty is predicated.

Mr. COPELAND. I do not think that has a thing to do with the discussion of article 3 of the treaty.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Of course it has, because the joint board of engineers and the Corps of Engineers of the War Department are the ones who have worked out the allocations of cost. They are the ones who know how the project is to be built and how the costs are to be divided. Their statement is conclusive as to how much money is to be spent for Canadian labor and Canadian material.

The fact remains that if the treaty is ratified, in order that the United States Government may assume its fair share of the cost of the project, two dams must be built across the International Rapids section of the river; and in return for the credit which Canada gets for having built, solely out of her own treasury, the Welland Canal at a cost of $128,000,000 and other improvements, the United States must make an expenditure to equal that of the Canadian Government on the projects which she has built heretofore out of her own money, but which become integral parts of this waterway if it shall be completed.

The Senator is utterly mistaken in his statement that 50 percent of the costs of the construction in the international rapids section will be expended for Canadian labor and Canadian material. The boundary line runs down the river in the international rapids section. It curves back and forth. The engineers have worked out to the last cent what proportion of the work will be on the Canadian side of the boundary line and what proportion of the work will be on the American side of the boundary line. After having made those estimates, they have submitted them upon their responsibility to the Senate and to the Congress. I submit that their statements, after this study and after having worked this out in detail, are worthy of the greatest weight in view of the integrity and the character of the work which the Corps of Engineers have done in the past.

If the Senator from New York desires to impeach the integrity and ability of the United States Corps of Engineers, he impeaches their integrity and their ability upon every project for rivers and harbors that has been built in this country since 1902. He impeaches their integrity and their ability to work out estimates not only upon this waterway, but upon every harbor, upon every river, for every project for flood control, which has been constructed under their jurisdiction.

So far as I am concerned I think it does not come with good grace for Senators representing States where millions upon millions of dollars have been expended upon the estimates of this splendid Corps of Engineers, to attempt now, for the purpose of beclouding the issues involved in the treaty, to impeach either their integrity or their professional ability and standing.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I had supposed the Senator was going to make his speech when I got through. But I have been much interested in it. The only trouble is that it does not apply any more to what I was saying than it does to a discussion of politics on the planet Mars. I have not impeached the Army engineers. There is no one in the Chamber who thinks more highly of them or who has defended them in season and out of season more vigorously than I have. It is perfectly absurd to talk of such a suggestion having come from what I have said. I am discussing the treaty which is before us. I am not discussing what the Senator from Wisconsin thinks about the treaty or what some engineer may have told him about it. I am talking about the language of the treaty, and I am discussing the international section of the treaty. Having listened to the eloquence of the Senator from Wisconsin, I shall now proceed with my own discussion.

In article III of the treaty, which relates to the international rapids section of the canal, provision is made that all parts of the work within Canadian territory or an equivalent proportion of the total work shall be executed by Canadian engineers and Canadian labor and with Canadian material and that all such costs are "to be paid out of funds which the United States hereby undertakes to furnish as required by the progress of the work." I leave it to posterity to read the RECORD and judge whether or not I have made a fair statement of the facts in attempting to place before the Senate the argument I have presented.

If the waterway proves to be popular there would be such an upset in railroad traffic as to drive thousands of workers into the already too-long bread line, but as a matter of fact, the authors of the treaty give little hope to American labor in writing the document, as I have already indicated by reading from the treaty itself and not from something that somebody wrote about the treaty.

If this waterway is an employment project, it is for Canadian unemployed and not for American unemployed. I can hear the cry of a distressed man in any language, but in this time of American suffering, our common interest dictates that we must first care for our own, especially when our need is greater than that found in our neighboring country.

To spend $200,000,000 for Canadian employment is far more generous than we can afford to be in these times. I pray we may never disregard their needs when we are able to assist. But certainly we must not deprive them or our own household of the bread of life.

In letter and effect this treaty has overlooked labor. It must be rewritten if it is to be socially just.

MONTREAL THE BENEFICIARY

There is another thing which must not be overlooked: Why take a chance on building up in a foreign country the chief North American seaport? This is a question of burning interest to every seaport in the United States.

Montreal has grown and prospered until it has become the second port on this continent in point of freight tonnage. As I have suggested, it is now the principal grain port of the world. If the St. Lawrence waterway is developed, Montreal must rush forward by leaps and bounds. It will become the chief transshipment port in North America, if the prediction of the St. Lawrence's advocates are realized.

If the Great Lakes should really become a second Mediterranean, there will be mixed cargoes in which package freight will predominate. These cargoes must be broken up and transshipped. Unless steamship lines to all parts of the world begin or end in each of the large lake ports, there will be assembled on each ship sailing from the Great Lakes to Liverpool, packages which must be sent by other carriers to their respective destinations. Not every cargo can be bulk cargo. Unless confined to grain, automobiles or some one commodity, shipped in quantities large enough to fill a ship, most of them will be mixed cargoes.

COASTWISE SHIPPING LAWS

In this connection let me call your attention to the coastwise shipping laws. A foreign ship is not permitted to shop along in American ports, picking up a little cargo here and more there. It must land in or clear from one port only.

Since package freight would make up at least 75 or 80 percent of the business there would be no inducement under present laws for foreign liners and even tramp ships to go into the Great Lakes for cargoes. I can see that an immediate demand would be made to break down our restraining laws and permit coastwise traffic.

What would Andrew Furuseth say to this? Our old friend, Senator La Follette, the elder, would call down to us from the battlements of heaven to protect the American sailor.

If our coastwise laws were amended in the manner suggested, the lower standards of pay and living imposed on the labor of foreign ships would make American competition impossible.

On the other hand, there would be no inducement to American shipping to use a route to the Great Lakes which demanded 1,500 miles of extra steaming to carry coastwise freight to and from the seaports of the United States. No matter how we look at it, there would be little encouragement for the owners of bottoms, foreign or American, to use the route.

In the last analysis it would be a one-way system, perhaps, of remotely valuable use to the exporter of wheat. Certainly all of us are such good Americans that we should hate to see shiploads of furniture, plumbing supplies, cement, and other products of foreign manufacture brought in to compete with the makers of similar articles in the Central and Western States and other parts of the United States.

TRANSSHIPMENT

But whatever ships might sail the inland seas there would be a great preponderance of package freight. This means that somewhere on the waterway, or in Liverpool, there must be rearrangement of the cargo. If the freight is intended for an American port or for South America, of course, the transshipment would be made before crossing the ocean.

Such transshipments would naturally be effected at tidewater, and the first such port, to which and from which sail vessels to all ports of the world, is Montreal. In this port, then, would be the breaking of cargoes, with the consequent commercial development of a great center outside the boundaries of the United States. Our national prosperity would suffer in consequence.

Canada has achieved political independence. With her new-found political and diplomatic freedom has come worthy dreams of commercial development. Already she has perfected arrangements for a powerful steamship line to the West Indies. Mail subventions are in her hands to use and she has started on her way as a worthy competitor to the United States. For us to make possible the building of the St. Lawrence Canal would be to play into her hands and to assist her perfectly proper ambitions.

There can be no doubt that in time of war, which God forbid, the waterway should be one which is a protection and not a menace to the national defense. To me this seems self-evident. I shall not enlarge upon this phase of the subject.

We are striving to build up an effective and permanent American merchant marine. Why should we lay plans to hamper it by this blow against our own shipping interests?

To give Montreal commercial supremacy on the Great Lakes-to-the-ocean waterway would result in what? It would encourage Canadian and British steamship lines to continue their routes into the Great Lakes, with a view to picking up more and more of our shipments. Inevitably American interests would suffer seriously from this invasion of our natural and national rights.

If it is built at all, the waterway to the sea should be built where it will guarantee the use of American carriers and American ports. Otherwise our own country will be the loser. To build the St. Lawrence Canal is the first step toward the destruction of our merchant marine. It will defeat any effort to gain supremacy on the Atlantic. As I see it, no American patriot who has carefully studied the question and has awakened to its possibilities could think of such a thing as the promotion of the St. Lawrence Canal.

I say that without any intent whatever to offend one who takes an opposite view. But it seems to me that where one is fully informed regarding what may happen as a result of building the St. Lawrence waterway, he cannot really support it.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. COPELAND. Yes.

Mr. BONE. I believe the Senator will agree with me in the statement, in connection with the one he has just made about cargoes being carried in foreign bottoms, that when cargoes originating within the interior of the country reach tidewater, they may be, and frequently are, carried in foreign bottoms; and all of our American ports at tidewater are now open to foreign ships. I am wondering—and I am just asking this question; perhaps the Senator may care to answer it—whether it would be worse for the country were those cargoes to be carried from an American port on one of the Great Lakes rather than from a port at tidewater on the great ocean gateways on the Atlantic or Pacific coast. In other words, if the foreign bottom is going to carry the freight, the only difference between that sort of a transaction if it were from a seaboard port and one from an interior port would be that the American rail lines might have the rail haul from the interior to the seaboard port. I am wondering if the Senator agrees with the conclusion that one would be as bad as the other.

Mr. COPELAND. Whatever use might be made of the waterway from the Great Lakes for package freight, which is what we are speaking of, I assume that if these cargoes were picked up in cargo lots and it were a foreign ship—unless we should modify our coastwise laws, it would have to be a full cargo—then at tidewater it would discharge its cargo and break it up into those parts that were to go to other parts of the world than the destination of the ship. If such a cargo got to tidewater at Montreal, there would be the necessity there, in my judgment, of taking that freight by rail to the Atlantic seaboard, because of the unwillingness of our vessels to make that long steaming trip of 1,500 miles into the St. Lawrence River. If there could be lines of vessels running from every port on the Great Lakes—from Chicago, from Milwaukee, from Detroit, from Cleveland—so that every part of the world could be reached with full cargoes, there would then be no necessity of transshipment, and the cargo would go through to its destination; but there could not be those full cargoes with a foreign ship unless perchance it should be of a cargo of grain, because in all probability there would not be enough material in one port to fill a ship. I am sincere in this belief that the first thing that would be done would be an attempt on the part of foreign shipping to break down our coastwise laws so that they could shop along and get their full cargoes. In that event perhaps they could get full cargoes which would actually go past Montreal into some port abroad.

Mr. BONE. Of course the Senator realizes that that would be impossible without the sanction of Congress.

Mr. COPELAND. Oh, yes; but the same pressure that crowded through this treaty would be applied to changes in the coastwise shipping laws.

Mr. BONE. And this country, in common with, I think, practically every country in the world, has shipping laws that forbid vessels flying foreign flags to traffic between domestic ports; and I can hardly conceive of this country or any other country agreeing to such a change in its shipping laws. Of course, a foreign vessel coming into an American port on the Great Lakes would have to content itself with touching one port, and not carry freight or passengers between ports.

Mr. COPELAND. I may say to the Senator from Washington that I am very earnest in my desire to impress upon him and upon others that the only cargo I can think of that would be benefitted by this route would be wheat. I think there is no question about that. I have conceded that all the way through. Yet I have attempted to show that the shifting of the growth of hard winter wheat into the Southwest is making it less and less likely that the port of Duluth or Chicago would be used. My judgment is that the Missouri and the Mississippi and the Gulf would get that traffic. But if wheat were loaded upon any ship, whether a foreign ship or an American ship, for Liverpool, then a direct and fairly short route would be available for 7 months of the year which would carry the wheat through to Liverpool at an advantage over present methods of transportation.

When it comes to package freight, however, I cannot conceive how any use can be made of the waterway into the Great Lakes, because the foreign bottom would have no incentive to go there, for, unless the coastwise shipping laws could be done away with and the foreign ship could shop along to get a cargo, there would be very few full cargoes to take out of the Great Lakes.

So far as the American ship is concerned, my contention is, if I may repeat myself, that it is necessary to go such a roundabout way—1,500 miles up the coast into the Gulf of St. Lawrence, and then the long route from there into the Great Lakes—that the steaming expenses and the maintenance of the ship would be so great that there would be no incentive to do it. So the conclusion of my argument is, and it is my own conclusion, that this would fail as a waterway.

Mr. BONE. May I ask another question? If, for instance, it were desired to deliver freight to one of the points on Lake Michigan, does the Senator think it would be cheaper to land it in the port of New York and ship it by rail from there to Chicago than to steam up the Atlantic coast and then through the St. Lawrence and through the Lakes to Chicago? I do not know, and I am asking the Senator if he has any figures that would indicate any difference in the cost?

Mr. COPELAND. That is exactly what I think. I think that the additional cost of going up this roundabout way for a very limited period of the season would not make it attractive to ships from Seattle and other points in the West to go through the Panama Canal and on up the coast to take the St. Lawrence route.

CONCLUSION

To my mind, next to famine and pestilence, no greater calamity could befall the Nation than to have our people lose sight of the spiritual values and devote themselves wholly to material things. Unless we continue to practice the virtues and to uphold the standards of those pious folk who founded the Republic, we might readily become decadent.

The Declaration of Independence stressed what its author declared to be inalienable rights, particularly, life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. The Constitution was adopted to establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty.

In the background of these great instruments of human rights, is that primary declaration, the Decalogue. There can be no hope of happiness, justice, tranquillity, or the blessings of liberty, unless as a people we observe the admonition of these fundamental statements, whether God made or man made: "Thou shalt not covet thy neighbor's house, * * * nor anything that is thy neighbor's."

Unless we live up to these ideals we must fail as a Nation. It is upon the universal recognition of these spiritual values that our fate is fixed. America must never depart from these formulas of conduct and aspiration. We must not disregard these if we would hold an honorable place in the family of nations and thrive in the fair land God has given us.

I deem it wise to make this declaration of high purpose. Otherwise, what I have said today may seem so materialistic that I might be accused of possessing no sense of spiritual values.

We have before us many problems of great material concern to our country. Unless they are solved wisely there will be unhappiness among our people. We may hope and strive to solve them without impairing the welfare of the several States and other nations. But for the sake of our own prosperity and the happiness of the people, we must seek to protect what we earnestly believe to be our own rights.

It is because I anticipate criticism that I speak about spiritual values and mention our relationship as a nation to the peoples of other countries. We do not covet our neighbor's house or anything that is his. But, my countrymen, we must insist upon those rights, privileges, and advantages that are essentially our own. It is to that thesis and to that alone that I have addressed myself.

We do not choose, never have chosen, and never will choose, to stand in the way of the national and commercial aspirations of any nation so long as they are essentially and rightfully hers. But we would not be worth our salt as a nation unless we demanded for ourselves those things that are ours by inheritance, tradition, and right. We would be untrue, each to his own State and to the Nation itself, if we did not seek to impress upon the Congress the course which will best "establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, and promote the general welfare."

I shall be accused of being chauvinistic—I have been already this afternoon—that I am thinking of New York alone. I hotly deny this. What is good for New York in the matter under discussion is good for the American people. If this treaty were limited to the development of hydroelectric power out of our boundary waters, I should favor it with all my heart. I stayed up many a night to further legislation for the building of Boulder Dam. My State had no direct interest in that project. But it seemed to me a thing of national concern, because of the possible benefits for a great section of our common country.

I would favor a treaty with Canada for power development on the great river even though it would benefit Ontario just as much as New York. I would favor the canal if I felt it would really advance the interests of the Northwest. But, for the reasons I have given in part, I must declare myself as against a project which in my humble judgment would harm the country and by its disastrous economic effects do damage far in excess of any possible benefits.

A WIDE DISPARITY

In considering the arguments for and against the St. Lawrence waterway, one would be saved much trouble in arrival at the truth if he could simply adopt the thesis of Senator SHIPSTEAD, of Minnesota—that the opposition is inspired by the railroads and bankers for their own sinister ends. But admitting that these interests may be up to all kinds of deviltry, there remains to be explained a divergence between figures of cost issued by the War Department and those compiled by other investigators, the Brookings Institution, for example.

This divergence in estimate is so great as to make it impossible for searchers after the facts to accept the Senator's easy method of disposing of the whole business. The War Department's report to the President puts the net cost of the project at $182,726,250, assuming that New York is to pay $89,726,750. But in the survey of the Brookings Institution it is pointed out that the War Department's report embraces only the cost of the improvements in the St. Lawrence River and interconnecting lake channels. The cost of suitable lake harbors and requisite port facilities was not included. These improvements, however, are essential to the enterprise, and their cost must be paid by the taxpayers of Canada and the United States. They are an integral part of the undertaking.

The Brookings Institution's report consequently embraces expenditure for these improvements in its total, thus making the inclusive cost assignable to navigation, $600,000,000, with an additional outlay of $400,000,000 for power development, which brings the cost up to $1,000,000,000. That is so wide a disparity, compared with the estimates of the War Department, as to justify concern as to the accuracy of the latter. And not only is there this large variation in estimates of cost, but there is similar difference of views on estimated savings in transportation and in the amount of prospective traffic. Views diverge on the extent to which sea-going vessels will operate through the waterway and on other factors which must be given weight in determining the value of the project to shipping.

Taking the estimate of saving on shipment of grain, the Brookings Institution finds that the taxpayers would be contributing $2 a ton in order that the shipper might save 83 cents a ton. And this is aside from the question of the possibly disastrous effects of the waterway upon the railroads of the East, which the administration is enough concerned about to suggest that they should be permitted to charge rates that would enable them to establish sinking funds with which to pay off their bonds. Nor does it touch the competition the canal would set in motion with the Atlantic seaboard ports, disturbing the business structure upon which they have been built up. All in all, there is far too much involved in this enterprise for action to be taken on the Shipstead theory that the devilish interests are the whole opposition. There needs to be examination of facts.

MILWAUKEE, WIS., January 16, 1934.

The Honorable DAVID I. WALSH,
The United States Senate,
Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I am writing you in connection with the St. Lawrence waterway. This project has been tremendously popular in most of the Middle Western States bordering on the Great Lakes and those outlying States from or to which products might be shipped via this route, and it has been sold to the people of this large territory on the theory that it will produce immense savings in cost of transportation of agricultural products, principally grain. Many wild guesses have been made of the savings which could be accomplished, all of which have been grossly exaggerated, and none of which apparently have taken into consideration the tremendous changes which have taken place in the past 10 or 15 years in the amount of export grain that is likely to move, and in the improved facilities and lower cost of transportation. No student of the situation as it now exists can possibly set up estimates in respect of grain that will come anywhere near saving in cost of transportation the amount which it will cost to carry the investment which it is now proposed to make in this project.

On page 967 of the hearings before a subcommittee of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the United States Senate, Seventy-second Congress, part 2, will be found a statement which I forwarded to the subcommittee giving certain facts in connection with transportation of grain. My statements were purposely most conservative, as I allowed for a possible movement of 50 million bushels of United States grain via the St. Lawrence route, and estimated the annual carrying charge on the navigation project at not less than $15,000,000 per annum (Moulton, who is undoubtedly the best authority in the United States today, estimated it at $40,000,000 per annum).

The record of the season of navigation of 1933 is now available, and it discloses that not one single bushel of United States grain moved via the St. Lawrence route, although during the entire season vessel freight was abundant and very cheap. During this season a normal movement of Canadian grain took place at an average rate for the season of approximately 4 cents per bushel from Fort William to Montreal. I think it is a reasonable estimate that the Canadian movement provided for less than 25 percent of the Canadian vessel tonnage available for this route.

In my statement of December 12, 1932, I hinted at the efforts of our Government to reduce production to a domestic basis, and since that time, as you know, many millions of dollars have been collected in processing taxes from our citizens and paid to producers in an effort to curtail production and reduce surpluses of agricultural commodities, including wheat, and during this time our United States wheat prices have averaged from 20 cents to 30 cents per bushel higher than Canadian or Argentine or those countries competing for European or oriental wheat business. We may, therefore, quite definitely relinquish the idea that United States grain for export will provide tonnage for the St. Lawrence seaway, and even if it did in considerable amounts, there is not the slightest prospect of any saving to the United States producer in transportation costs.

Grain has been relied upon to produce approximately 60 percent of the traffic on all of the estimates that have so far been prepared of a possible movement via the St. Lawrence seaway, but the trend in the movement of grain is so definitely established, and the possibilities of savings on other commodities so extremely unlikely, that it would seem impossible for anybody except the most visionary person to anticipate within the next decade any volume of traffic that would represent a saving amounting to anywhere near the annual cost of carrying the investment which it is proposed to make, and it would furthermore seem that the present state of our Government's finances would make it imperative that no project of this magnitude be undertaken unless beyond any question of a doubt it could produce savings, with a safe margin for every contingency, that would justify the investment.

A 27-foot channel, if it is constructed, will just be a foot in the door. It will admit only a very limited use of the seaway by ocean vessels (Moulton estimates only 13 percent of the tonnage now operating on regular schedules out of Montreal) and by the time it is completed there will be a great campaign for a deeper channel and another large expenditure of money.

Public sentiment in those States directly concerned in this matter is still so influenced by data prepared when conditions were vastly different than they are now that it is almost considered heresy for those who live in this area to oppose it. I live, and am established in business, and the facilities which I control, and the nature of my business are such that if the proposition had any merit so far as grain is concerned, that would help the producer, my business certainly would increase; but I am so convinced of the unsoundness of this project that I am writing to you in the hope that you will be able to fairly and impartially decide this question purely on its merits, and I am convinced that if it is so considered that your position will be against any such undertaking at this time.

Sincerely yours,

H. M. STRATTON.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a statement on the St. Lawrence waterway project by Mr. D. B. Robertson, for the Railway Labor Executives' Association, before the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY D. B. ROBERTSON FOR THE RAILWAY LABOR EXECUTIVES' ASSOCIATION BEFORE THE SENATE FOREIGN RELATIONS COMMITTEE ON THE ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY PROJECT

I appear here as a representative of the Railway Labor Executives' Association, which is composed of the chief executives of the 21 standard railway labor organizations. The statement which I shall make represents the views of railway labor with respect to the pending St. Lawrence Waterway Treaty now under consideration by this committee.

First I desire to read to the committee a short statement prepared by a special committee of the association and approved by the association at a meeting held on November 16:

"Members, Railway Labor Executives' Association.

"SIRS AND BROTHERS: Having been appointed as a committee to investigate and report upon the subject of the St. Lawrence Waterway Treaty now under investigation by the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, we beg to submit the following for consideration:

"For some time past the Railway Labor Executives' Association has shown considerable interest in the subject of unfair competition in the transportation industry, which included motor transportation service, pipe lines, and waterways. At a meeting of the association held at Washington, D.C., June 3–4, 1932, the following action was taken with regard to expenditure of public funds for the purpose of improving waterways for transportation purposes:

"'Moved and seconded that this association go on record as opposed to the expenditure of public funds for the purpose of deepening waterways for transportation purposes, as ample facilities now exist to handle all the transportation and more than the Nation requires, and copy of this resolution be furnished William Green, president American Federation of Labor. Carried.'"

"It was understood that the above action was not intended to interfere with the improvement of waterways in the interest of flood control, and in transmitting copy thereof to President Green of the American Federation of Labor, this point was made clear. The action of the association was acknowledged by President Green.

"In view of the policy already declared by the association, together with the fact that, in our opinion, present economic conditions and the status of the transportation industry of the Nation neither requires nor justifies any expenditure of public funds to create additional water transportation facilities, we recommend that for reasons, some of which are enumerated below, this association authorize the chairman, in conjunction with the executive committee, to arrange for an early appearance before the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations for the purpose of opposing, on behalf of this association and the railway employees represented thereby, the adoption of the St. Lawrence Waterway Treaty and the construction of the St. Lawrence shipway:

"First. Is not justified by economic necessity.

"Second. Would adversely affect labor conditions in the railroad industry in the United States and Canada and would greatly increase unemployment.

"Third. The present transportation plant and personnel is ample to handle the present and anticipated needs of the country for many years to come.

"Fourth. Any alleged necessity for waterway transportation is illusory. The net results of waterway transportation projects thus far have been to increase the cost of Government and taxation upon the people.

"Fifth. The construction of a St. Lawrence shipway would doubtless involve the United States and Canada in many international complications.

"Sixth. The net result to railway employees of the construction of a St. Lawrence shipway would be to tax railway employees in order to subsidize an enterprise that would eventually eliminate them from railroad service.

"Seventh. The construction of a St. Lawrence shipway would contribute toward the breaking down of our present rail transportation system and would nullify the efforts already made by the United States Government to protect our rail transportation system and the millions of its outstanding securities now held by insurance companies, financial institutions, and individual citizens.

"Respectfully submitted.

"D. B. ROBERTSON,
"C. J. MCGLOGAN,
"H. J. CHAPMAN."

Although this statement expresses the position of railway labor, the following additional remarks which might serve to clarify that position are respectfully submitted:

Testimony already presented to this committee, which has been given Nation-wide publicity, has in many respects stated the views of railway labor. It has been said, for example, that there exists no economic necessity for the waterway since the existing transportation facilities are far in excess of current needs and will be ample for many years to come. To this statement we fully subscribe. Car shortages are now a thing of the past, and are quite unlikely to recur at any time in the future. Surplus railway cars available for immediate use at the present time number approximately half a million, while about a quarter of a million additional cars, temporarily out of service, could quickly be made serviceable. At no time since the brief hectic period following the war has the demand for cars exceeded the available supply. Motive power likewise is and has for the past decade been more than adequate to care for the traffic offered for movement. In short, there is not now and there has not been since agitation for this St. Lawrence waterway started, any shortage in the facilities of the railroads to handle any and all the traffic to be moved.

At this point it seems appropriate to call attention to the fact that any original justification for the construction of a St. Lawrence deep waterway from a transportation standpoint was based on conditions that no longer exist. The International Joint Commission appointed by the Governments of the United States and Canada, which first studied and recommended the project in its report in 1921, stated that it would be valuable for the purpose of supplementing our inadequate railway facilities. At that time the railroads of the country had just been returned to private ownership and control after their administration by the Government during the war. They were temporarily in need of large capital commitments for improving roadbed and structures and for additional facilities of all kinds. This condition passed, however, within a few years.

Let me mention another fact which, from our point of view, is vital to railway employees. Every ton of freight diverted from the railroads has its effect upon the job of some employee, and continued diversions result in the loss of jobs. In the United States and Canada at present there are many hundreds of thousands of unemployed railway workers, men trained by years of experience in the field of transportation. Most of these are idle because of the prevailing depression it is true, but many are without jobs because of the loss of traffic to highways and waterways which are enjoying substantial subsidies from the Government. Just how many railroad men have lost their jobs because of the waterway-development program of the Federal Government it would be impossible to say, because of other conditions which also exist, but it can be said without fear of successful contradiction that the number is very large.

Railway employees do not wish to be understood as objecting to anything that constitutes a forward step or which contributes to the public generally. They have submitted without protest in the past to technological improvements in the science of railroading which resulted in a reduced need for man labor. For example, 1,167,000 employees in 1931 moved about the same ton-miles of freight as it took the equivalent of over 2,000,000 men to move in 1913. If railway employees thought that the creation of waterways at public expense made available a better transportation service or a less costly one, all items considered, they would not and could not with good grace complain. But they are convinced that waterway service is not better than rail service, but is far inferior. They are also convinced that when all costs are taken into consideration, this inferior service is more expensive than railroad service.

A curious anomaly enters this waterway picture which is often overlooked. I refer to the fact that railway employees who are fortunate enough to have jobs are being taxed for the facilities which are striking at the foundations of their livelihood. Every railway employee earning more than the amount exempted from income tax pays into the Federal Government a sum of money each year. In addition, he pays his share of the other Federal taxes which others are obliged to pay. A part of the money he contributes is used by the Government to develop and operate waterways. Many proponents of public developments dismiss the tax argument with the suggestion that most of those who benefit are not in the income-paying class, and that the burden of expense falls upon a relatively small group possessed of wealth. In other words, that it is an indirect way of redistributing wealth so that all the people may derive some of its benefits. We do not deny the force of this as a general proposition, nor that the theory under ordinary circumstances works out that way, although we all participate indirectly in Federal taxation, through added living costs.

Here, however, is a different situation. Railway employees, as a group, pay substantial Federal taxes. A part of the taxes they pay are used by the Federal Government to subsidize a competing agency which, because of this subsidy, can transport goods for less than the railroads, and can consequently divert traffic from them. Railway employees depend for their jobs upon the traffic handled by the railways, and reductions in traffic volume mean reductions in forces or in rates of pay, or both. Thus the Government indirectly is using the taxes paid by railway employees to destroy them, which is a most unconscionable situation.

In addition to the taxes paid by employees, there are the taxes paid by the railway companies themselves and by the institutions and individuals who own their securities. These taxes likewise are being directed by the Government to a use which is detrimental to the railways. They are not being put to an economical use, for there is yet to be produced any proof that waterway transportation is better or cheaper than rail transportation, when all elements are weighed in the balance.

Now comes forward a proposal for further jeopardizing the railroads, their employees, and their investors. It is proposed by the treaty here under consideration to take more of the moneys paid by the taxpayers into the Federal Treasury and apply them toward a new competitor for the railroads; a new method for diverting traffic from the rails and cutting more employees from the railroad pay rolls; a method out of which they create no source of Federal income, but, on the contrary, further impair the ability of the American railroads to serve as a source of Federal taxation.

Testimony already in this committee's record indicates that, in spite of the fact that the proposed new St. Lawrence waterway would divert traffic from the rails, it would not result in any appreciable saving to shippers, particularly to shippers of agricultural commodities. It has been stated here that the rate on wheat now in effect via existing water routes from upper lake ports to Liverpool is 8 cents a bushel. The State Department in July of this year referred to an estimate made in 1926 that the waterway would result in a saving of 6 cents a bushel in transportation costs. At present the Montreal to Liverpool rate is 3½ cents a bushel. Obviously ocean carriers are not going to come inland as far as upper lake ports for wheat cargoes and charge less for the complete service than they now charge from the port of Montreal. I do not appear here as a rate expert equipped to discuss freight rates but merely wish to urge the committee to scrutinize closely the claims made by the proponents of this waterway.

Permit me to state that the railway labor organizations view with growing impatience the expeditions of the Federal Government into the field of transportation. They fail to see any economic benefit to anyone except some favored shippers from these expeditions and see clearly a great detriment in them to themselves and to the taxpaying public generally. If it is the purpose of the Government to make seaports of the present lake ports, what is to prevent the cities up and down the Mississippi and other inland rivers later from demanding similar treatment? It seems to railway labor that until it is more clearly shown that water transportation is superior to rail transportation, both in quality and price, the Government should proceed slowly in sinking vast sums of public funds into the rivers of this country.

I have said that the benefits from waterways flow principally to a selected few who can take advantage of the service. On the Ohio River it is estimated that 95 percent of the traffic consists of the property of large corporations owning and operating their own facilities. On the New York Barge Canal a large part of the traffic consists of the products of large motor, oil, and sugar corporations some of whom own their own barge equipment. It is interesting to note in this connection that when one purchases a Detroit-made automobile in New York City he must pay f.o.b. Detroit prices plus the rail freight rate to New York. The fact that the automobile might have moved into New York via water in the manufacturer's own vessel and by public right of way, without toll, does not result in any benefit to the New York purchaser. The manufacturer pockets the difference between the railroad rate and what it cost him to transport the car himself. I understand this is also true with respect to other commodities transported on the New York Canal and other waterways.

The railway labor organizations urge this committee to consider carefully the results which might flow from the ratification of this treaty and the development of the proposed waterway. We hope the committee will give thought to the effect this canal would have on the employees of the roads affected. The hundreds of thousands of railway employees who have lost their jobs in the past 2 years, partly because of the subsidies given railroad competitors by the Government, and the million who still have their jobs—though some are on a part-time basis—will not look with favor upon a project which not only increases the costs of Government but will delay, if not entirely prevent, the return to service of many who are unemployed, and will undermine the jobs of those who are fortunate enough to be employed at the present time.

We respectfully urge that all consideration of the project should be postponed, at least until the existing depression is over and normal economic conditions reestablished. Conditions of today are so uncertain that the matter cannot be adequately or soundly considered until they are past. Otherwise, the discussion of the contemplated project under the unprecedented conditions of the present depression is likely to assume the form of hypothetical suppositions. Even with the return of the country to normal activities, no proper consideration can, in our opinion, be given to the St. Lawrence deep waterway until our own domestic transportation problem is solved. We now have an excess of uncoordinated facilities, both of steam railways, truck and bus lines, and waterways, which urgently require uniform regulation and constructive treatment.

The present railroad situation is well known. The Government is attempting to assist the carriers through loans made by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation; the regulation of motor transportation is receiving the earnest consideration of various governmental and private agencies; the railroad employees last February voluntarily accepted a reduction in wages in order to assist the railroads to carry on during the depression.

The Federal Government has already advanced almost one half a billion dollars of its own funds to maintain the solvency and insure the continued operation of the railroads. More than 700,000 of the operating staff of the railways are now without employment and those still employed are working part time. While coping with these deplorable conditions we surely cannot properly consider the authorization of another huge waterway project, which will indisputably divert traffic from railways, render more difficult the maintenance of their financial solvency, and increase the volume of unemployment among the working forces. We believe that any proposal which tends to increase existing transportation facilities should be most carefully considered and approval withheld pending the clarification and settlement of the entire transportation problem. We feel that the first duty of the country is to rehabilitate and put on an efficient and profitable operating basis our existing transportation facilities before adding new ones. Unless this is done, the Government, in the case of the steam railroads, cannot hope to obtain payment of amounts now loaned to them and the railroads will doubtless undertake to further curtail employment in an effort to meet fixed charges and avoid receivership.

At this time to approve of the St. Lawrence Waterway Treaty would involve the expenditure of large sums of money and the building up of additional transportation facilities which, in the opinion of railway employees, would be most unwise and without economic justification. It is our opinion that instead of adding any new complications to the present transportation problems we should undertake to solve those now confronting us.

DECEMBER 2, 1932.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, numerous statements have been made on this floor indicating the profit which will accrue to American labor in the future as a result of the St. Lawrence waterway construction program. However, Mr. Robertson, a profound student of transportation, speaking for 21 railway labor organizations, declares that—

> Present economic conditions and the status of the transportation industry of the Nation neither require nor justify any expenditure of public funds to create additional water transportation facilities.

The Senate has considered a great variety of arguments for and against the waterway, such as statements concerning needed fortifications, the possible internationalization of Lake Michigan, the formation of over 2,000 miles of new seacoast and the development of 30 great port cities, the specifications of the treaty of 1909, the engineering problems, the preparatory costs, possible savings in transportation costs, the potential uses of the canal, the diversion of waters from Georgian Bay into the St. Lawrence, the question of hydroelectric power, and many others.

Now that we have had an opportunity to think of many of the specific details relating to the waterway we may be in a position to consider the project in relation to our present national emergency. There are, without doubt, certain attractive features in this proposal. It may very well be that sometime in the future conditions will be ripe for this development. At the present time, however, I am convinced that the project does not meet the needs of our Nation.

In charting national policy we must always look to the future. This is in accord with the current report of Joseph B. Eastman, Federal Coordinator of Transportation. Our transportation problem involves our lake and ocean carriers, our automobile and bus facilities, and our airways, as well as our railroads. The competitive interests of all of these must receive profound consideration. The railroad problem is but one of numerous transportation issues, but after 8 months of study by a large group of transportation specialists, working with the sanction of the administration, the Eastman report on railroad coordination has no immediate suggestion for action. Will it be wise for the Senate to take action on this waterway project at this session when there is no general agreement, even among specialists, as to the general outlines of our future transportation program? Will it be expedient for the Senate to ratify a treaty which will bind us to a new transportation policy for our entire Nation before the general plan involving all our transportation facilities shall have received extended study and general acceptance by those qualified to give judgment?

The new waterway project is essentially a plan to increase our transportation facilities. Other considerations are involved, but the fundamental issue concerns distribution outlets. At the present time there is no conclusive evidence which indicates that we now need more national transportation. If in the future this need should become apparent, the problem can then be considered. At the present time, with an airways program incomplete, with bus travel problems unsolved in relation to other carriers, and with railroad investments suffering and railroad employees distracted with the thought of a possible unemployment crisis, we have enough to think about without burdening ourselves with problems which do not demand an immediate answer.

On January 4 President Roosevelt, in his Budget message, indicated that it would be necessary to borrow $10,000,000,000 in the next 6 months and that our national debt will extend up to almost $32,000,000,000 in 1935. Since the Budget message was transmitted to the Senate additional appropriations have been requested. One of these is for the St. Lawrence waterway. Authorities differ as to its cost. Estimates vary all the way from two hundred and fifty to one thousand million dollars. The immediate problem of our Government is to find revenue with which to discharge the obligations which have already been accepted. Loans will have to be secured from loyal citizens of our country. Bond issues will have to be floated successfully. As a matter of expediency, is it wise for our Government to continue to assume new financial responsibilities over and above the present requirements of a heavy Budget before proper provision has been made to provide for our present commitments? Is it not time to take stock of ourselves and of our ability to pay? It is no partisan consideration which leads me to ask this question, but, rather, thought for our national welfare.

With the war debts in default, with the national income cut in half, with a national debt incomparably greater than ever before, and with a need to borrow $10,000,000,000 in the next 6 months, is it economically sound for the Senate to sanction a treaty which calls for additional appropriations?

Sound credit and stable government are today the first requirements for business stability and national recovery. With 10,000,000 able-bodied and willing workers still unemployed, with relief measures uncertain, with the specter of unemployment staring railroad labor in the face, this seems to be an inopportune time to press any unnecessary transportation project upon the American people.

The National Recovery Act was passed for the purpose of relieving industry from the evils of cutthroat competition, and various codes have been enacted to promote that end. This seemed necessary because of the huge surpluses which exist on every hand. Our depression has frequently been referred to as a "famine of plenty." We weep because we have too much of everything. We should remember that we not only have surpluses of oil, coal, cotton, wheat, and other commodities, but, according to unimpeachable authority, we have at the present time an excess of transportation facilities. As there are now more transportation facilities than there is traffic, the St. Lawrence waterway would be just another unfair method of competition, costly to taxpayers, and a menace to railway labor. It is preposterous to put our Nation on a restricted-production program, which means that we shall have less to transport in every way, and at the same time ask the Nation to finance a new and unnecessary water-transport system.

Ours is a depression because of plenty. We weep because our barns are bursting with unused grain and our banks are filled with money which no one can borrow. We weep because we have so much cotton that we have to turn under every third row; so many hogs that we slaughter our brood sows by the million; so much corn that farmers have been compelled to burn it for fuel; so much coal that miners are lucky if they get 2 days' work in 7; and so much oil that the major part of it runs away from us and is wasted. Surrounded by too much of everything, including transportation, we now consider the possibility of stretching the national credit to build an unneeded waterway. If we do this thing, we shall have cause to weep.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I attempted to obtain the floor at the time the Senator from New York concluded his speech. At this late hour I would not attempt to make a full answer to the statements which the Senator made; but there are several which I do not wish to go unchallenged on the record today.

The Senator started his speech by reviving the long-since and well-buried all-American canal project. If I understood him correctly, he stated that he thought that it would cost about $150,000,000 to deepen the all-American canal sufficiently to permit vessels of 25-foot draft to pass from the Hudson River to the Great Lakes.

I hold in my hand Document No. 7 of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors of the House of Representatives for the Sixty-ninth Congress, second session, and this document contains a letter of transmittal from the then Chief of Engineers, General Jadwin. I should like to call attention to the table on pages 2 and 3 of this document, which makes some comparison between the St. Lawrence route and the all-American route, but in particular I wish to call attention to the fact that the estimated cost, as carried in this document, for the all-American canal, to which the Senator has just referred, is $506,000,000.

I also wish to point out that although the Senator from New York has indicated he is very anxious to have this water power developed, that he has been advocating here this afternoon an alternative route to that of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence waterway, which will cost $506,000,000 and not $150,000,000, as he indicated, and which will not result in the development of a single kilowatt-hour of electricity if it should be built.

Another point I wish to direct the attention of the Senate to is the question of fog, of which the Senator from New York made much in his speech. It seems rather surprising to me that the Senator, who lives in the city of New York, if I remember correctly, should raise a question concerning fog-hours as an argument against the St. Lawrence waterway. I wish to point out that fog-hours in this country along the Atlantic seaboard begin with 198 fog-hours annually at Savannah; 229 fog-hours per year at Charleston; 264 fog-hours per year at New Orleans; 373 fog-hours per year at Baltimore; 378 fog-hours per year at Norfolk; whereas at Montreal, which is now at the end of deep-water navigation on the St. Lawrence River, the fog-hours are 100 per year. At Point Peter, opposite Kingston, they are 212 fog-hours per year; at Toronto they are 440 fog-hours per year; whereas in the harbor of New York the fog-hours, on the average, are 1,064 per year.

In one breath the Senator maintains that because of the number of fog-hours per year it is impossible to navigate successfully the St. Lawrence waterway, and in another section of his speech he is apprehensive that if the waterway is opened it will result in making Montreal the greatest port on the American continent. The Senator knows, as does every Senator who has studied the geography of this situation, that every ton of cargo that enters the harbor of Montreal must pass down the St. Lawrence River and pass Belle Isle. Concerning his one trip down this route the Senator very graphically described the fog, but I assume he knows that his beloved New York has 1,064 fog-hours per year.

The Senator also reiterates the statements which have been made again and again by the opponents of this treaty. In one breath they contend that the waterway will not produce any traffic and in the next breath they contend that it will work great hardship upon the railway transportation systems of this country. In one breath the Senator says that there will be no wheat shipped from the great Northwest over the St. Lawrence waterway if it is opened. In the next breath he says that the shipment of all of this grain which will flow down the waterway will work a great detriment to our American railroads.

The Senator evidently has ignored, as have so many Senators who are opposing this treaty, the official summary of information which was transmitted by the President of the United States with his message to the Senate for consideration in connection with this project. This information, as every Senator knows, was gathered by four executive departments of this Government. So far as I know, not a single statement contained in those reports, nor in those summaries, has been successfully challenged by any person.

> The completion of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence seaway will enable 70 percent of the world's ocean-going freight cargo tonnage to reach the Great Lakes and St. Lawrence River ports which serve the important industrial, agricultural, and commercial area described above. The potential export and import tonnage which will move via the seaway, based on 1929 conditions, is conservatively estimated in a special study prepared by the War Department at 13,000,000 tons, and the savings in transportation costs, as compared with present available routes, at approximately $79,000,000.
> These savings and the basis for the figures arrived at are shown in detail in the report of the War Department.
> The report referred to is now being printed.
> On the basis indicated therein, it is shown that in 1929 there might have been moved over the proposed seaway a total of exports of 7,741,500 tons with a possible saving of $44,810,923, and an import movement of 5,742,333 tons with a possible saving of $34,082,207.
> This saving of over $70,000,000 a year affecting both the producer and the consumer is based entirely upon foreign commerce. As stated above, our water-borne foreign commerce is only one fifth of the total water-borne commerce of the United States.

Mr. President, the Senator from New York continues to reiterate the opinion that the completion of the St. Lawrence seaway will injure the railroads of this country, which was also indicated in the brief remarks of the Senator from Pennsylvania, who also shares the apprehension that it will injure the railroad employees of this country.

I refer again to this official summary of information transmitted to the Senate by the President of the United States, after a most exhaustive survey by the departments of government which are in possession of the information necessary to formulate these conclusions, and I desire to read from page 8 as follows:

> Interstate Commerce Commission figures show that railroad freight ton-miles increased from an average of 167,712,000,000 in the 5 years, 1901–05 to an average of 430,378,000,000 for the 5 years, 1926–30, and that, with the exception of the abnormal war period, the rate of increase has been remarkably steady, with no sign of diminution. This is significant in view of the fact that recent years have been characterized by increasing competition on waterways and highways. The trend would indicate a demand for about 650,000,000,000 ton-miles of freight traffic in 1950, an increase of 200,000,000,000 ton-miles as compared with the 1929 peak.

Not satisfied with having worked out this prediction upon the basis of the average annual increase, the Department undertook a different calculation based on the increase in population and the increase in per capita ton-miles of traffic. They concluded:

> A similar analysis based on population growth and increase in per capita ton-miles of traffic suggests approximately the same conclusion and warrants the conviction that by 1950 the increase in traffic offered to the country's transportation agencies will be at least 30 times the probable traffic via the seaway. If the comparison is limited to the railroads paralleling the proposed seaway, it appears that increased demands for traffic will exceed the potential traffic of the seaway at least 10 times over.

Mr. President, the same arguments which have been made against the opening of this seaway could have been made and, I have no doubt, were made against the opening of the Panama Canal. Certainly the Panama Canal offers a remarkable example and demonstration of what competition between water-borne and rail traffic may produce, insofar as it affects the railroads of the country. In 1915, when the canal was opened, it had a traffic of approximately 4,888,000 tons. In 1929 it had a traffic of approximately 30,000,000 tons. It was during this period, and I hope Senators will bear this in mind, that the western roads—which are more directly in competition with the Panama Canal and water-borne commerce that comes through it than others—experienced the greatest increase in their business and in their earnings of any period in their history.

I want to point out that the western railroads during this period had the all-time peak of their earnings, being $336,000,000 in 1929, which was 48 percent more than they had ever earned as net in any period prior to the opening of the Panama Canal.

Of course this project, which is to be permanent and for all time, cannot be judged by this year of depression, and it goes without saying that we are justified in taking averages and normal periods in contemplation of a project which will be of service for all time to come.

Therefore, after most careful consideration of the project from the point of view of the effect upon the railroads and upon railroad employees, I am convinced that the building of the waterway will not throw a single railroad employee out of work and will not injure a single railroad in the United States. On the contrary, I am confident that this waterway, like the Panama Canal, will carry the heavy, bulky commodities which are low-revenue producers for the railroads, but which at the same time will stimulate and increase the traffic for railroads of the higher-revenue type of freight.

The Senator from New York expresses an opinion as to the attitude which my father would take upon this project if he were alive and in this body today. Since his death

I have never presumed to speak for my father upon any question upon which he had not already taken a public position. But I think it may be of some interest to the Senator from New York to know that the first time the St. Lawrence seaway project was ever endorsed in a political platform in this country was in 1920, when it was endorsed by the Progressives of Wisconsin. It was in the platform upon which my father was elected to the United States Senate in 1922. It was in the platform upon which he became an independent candidate for President in 1924, and upon that platform the standard labor organizations of the country supported my father for President. No person in this country, prior to his death, had ever given more time or consideration to this project than had my father, and he was one of its most ardent advocates.

The Senator from New York also mentions the Seamen's Act. The Senator's statement indicates that he does not understand the Seamen's Act if he has any apprehension that the opening of the seaway will operate in any manner against American sailors upon American ships. One of the principal sections of the Seamen's Act was the provision which did away with the right of foreign vessels to keep their crews upon board in a safe harbor of the United States. This has resulted in an equalization of wages which has put American shipping on a more competitive basis with foreign shipping than any other step which has been taken by this country.

In the second place I want to point out that 80 percent of the water-borne commerce of the United States is domestic commerce. If this seaway is opened we are justified in assuming that a great percentage, at least 80 percent, of commerce upon the seaway will be coastwise commerce open alone to ships of American registry and flying the American flag. I likewise believe we are justified in assuming that this commerce will benefit ports along the Atlantic seaboard, the Gulf, and the Pacific.

Mr. President, the Senator from New York repeats his demand made in the speech which he delivered last spring for more economic surveys of this project. This project has had more study, has had more official reports rendered upon it, than any other project which has ever been contemplated or under consideration by any government in the world. Every one of the studies and every one of the reports from official sources has been favorable for the completion of the project. But now the Senator from New York refuses to study the economic surveys which have been prepared at the direction of the President of the United States and transmitted to the Senate and printed so that they might be readily accessible to Senators who care to give the treaty a fair consideration.

Of what avail is it to have these studies made if Senators like the Senator from New York refuse even to give them a reading before they take the floor to oppose this treaty?

Here is a recent survey by four departments of the Government, officially made at the direction of the President of the United States. The results of the survey have been transmitted for the consideration of Senators. They completely sustain this project upon every point of attack; and yet the Senator from New York rises in the face of these overwhelming statistical, economic, and engineering data and asks for more.

Mr. President, it seems to me that before Senators impeach the intelligence of the President of the United States in transmitting this message to the Senate with this new material gathered at his direction, they should at least do him the honor of reading this material and giving it their unbiased and impartial consideration.

MOUNT PLEASANT INDIAN SCHOOL, MICHIGAN

As in legislative session,

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, as in legislative session, and on behalf of the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER], who is Chairman of the Indian Affairs Committee, I report back favorably, without amendment, Senate Bill 2152, granting certain property to the State of Michigan for institutional purposes; and I submit a report (No. 202) thereon.

This is a bill to transfer the property of the Mount Pleasant Indian School at Mount Pleasant, Mich., from the Federal Government to the State government. I desire to make a brief statement in connection with it.

This happens to be an emergency matter so far as the State of Michigan is concerned. The Indian school has been closed, and never will be reopened. The few Indians involved have been assimilated into the regular educational system. Therefore, this property is remaining idle. The State of Michigan by legislative act has offered to close it into its own institutional system, and put it to work for the benefit of the people of Michigan. The program has the unanimous support not only of the committee but of the Secretary of the Interior and of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

I have spoken to the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], the able majority leader, and to the minority leader, the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY], and there seems to be no objection to the present consideration of the bill. Therefore, as in legislative session, I ask for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I have no objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection.

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby granted to the State of Michigan for institutional purposes the property known and designated as the "Mount Pleasant Indian School", located at Mount Pleasant, Mich., such grant to include the land and buildings and such equipment as may be designated by the Secretary of the Interior: Provided, That this grant shall be effective at any time prior to July 1, 1934, if before that date, the Governor of the State of Michigan on behalf of the State files an acceptance thereof with the Secretary of the Interior: Provided further, That right is reserved by the Secretary of the Interior to retain until July 1, 1934, dormitory and other space needed for the housing and care of Indian pupils now accommodated at said school: Provided further, That as a condition precedent to this grant Indians resident within the State of Michigan will be accepted in State institutions on entire equality with persons of other races, and without cost to the Federal Government.

COMMITTEE SERVICE

As in legislative session,

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, as in legislative session, I ask that the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BACHMAN], the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BROWN], and the Senator from Montana [Mr. ERICKSON] be assigned to the Committee on Commerce to fill vacancies on behalf of the majority.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

SENATOR FROM PENNSYLVANIA

As in legislative session,

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, on March 2, 1933, the Governor of Pennsylvania, Mr. Pinchot, addressed to the President of the Senate a letter relative to the certificate of election of the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS]. In the letter he stated:

I am enclosing herewith a separate communication addressed to you and through you to the Senate of the United States. I request that the contents of this separate communication shall not be made public until after a verdict shall have been reached in the case now pending against the said JAMES J. DAVIS in the District Court of New York or until such time as the Senate of the United States shall deem fit and proper for its publication.

Thereupon the following entry was made in the Journal as of Friday, March 3, 1933:

CREDENTIALS OF SENATOR FROM PENNSYLVANIA

The Vice President laid before the Senate the credentials of JAMES J. DAVIS, duly chosen a Senator by the qualified electors of the State of Pennsylvania, for the term beginning March 4, 1933, which were read and ordered to be placed on file.

The Vice President laid before the Senate a communication from the Governor of Pennsylvania enclosing a separate communication to the Senate with a request that its contents be not made public until such time as the Senate may deem fit and proper, which was ordered to be placed on file.

Mr. President, there has been no publication of the contents of the separate communication. It is in the files of the Senate. The verdict in the case referred to has been returned. I move that the Secretary of the Senate be directed to return the separate communication referred to in the record mentioned to the Governor of Pennsylvania. He will then be at liberty to send an open communication to the Senate or to publish the contents of his letter if he chooses to do so.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the order will be entered. The Chair hears no objection.

EXECUTIVE ORDERS RELATING TO VETERANS' REGULATIONS

As in legislative session,

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

Pursuant to the provisions of section 20, title I, of the act entitled "An act to maintain the credit of the United States Government", approved March 20, 1933, I am transmitting herewith certified copies of the following Executive orders which were approved by me on January 19, 1934:

Executive Order No. 6565 (Veterans' Regulations No. 1 (c)).

Executive Order No. 6566 (Veterans' Regulation No. 6 (b)).

Executive Order No. 6567 (Veterans' Regulation No. 9 (b)).

Executive Order No. 6568 (Veterans' Regulation No. 10 (c)).

Executive Order No. 6565 amends Executive Orders No. 6156, June 6, 1933, and No. 6229, July 28, 1933.

Executive Order No. 6566 amends Executive Order No. 6232, July 28, 1933.

Executive Order No. 6567 amends Executive Order No. 6158, June 6, 1933.

Executive Order No. 6568 amends Executive Orders No. 6098, March 31, 1933, and No. 6234, July 28, 1933.

These veterans' regulations were issued in accordance with the terms of title I, Public, No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, "An act to maintain the credit of the United States Government."

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 23, 1934.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate several messages from the President of the United States submitting nominations, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of James R. Wright to be United States marshal, northern district of Texas.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of Albert A. Sanders to be United States marshal, district of Wyoming.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

That completes the Executive Calendar.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, no. 121 on the Executive Calendar—the nomination of Robert A. Cooper to be United States district judge, District of Puerto Rico—has just been confirmed by the action of the Senate. There is a vacancy. There is necessity for the immediate functioning of that officer, and he is ready to sail at once. I therefore ask unanimous consent that the President be notified of the confirmation of that particular nomination.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

RECESS

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Arkansas.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 18 minutes p.m.) the Senate, in executive session, took a recess until tomorrow, Wednesday, January 24, 1934, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, JANUARY 23, 1934

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Infinite God, our Father, the Creator and Judge of all the earth; Thou who dost look with mercy on what we are and who reveals what we may be, we pray that Thou wouldst enable us to translate our visions into realities. Grant us largeness of thought, of aspiration, and of liberty. Heavenly Father, may our labors be made musical by the melody of brotherhood. Hearken, O Lord God, we beseech Thee, that with hearts of oak and with breasts of steel our entire citizenship may be summoned in the name of humanity and of good government to cleanse our country of the breeding grounds of crime, which are our greatest public peril. O Thou who art holy and just, we plead for a recovery that shall free our Nation's arteries from these cesspools of iniquity from which come floods of terror, leaving broken hearts and shattered hearthstones in their train. O hasten the dawn of our deliverance. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House is requested, a bill of the House of the following title:

H.R. 6670. An act to provide for the establishment of a corporation to aid in the refinancing of farm debts, and for other purposes.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House that on January 18, 1934, the President approved and signed a joint resolution of the House of the following title:

H.J.Res. 228. Joint resolution to provide for certain expenses incident to the second session of the Seventy-third Congress.

VETERAN RELIEF—ITS RELATION TO CITIZENSHIP

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting an address delivered before the Chamber of Commerce at Roanoke, Va., January 22, by Brig. Gen. Frank T. Hines, Administrator of Veterans' Affairs.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM]?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following:

Mr. President, members and guests of the Roanoke Chamber of Commerce, I greatly appreciate the opportunity to address you here today, recalling, as I do with much pleasure, my previous visit to Roanoke when I spoke on Armistice Day 1931, before many of your veterans and other citizens of your splendid city.

Because of my relation with veterans' affairs, it is but natural that I should choose for discussion with you veteran relief, and

I wish to touch upon a phase of it which has not been given the emphasis I believe it rightly deserves; that is, its relationship to citizenship.

All down through the years from earliest Rome through Elizabethan England and in our own country the problems of veterans' relief has persisted in ever-increasing reverberations, but the emphasis has always been upon the Government's obligation to the veteran, and the matter of the citizen's obligation to his Government has not in my judgment been given the consideration it merits.

I feel strongly that, so far as our country is concerned, there is need for greater interest on the part of our citizens in their own country in the exercise of the rights of citizenship and a more thorough understanding of the machinery of government.

Taken in its full implication the very word "citizen" acquires the dignity of a title. In fact one writer has characterized it as such. He says, "The highest title in the new order of nobility will be neither 'merchant' nor 'scholar', nor yet 'gentleman' in its conventional sense, but 'citizen'—a title rich in its suggestion of public spirit, the recognition of the claims of human brotherhood, the merging of the individual into the higher life of the community, of the Nation, of humanity itself."

However, we are apt to be very casual in our use of this title, giving no thought to the responsibility it connotes. When we say that a man is a citizen of New York, we intend to indicate merely his residence, not his capacity.

Responsibility as a citizen is not a passive one. It is not enough to live our own lives uprightly; it is imperative that we take an active part in the affairs of our community, bringing all our courage and resourcefulness to bear against any evil or unfortunate occurences which may arise; and in the face of such conditions it is necessary to consider one's self not merely as a citizen of the immediate community but as an integral factor in the welfare of the whole country.

It is this particular attitude that I have in mind in relation to our veterans. For many months past so much has been uttered and written on the subject of veteran relief, voicing deprecation of the burden of its maintenance, the subject had come to be looked upon in many quarters almost as a national grievance, and demands for alleviation of this burden upon the taxpayer grew increasingly insistent and vociferous until the enactment by Congress of the act to maintain the credit of the United States and Public, No. 78. These acts, as most of you no doubt are aware, gave the President broad powers of regulation governing veteran relief and specified certain reductions in payments to veterans and their dependents. Revision of the laws has been effected upon sound principles and comprehending the character of military service, equality in benefits for similar service, consideration of the degree of disability sustained, and financial need for Government aid where direct service origin is not a factor.

It is interesting to note that after the application of the provisions of these new regulations there are still upon our rolls over half a million living veterans and the dependents of over 265,000 deceased veterans who are in receipt of monthly pensions, and 47,000 veterans still remain in our hospitals and homes. Liberalizing regulations approved by the President just last week will serve to increase these totals.

All men who acquired their disabilities in the military or naval service, as well as the dependents of those whose deaths are due to their service, will continue to be adequately cared for, while others of the more seriously disabled veterans are entitled to either a pension, hospital, or domiciliary care.

However, benefits and medical care are now restricted as regards veterans whose partial disability is in no way due to their service; and this procedure, which is in direct consonance with the earliest traditions and customs of our country, coincides with the popular demand of today as influenced by the exigencies of the major national emergency through which we have been passing. Previous to the passage of this legislation and the President's action, hundreds of letters came to me from all over the country voicing strenuous objection to payments being made to veterans who saw no actual combat service; veterans who were able-bodied enough to care for themselves; veterans legally rated as partially disabled, yet able to follow employment requiring physical fitness; and, finally, objection to the domicile in national homes of veterans in receipt of the maximum rate of pension.

It was quite evident that the general feeling was that since thousands of other citizens of our country also were in need of aid through no fault of their own, the veterans who were not disabled by reason of their service should revert to their original status of citizens and meet their difficulties in that capacity along with the others.

It is in such circumstances as these that the true character of citizenship is best manifest. It is quite generally conceded, I believe, that the highest duty and privilege of citizenship is service to one's country in time of great emergency, and it is quite as necessary for us to recognize a national emergency when it occurs in time of peace as when it involves war with another nation. We are passing through just such an emergency, and each difficulty must be met with courage and patience, and a steadfast determination to win through—which shall persist in spite of all obstacles, for we shall win through. America has never failed or quite, and she will not do so now, but whatever is accomplished under the wise and courageous leadership of our President must be achieved by the united and devoted efforts of all the citizenry.

There has never been a time in the history of our country when patriotism and unselfish consideration of the welfare of the country as a whole was more urgently needed than it is today, and it behooves each of us to give earnest consideration to his or her attitude and endeavor as a citizen.

We are apt to take our patriotism for granted and our citizenship as a status rather than as a personal responsibility, but to be effective in either, we should be constantly active, vigilant, and diligent. Patriotism is not a thing to don like a garment in peace time or to buckle on like a sword in time of war, but must be innate and permanent, not superficial or transitory. Patriotism we see as the very basis of good citizenship. It comprehends and connotes love of country and reverence for its laws; recognition of civic duties; and, defense of country in time of war, not alone as a duty but as the highest privilege of citizenship in fulfillment of an acknowledged obligation to the Government for benefits and protection enjoyed as a citizen.

Service to one's country cannot be evaluated in dollars and cents, but should be spontaneous, without thought of reward. Neither can our gratitude to those who served be rated in such a manner. To the veteran who comes through war unscathed, suffering no impairment, the Government owes its gratitude but—until the time comes, if it should, when assistance is needed—nothing more than it owes to any other loyal citizen. We take pride in providing care and relief for those who have become disabled as the result of rendering war service, but we should as a Nation take equal pride in not seeking Government relief unless we need it.

The principle that service to one's country must thereafter be rewarded by the country, irrespective of need, is contrary to the most elementary tenets of good citizenship, but such expectation with increasing fulfillment has been so widely prevalent after each war in which we have engaged, it has finally attained the prestige of a tradition. We need to get back to that community of interest and ideals upon which our country was founded—based upon the principle that the welfare of the individual was assured only by the welfare of the group. The instinct of self-preservation—aside from any sentiment—taught our forefathers the necessity of standing together. We need to get back to that unity of purpose which perforce held the Colonies together against the menace of outside foes.

We think of ourselves too much only as individuals instead of units in a social whole and correspondingly visualize and pursue our interests more or less selfishly, oblivious of the community of interest which should prevail. There is a clear call to us all today in the conditions which have become more and more prevalent, constituting a menace not only to our ideals and traditions but actually to our security as a nation. On every hand we hear or see evidence of unrest or disregard for the laws of the land, of this or that racket, and one of the most disturbing features prominent in these conditions is the fact that so many of the participants are the young. Someone has said, "The worst that war has done is not the murder of a million bodies but the maiming of a million souls"; and when we stop to consider the moral deterioration that has developed among the youth of the country for lack of schooling, occupation, home care, and employment, we must realize that the maiming of these millions of souls is comparable to the devastation of war. This unrest is not going to be stilled except by a conscientious, deliberate, and determined effort on the part of the citizenry.

Perhaps some of you are even now asking yourselves, "What can I do about it?" and I assure you there is need for each of us to do something very definite about it if we are to fulfill our duties and avail ourselves of our privileges as citizens. There is need for a new spirit of public service and unselfishness that will predominate and so bring about the overthrow of the self-seeker and the greedy—a new and higher standard of civic relationship and civic responsibility.

A good citizen mindful of his country's tradition should consider the significance of its position among the nations of the world as well as its potentialities as an individual nation and, building day by day on this background, assist in preserving the integrity and prestige of his government.

That this responsibility is being widely neglected is evident on every hand. Disregard of law, ridicule of our Congress, of the judiciary, and other men in high public office are prevalent, all of which tend to destroy that confidence in those responsible for the machinery of our Government, which, if carried to the extreme, will undermine the very foundations of good government.

We all know that the American people are much attached to their Government and in every great emergency they have come forward to its defense in the fullest measure. Yet in time of peace, the tendency is to belittle, and interest wanes in those fundamentals of good Government that are essential to its progress and stability. If we are to continue as the great Nation that we have a right to be, it is necessary that there be developed among our people a greater interest in public affairs, a greater appreciation of the value of citizenship.

Patriotism should be an integral part of our every feeling at all times, for it is merely another name for those qualities of soul which make a man in peace or in war, by day or by night, consider his duty to his fellows, and to the Nation through which his and their loftiest aspirations may find fitting expression.

Young America should be taught to love America, to support its Constitution and its laws; to learn that the violation of its laws is desecration of all that is good, and destructive of those high ideals fought for by the fathers of our Nation. Next to love of country should come respect for our institutions and for those who are charged with the responsibility of government. It is equally important, of course, that those selected for public service should be able to command the confidence essential to inspire proper respect.

However, all these ideals and principles should have their inception in the home and be fostered to the utmost in the schoolroom. I am afraid we expect too much from our teachers in comparison with the compensation and position awarded them. It is of the utmost importance that the initial impression given to the children of America emanate from teachers whose ideals are based upon the true ideals of Americanism, and they should receive salaries commensurate with their responsibilities.

I am of the opinion that the responsibilities patiently and capably borne by the teachers of America are greatly underestimated by the public generally—and certainly as a class they are notoriously underpaid. That the entire educational system of our country has been seriously affected by the prevailing conditions is indicated in the results of a country-wide survey made by the United States Commissioner of Education showing that 800 public schools are closed entirely and 11,000 are operating on a school year of less than 6 months.

When we realize that the entire number of schools operating on full schedule is so utterly inadequate to care properly for the youth of our country, the spectacle of these silent schoolrooms is little less than appalling. There is no activity of our country of greater or more far-reaching importance than efficient functioning of the school. Citizenship is born there. Opportunity and facilities for at least a high-school education should be available to every child in the United States, and it should be so completely and freely accessible that no boy or girl need be deprived of its benefits for lack of textbooks or other necessary school supplies. There is no question but that schools are the very foundation of our citizenship and what young America is taught in them will be the basis of what they do and say later in life.

Notwithstanding our vast and varied national endeavors, I believe the Federal Government has had too little active participation in the function of education, and it is highly gratifying to note indications that under the present administration the scope of Federal participation in educational matters may be broadened, and its activities increased.

Two definite steps in this direction are seen in the educational work now being conducted in the Civilian Conservation Corps, and in the recent establishment of the National Workers' Education Bureau. In the Civilian Conservation Corps, educational advisers will determine at first hand the desires and needs of the corps in educational matters, and efforts will be made to provide such instruction as the members of the corps will be able to acquire in what would otherwise be their idle time, evenings, and rainy days when the regular outdoor work cannot be carried on. The National Workers' Bureau is providing summer courses for workers, and special instruction for the teachers to train them to meet the workers' needs, for instruction in English, social science, current economic problems, and all those things that are closely related to their daily lives.

In a word, the National Workers' Bureau hopes to prepare these young people for intelligent citizenship by giving them a comprehensive knowledge of what is going on around them in social, industrial, and economic activities, and teaching them to think for themselves.

The work is projected through State superintendents of education, and the classes are held in public schools in the regular vacation periods. I feel that this is a highly important work, holding unpredictably splendid possibilities for the future, and I, for one, shall follow the results of its efforts with intense interest.

I feel most earnestly that every step of our educational progress should be outlined in a definite national policy which would include practical instruction in the machinery of government—civic, State, and national—and in order that all educational activities of the country might be properly coordinated, the Government's policy should prescribe minimum requirements which would need to be met by all States wishing their educational programs to be accredited under the Federal system.

We are prone to manifest much pride in our institutions of learning; and while this pride is a worthy one, I do not feel that we are doing nearly enough in the way of education. We have not nearly enough schools; and in those that we have, we do not give our young people adequate preparation for the business of living. Education has been defined as "preparation for the art of living", but, too often, it is merely a sort of intellectual interior decorating.

Education should furnish a definite pattern for living, at least outlining something of the mechanics and technique of that most intricate process; and, with all the cultural embellishment that a boy or girl can and will absorb, there should be always a definite groundwork of some craft, trade, or profession through which they may not only be able to obtain a livelihood but contribute something of practical usefulness to the community of which they are a part. In other words, they should be taught how to be good citizens.

To be a good citizen requires the closest possible adherence to the ideals of Americanism, loyalty in the utmost to those responsible for government, obedience to the laws of the land, and cheerful performance of any public duty required.

We see today entirely too many manifestations of a spirit that is the antithesis of good citizenship. Are we to conclude that the existence of such conditions indicates lack of solidarity in American life; and, if so, must we blame that lack on our long adherence to the melting-pot policy conceived in unselfishness and pursued in the development of that freedom which is the cornerstone of our national structure? Is this precious and dearly bought freedom degenerating into a laxity that is penetrating and polluting the most vital elements of our national life?

The economic depression has been a fertile field for these elements to prosper, and with such fertilization discontent has spread, with acute occurrences, in this country as well as many others, and these occurrences, while sporadic and more or less transitory in character, are not to be ignored with impunity.

Never before has there been greater need or greater opportunities for the manifestation of Americanism, inviolate and militant, to combat and neutralize the activities and influence of antagonistic forces which would destroy the very fabric of our social structure and tear down the ideals we have reared through the years of our development. Our country was founded on certain great principles fundamental in character. It seems to me in times like those through which we are passing, it is imperative to consider these principles and see to it that we shape our lives in accord with them.

The form and functions of our Government are the result of the independent activity and thought of the people, but with the lapse of time we have settled back into our own more restricted lines of endeavor, leaving the activities of the Government in the hands of a few who have made such matters more or less their life work. It is time that we not only participate individually and actively in the various functions of our civic and national life, but it is more than time that we should establish a definite system, national in scope, which should insure the proper education and preparation of our youth for such eventual duties.

There is a close relationship between education, citizenship, and veterans' relief. The fact that we have a veterans' problem to deal with is due to the fact that we have had either national or international conflicts, which have made it necessary that our citizens be called to the colors. It may be too much to expect within a reasonable time, even with a perfect system of education and the development of the highest type in the standards of citizenship, that we should be able in the future to avoid such conflicts. It is the sincere desire, most certainly, of those who have served in previous conflicts that we may reach such a point. Most assuredly we should make every endeavor to do so.

For these reasons I have developed in this talk to you the matter of education and citizenship, because I feel that there is a marked and direct relationship that will have a most important influence on the future of our country as well as of the other nations of the world.

And now, my friends, before I bid you good night, I wish to thank you for your attention. I earnestly hope that some of you may perceive as a result of these remarks new opportunities for service to your fellow men in your community and that together we may strive hopefully on, keeping ever in mind that ideal, so aptly phrased by the immortal Tennyson:

"Ah! when shall all men's good
Be each man's rule, and universal peace
Lie like a shaft of light across the land,
And like a lane of beams athwart the sea,
Thro' all the circle of the golden year?"

TO PROHIBIT EMPLOYEES OF NATIONAL POLITICAL COMMITTEES FROM HOLDING GOVERNMENT POSITIONS

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. TRUAX. In that time, Mr. Speaker, I ask the Clerk to read a resolution which I have sent to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Joint Resolution 241

To prohibit members and employees of any national political committee from holding Government positions

Resolved, etc., That no officer, member, or employee of a national committee of any political party shall be eligible to hold any Government position, directly or indirectly, under the jurisdiction of any department, bureau, board, commission, or independent agency of the Government.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that business in order on Calendar Wednesday be dispensed with tomorrow.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

IMPEACHMENT OF FEDERAL JUDGE IN MINNESOTA

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 2 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Mr. Speaker, on yesterday I introduced a resolution to impeach a Federal judge in the State of Minnesota for enjoining the State of Minnesota from investigating blue-sky stock transactions by a banking group headed by Wiggins' Chase National Bank of New York. Yesterday afternoon this same judge issued an additional injunction restraining Hennepin County, the county in which the city of Minneapolis is located, from going ahead to investigate stock sales that have been put over. Stock which sold to the people of the State of Minnesota at millions of dollars, at $100 a share, are now selling at $6 a share. Our blue-sky commission started an investigation of stock sales in the State of Minnesota, and this Federal judge has enjoined them from going ahead, either criminally or civilly, against those robbers.

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, to introduce into the RECORD another telegram which I received this morning setting forth the later injunction which followed the original, issued several days ago.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

The telegram referred to is as follows:

F. H. SHOEMAKER,
1005 House Office Building,
Washington, D.C.:

Additional injunction today restraining Hennepin County Attorney Goff from starting any action against Northwest Bancorporation. Such proceedings by bank corporation are an admission of guilt. If you can follow suggestions, you will render Minnesota a service. Can you put it over? Answer.

S. T. WOLFE.

NAVY DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL—FISCAL YEAR 1935

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H.R. 7199) making appropriations for the Navy Department and the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and for other purposes; and pending that motion I should like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SWICK] if we cannot agree now upon some limit for general debate. I may say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that I have made inquiry of the timekeeper and found that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SWICK] has used 2 hours and 31 minutes, and we have used 2 hours and 14 minutes on this side. I am hopeful, if it meets with the approval of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that we can agree on 2 hours and 15 minutes, 1 hour to be controlled by the gentleman from Pennsylvania and 1 hour and 15 minutes by myself.

Mr. SWICK. That will be perfectly agreeable to this side.

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that general debate on this bill continue for 2 hours and 15 minutes, 1 hour to be controlled by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SWICK] and 1 hour and 15 minutes by myself.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. AYRES].

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H.R. 7199, the Navy Department appropriation bill, with Mr. LANHAM in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN].

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to commend Mr. Arthur Brisbane for statements under his signature, appearing in the newspapers of the country on yesterday morning. I will read what Mr. Brisbane said:

Once more be it said, the Government, instead of insisting on bond issues and gigantic interest payments, could and should issue its own currency and pay bills with that. The Government's promise to pay, on green paper bearing no interest would be exactly as good as its promise to pay—plus interest—on yellow paper, and issue currency, instead of a crippling bond issue would help Government credit. A Government, free of a four or five hundred million dollar annual interest load, would have better credit than with that annual interest burden added to its other obligations.

Who are the congenital usurers, money lenders, and interest grabbers that persuade the President to issue bonds, instead of currency? If the currency would be "inflation" then the bonds would be inflation, plus the added inflation of ten billions in interest charges, added to the ten billions of principal, before the debt could be paid off. An unnecessary interest burden might be the last straw on Uncle Sam's back, leading to a real smash and a dollar really cheap.

In truth and in fact, the Government's interest burden this year will amount to approximately a billion dollars. So Mr. Brisbane raises this question: Why should the Government pay that billion dollars in interest? I want to quote in substance what Mr. Edison said a few years ago when he was asked to go to Muscle Shoals and inspect that project for Mr. Henry Ford, who was contemplating leasing it from the Government for 99 years.

While he was at Muscle Shoals, the New York Times quoted this recognized man of genius and wonderful inventor, whose analysis will be respected by everyone, as follows:

If the currency is issued, $30,000,000, for financing the finishing construction of Muscle Shoals work, it will be the proper thing to do. Once the currency method is tried in raising money for public improvements, the country will never go back to the bond method.

Make it perfectly clear that I am not advocating any changes in the banks and banking. Banks are a mighty good thing. They are essential to the commerce of the country. It is the money broker, the money profiteer, the private banker, that I oppose. They gain their power through a fictitious and false value given to gold. Gold is a relic of Julius Caesar, and interest is an invention of Satan.

Gold is intrinsically of less utility than most metals. The probable reason why it is retained as the basis of money is that it is easy to control. And it is the control of money that constitutes the money question. It is the control of money that is the root of all evil.

Gold and money are separate things, you see. Gold is the trick mechanism by which you can control money.

Gold is not money until the people of the United States and other nations put their stamp of approval on it. It is not the gold that makes the dollar. It is the dollar that makes the gold. Take the dollar out of the gold, and leave it merely yellow metal, and it sinks in value. Gold is established by law, just as silver was, and gold could be disestablished, demonetized by law, just as silver was. When silver was demonetized the former so-called "dollar" became worth about 50 cents.

There is a complete set of misleading slogans kept on hand for outbreaks of common sense among the people. The people are so ignorant of what they think are the intricacies of the money system that they are easily impressed by big words. There would be new shieks of fiat money, and paper money, and greenbackism, and the rest of it—the same old cries with which the people have been shouted down from the beginning.

But maybe we have passed beyond the time when the thoughtful 2 percent—you know, I gather from my questionnaire that only 2 percent of the people think [and Mr. Edison smiled broadly]—maybe they cannot shout down American thinkers any longer. The only dynamite that works in this country is the dynamite of a sound idea. I think we are getting a sound idea on the money question. The people have an instinct which tells them that something is wrong, and that the wrong somehow centers in money. They have an instinct, also, which tells them a proposal is made in their interest or against them.

Now, as to paper money, so-called; everyone knows that paper money is the money of civilized people. The higher you go in civilization the less actual money you see. It is all bills and checks. What are bills and checks? Mere promises and orders. What are they based on? Principally on two sources—human energy and the productive earth. Humanity and the soil—these are the only real bases of money.

Do not allow them to confuse you with the cry of "paper money." The danger of paper money is precisely the danger of gold—if you get too much, it is no good. They say we have all the gold of the world now. Well, what good does it do us? When America gets all the chips in a game the game stops. We would be better off it we had less gold. Indeed, we are trying to get rid of our gold to start something going. But the trade machine is at present jammed. Too much paper money operates the same way. There is just one rule for money, and that is to have enough to carry all the legitimate trade that is waiting to move. Too little or too much are both bad. But enough to move trade, enough to prevent stagnation on the one hand and not enough to permit speculation on the other hand, is the proper ratio.

Then you see no difference between currency and Government bonds? Mr. Edison was asked.

Yes; there is a difference. but it is neither the likeness or the difference that will determine the matter; the attack will be directed against thinking of bonds and currency together and comparing them. If people ever get to thinking of bonds and bills at the same time the game is up.

Now here is Ford proposing to finance Muscle Shoals by an issue of currency. Very well; let us suppose for a moment that Congress follows his proposal. Personally I don't think Congress has imagination enough to do it, but let us suppose that it does. The required sum is authorized—say $30,000,000. The bills are issued directly by the Government, as all money ought to be. When the workmen are paid off they receive these United States bills. When the material is bought it is paid in these United States bills. Except that perhaps the bills may have the engraving of a water dam instead of a railroad train and a ship as some of the Federal Reserve notes have, they will be the same as any other currency put out by the Government; that is, they will be money. They will be based on the public wealth already in Muscle Shoals; they will be retired by the earnings of the power dam. That is, the people of the United States will have all that they put into Muscle Shoals and all that they can take out for centuries—the endless wealth-making water power of that great Tennessee River—with no tax and no increase of the national debt.

But suppose Congress does not see this, what then? Mr. Edison was asked.

Then Congress must fall back on the old way of doing business. It must authorize an issue of bonds. That is, it must go out to the money brokers and borrow enough of our own national currency to complete great national resources, and we must pay interest to the money brokers for the use of our own money.

That is to say, under the old way, any time we wish to add to the national wealth we are compelled to add to the national debt.

Now, that is what Henry Ford wants to prevent. He thinks it is stupid, and so do I, that for the loan of $30,000,000 of their own money the people of the United States should be compelled to pay $66,000,000—that is what it amounts to with interest. People who will not turn a shovelful of dirt nor contribute a pound of material will collect more money from the United States than will the people who supply the material and do the work. That is the terrible thing about interest. In all our great bond issues the interest is always greater than the principal. All of the great public works cost more than twice the actual cost on that account. Under the present system of doing business we simply add 120 to 150 percent to the stated cost.

But here is the point: If our Nation can issue a dollar bond, it can issue a dollar bill. The element that makes the bond good makes the bill good also. The difference between the bond and the bill is that the bond lets the money brokers collect twice the amount of the bond and an additional 20 percent, whereas the currency pays nobody but those who directly contribute to Muscle Shoals in some useful way.

If the Government issues bonds it simply induces the money brokers to draw $30,000,000 out of the other channels of trade and turn it into Muscle Shoals; if the Government issues currency, it provides itself with enough money to increase the national wealth at Muscle Shoals without disturbing the business of the country. And in doing this it increases its income without adding a penny to its debt.

It is absurd to say that our country can issue $30,000,000 in bonds and not $30,000,000 in currency. Both are promises to pay; but one promise fattens the usurer, and the other helps the people. If the currency issued by the Government were no good, then the bonds issued would be no good either. It is a terrible situation when the Government to increase the national wealth, must go into debt and submit to ruinous interest charges at the hands of men who control the fictitious values of gold.

Look at it another way. If the Government issue bonds, the brokers will sell them. The bonds will be negotiable; they will be considered as gilt-edged paper. Why? Because the Government is behind them, but who is behind the Government? The people. Therefore it is the people who constitute the basis of Government credit. Why then cannot the people have the benefit of their own gilt-edged credit by receiving non-interest-bearing currency on Muscle Shoals, instead of the bankers receiving the benefit of the people's credit in interest-bearing bonds?

The people must pay anyway; why should they be compelled to pay twice, as the bond system compels them to pay? The people of the United States always accept their Government's currency. If the United States Government will adopt this policy of increasing its national wealth without contributing to the interest collector—for the whole national debt is made up on interest charges—then you will see an era of progress and prosperity in this country such as could never have come otherwise.

I wish every Member of Congress—House and Senate—would take the time to read this statement carefully. It is the best statement on the important issues before the people today that I have ever read.

PAY NATIONAL DEBT WITH NEW MONEY

I know that if you were to make the statement here this morning that we could issue $22,000,000,000 in money and take up all the Government bonds, many of our people would be alarmed and say: "Why, that will call for $220,000,000,000 of inflation; it will absolutely destroy our country." And according to the present banking set-up that argument could not be satisfactorily answered. It could cause, I admit, a potential inflation of $220,000,000,000. But there is a way of correcting this situation. We could pay off the national debt, if it were desired, and not have a dollar of inflation. Here is the way I would do it if it were within my power to do it. At least, I can suggest how it may be done.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Did the gentleman mean to state $220,000,000,000?

Mr. PATMAN. Yes. Twenty-two billion dollars is the amount of our national debt and the banks can expand each dollar 10 times, so this could call for a potential inflation of $220,000,000,000. The banks can lend $10 to every $1 of actual money in their possession.

Today we have in circulation, theoretically, $5,000,000,000 in money. The banks of the country hold less than $1,000,000,000 in their vaults to pay their depositors, but that is not all the money they have. They have approximately $2,000,000,000 with the Federal Reserve System that they can get very quickly for the purpose of paying their depositors. The banks owe their depositors approximately $40,000,000,000.

Now, suppose we were to adopt a program of gradually retiring the national debt with new money—and it should be done gradually; it should not be done quickly—in the end we will have paid $22,000,000,000 to the holders of Government tax-exempt interest-bearing bonds. They will get this payment in new money. This money will go very quickly to the banks in the country and be deposited. Then instead of the banks having on deposit $40,000,000,000 they will have on deposit $62,000,000,000; and instead of having $3,000,000,000 with which to pay those deposits they will have $25,000,000,000, a ratio of 1 to 2½.

As you issue this money and put it in circulation you can prevent inflation by raising the reserve requirements of the banks, so you can say then that no bank can issue more than $2.50 for every $1 of reserve; and there would not necessarily be any undue inflation at all. Why should there be? As you increase the volume of money you raise the reserve requirements of the banks. You can absolutely prevent undue inflation; and then instead of people having to rely upon borrowing money from the banks and paying interest on it they could have sufficient money for hand-to-hand transactions and not be reduced to barter.

MONEY FOR TRADE AND PRODUCTION

Furthermore, the people who hold $22,000,000,000 in bonds when they receive this money will want to put it to some useful purpose. In order to do this they will have to invest it; it will be forced into the channels of production and trade rather than being invested in tax-exempt interest-bearing bonds.

WHAT IS THE ANSWER?

Now, if there is any answer to this argument, I wish somebody would make it. I have heard this question discussed all over the country by the greatest economists and financiers, and I have every reason to believe that it is sound. I see no reason why it is not sound.

Why should the Government pay interest on its own obligations? Think of the inconsistency of the Government issuing a $1,000 bond and selling it to a bank here in Washington, and the bank in Washington taking the same bond, which is a debt that is secured by the credit of this Nation, to the Treasury, and getting $1,000 in new money, with the exception of 5 percent that is left there as a reserve.

SECURITY BEHIND MONEY

What secures this new money? Nothing on earth except the Government obligation, which is a Government debt. In other words, the money is issued upon a debt of the Government. So why issue that bond? Why not issue the money and let it be paid directly, for upon it there will be no interest? Let me repeat, Why issue a bond, sell the bond, and then issue money upon the bond or collateral security? Why not issue the money in the first instance?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield.

Mr. O'CONNOR. The gentleman is touching upon a subject to which some people in this country have given a great deal of thought—why the Government should pay interest on its obligations. Some of our best economists cannot understand that, because the Government can take the money. Furthermore, the people are more concerned with the return of principal than they are with the earning of interest, especially after the experience of recent years. Now, instead of retiring the national debt by new currency, why should not the Government educate the people of America to take its obligations without interest? Because many people cannot understand why the Government ever should pay interest on its obligations. However, I could not go as far as the gentleman in issuing currency. Why could not the Government reissue obligations without interest?

Mr. PATMAN. What is the difference in the main? The gentleman says he would be willing for the bonds to be issued without interest. They are negotiable; they will be used as money.

Mr. O'CONNOR. They might be termed bonds. They might not be redeemable out of the Treasury for certain periods of time, unlike currency.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield.

Mr. KVALE. Will the gentleman tell the Committee what he thinks is the essential difference between small, non-interest-bearing bonds in circulation and currency of like denomination?

Mr. PATMAN. There is no difference except this: If currency is issued it may be used by the banks for the issuance of additional deposit currency while the bonds could not be used for that purpose.

There are many ways in which we can do this, either by the issuance of bonds of small denomination, non-interest-bearing bonds, or the issuance of money. Regardless of what you call the obligations so issued, the same principle is involved. The people do sufficient business with the Government to safely authorize such currency issue to be redeemable in services or used for taxpaying purposes. It could be made good for the purchase of stamps or any kind of mail service, payments due the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, taxes due the Treasury, including income, inheritance, alcoholic beverage, gasoline, check, and tobacco, and for many other purposes.

FEDERAL RESERVE BANKS

I want to say a word about the Federal Reserve System. The Federal Reserve member banks have never invested more than $160,000,000 in the System. It cannot be claimed that they have been doing the enormous business they have on that small capitalization. This is insignificant; it is nothing compared to the fifty to one hundred billion dollars worth of business done by these institutions. Mr. W. P. G. Harding, Governor of the Federal Reserve Board, on June 28, 1922, testified before the Banking and Currency Committee of the House, and in this testimony he made certain statements.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to insert as a part of my remarks certain extracts from his testimony, as well as Mr. Edison's quoted statement.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

SPECIAL PRIVILEGES

Mr. PATMAN. He testified that the member banks had only invested some 3 percent of their capital and surplus in the Federal Reserve banks. They were not required, as contemplated by the law, to invest at least 6 percent, and Mr. Harding stated that it is not the intention of the Federal Reserve Board to ever call upon those member banks for the other 3 percent because the Federal Reserve banks do not need it. Why? Because they are backed by the credit of this Nation. Every Federal Reserve note that they have issued is not redeemable by the Federal Reserve banks. No. They do not promise to redeem them. Those notes are redeemable by the Government of the United States. It is a mortgage on all the property of all the people of this Nation. It is a mortgage on all the incomes of all the people. It is a blanket mortgage. They get the benefit of the Government credit; therefore it enables them to do business on this very small, insignificant capitalization. They also use this great privilege free of charge and pay no taxes, except on the small amount of real estate they own.

The Federal Reserve banks during the last 2 or 3 years have purchased $2,437,000,000 worth of Government securities. This is the amount that they held at the end of December. What did they buy those securities with? They bought those securities with Government credit; they bought Government obligations with Government credit, and the Government is paying the Federal Reserve banks interest on obligations that were bought with the credit of the Government. Is that right? Can you justify it? Is there any way on earth that you can give an excuse for that kind of thing? You cannot. There is no way to do it. The Federal Reserve banks will get enough each year as interest on those bonds to pay one half their entire paid-in capital stock. In other words, the equivalent of a 50-percent dividend is given to them each year on Government obligations alone and not have their $160,000,000 invested at all. There is no way for you to give a reasonable excuse for the continuance of such a situation.

TAKE OVER FEDERAL RESERVE SYSTEM

The Federal Reserve banks, I believe, should be taken over by the Government. I think the activities of the Federal Reserve banks and the Reconstruction Finance Corporation should be coordinated in some way so that the credit of this great Nation can be used in the interest of all the people instead of allowing it to be used for a special few.

NATIONAL INCOME FELL 40 PERCENT IN 4 YEARS

The Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce of the Department of Commerce has just made public a report showing that total income distributed to individuals throughout the Nation was $81,000,000,000 in 1929, but dropped to $49,000,000,000 in 1932, a decline of 40 percent.

Wages have suffered most severely in the general decline since 1929, with a falling off of 60 percent in those industries in which it was possible to segregate this item. Salaries dropped 40 percent, much less rapidly than wages, with the most severe curtailment occuring in 1932.

A significant divergence in declining trends is apparent as between labor income and property income; by 1932 the former had fallen off 40 percent, while property income distributed receded by 30 percent.

Wages totaled $52,867,000,000 in 1929; $48,688,000,000 in 1930; $41,027,000,000 in 1931, and $31,595,000,000 in 1932.

Income distributed by agriculture dropped from $6,341,000,000 in 1929 to $3,442,000,000 in 1932. In mining the drop was from $2,123,000,000 in 1929 to $851,000,000 in 1932. The figures for manufacturing were $18,157,000,000 in 1929 and $8,373,000,000 in 1932, while income paid out by construction decreased from $3,135,000,000 in 1929 to $864,000,000 in 1932.

INTEREST PAYMENTS REMAIN STATIONARY

On the other hand, interest payment remained almost stationary during the 4 years of the report, being $5,687,000,000 in 1929, $5,826,000,000 in 1930, $5,662,000,000 in 1931, and $5,506,000,000 in 1932. This part of the report shows that the people will meet their contractual obligations if it is at all possible for them to do so. It further shows that there was more money paid out each of the years for interest than there was actual money in circulation.

Mr. CARY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BLACK].

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, next to the group of persons who spend all of their time thinking up ways to exploit the consumer, I believe the most dangerous are those who, under the guise of protecting the consumer, attempt to destroy honest industry. In the latter group are those who write books for personal profit exposing industry.

On behalf of the consumer these self-appointed protectors, who, as far as is known, have contributed nothing to the progress of this country, would with one stroke destroy industry and set themselves up as the supreme court to render decisions as to the worth of consumer products.

Strange as it may seem, I believe that a very large part of our manufacturers who make goods for public consumption are honest and have the consumer's interest at heart. How could they survive and prosper if they did not please the consumer? After all, merit is the gage of consumer acceptance.

I do not believe in discontinuing the service of advertising, for it is through this service that the consumer is kept informed and publications maintain their high standards. It may be necessary to control advertising to some extent, but it must not be killed as a consumer's service.

There has been an inspired clamoring for food and drugs legislation. To bring this about a few horrible examples of bad products and trade practices have been exhibited throughout the country by a Government department. A considerable sum of money has been expended in this campaign to stir up a feeling against our present Pure Food and Drugs Act, which is recognized by legal authorities throughout the world as an effective measure for consumer protection. Other countries have studied this law and have used it as a model for their food and drugs laws.

Yet the public would be led to believe that they have been unprotected; that they have been victims of a conspiracy on the part of food and drugs manufacturers to flood the country with deleterious products and poisonous foods. The fact is that no country in the world has a higher standard for food and drugs than has the United States.

Ownership of the industries in this group is represented by thousands of consumer stockholders. They give employment to millions of consumers in their own and allied industries. Millions have been invested by these industries in research and methods to improve their products and to bring them to the public conveniently and fresh.

It is difficult to believe that opponents of the suggested drastic legislation are all disreputable and dishonest manufacturers. They do have a selfish interest, perhaps, just as those zealots who write books for profit have a selfish interest. If the latter succeed in killing the service of advertising, the public would depend upon them for information about products of every description.

Let us have food and drug legislation that will stamp out fakes, frauds, parasites, deceivers, but let us have legislation that is not only fair to the public but to the people who try to do business with the public. Let us amend the Food and Drugs Act and let us have a Food and Drug Administration that can enforce the law and not one that spends so much of its time drafting and lobbying for new legislation designed to put honest industry in a strait-jacket.

PENDING FOOD AND DRUG LEGISLATION

One question involved in the dispute over proposed new food and drug legislation is whether we shall have legislation by Congress and enforcement by courts, as now, or legislation and enforcement by a Government officer in the Department of Agriculture.

The Federal food and drugs law was enacted in 1906. It prohibits the shipment or sale in interstate commerce of adulterated and misbranded food and drugs. Under it, the Government has instituted over 22,000 cases, and truthfulness on packages, labels, and circulars has, in the main, been achieved.

A criticism of the existing law is that it does not apply to advertising—that a manufacturer may make claims through the press and over the radio that he does not and cannot make on cartons and labels. It is easy to understand this criticism. Legislation to curb it seems necessary, although the codes of the various industries affected provide for such control.

Another complaint of the present law is that it does not apply to cosmetics, which have developed into a major industry since the law was enacted.

Instead of offering amendments to the existing law to effect changes in these various respects, or instead of a new bill to meet the same purposes, the Department of Agriculture brought out and sponsored a bill to repeal the existing law, change the entire theory underlying it, and set up a new, intricate, and involved law which would vest in the Secretary of Agriculture broad and almost unsupervised legislative, executive, and judicial powers. It is known as the "Tugwell bill."

Briefly stated, the criticism of the Tugwell bill is that it is a skeletonized bill which defines in general, broad terms, spheres of authority, and then empowers a Government officer, by regulations of his own making, to round out and expand (1) the legislative provisions of the bill, (2) the executive powers, and (3) the judicial functions.

The bill was heard before a subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Commerce in Washington on the 7th and 8th of last December. Many witnesses, representing publishers, advertising agencies, manufacturers of foods, drugs and cosmetics, trade associations, women's clubs, other groups, and the public, spoke in opposition to the bill as drawn. With few exceptions, if any, the speakers declared their agreement with the avowed purposes and aims of the bill, and addressed their criticisms to specific provisions of the proposed legislation.

THE REVISED TUGWELL BILL (S. 2000)

On January 4 Senator COPELAND introduced in the Senate a new bill drawn in the light of criticisms and suggestions expressed at the hearings. This new bill, identified as Senate bill no. 2000, is evidence of the validity of many of the criticisms made of the Tugwell bill.

The Copeland bill is a revision of the Tugwell bill, which it has followed, section for section. In some sections the language is retained.

The substantive provisions of the old bill are changed somewhat in the new bill. As in the case of the original Tugwell bill, the purpose and effect of this new measure can be stated in a few words: (1) Bureaucratic domination and control of the food, drug, and cosmetic industries is retained, hidden somewhat, but any careful analysis of the new bill discloses this fact; (2) it is even more adapted to the prevention of self-administration of drugs than if the original bill had been enacted; (3) there are more complete provisions to secure a reversal of existing court decisions than are found in the original bill; (4) the regulations of advertising is to be transferred to the Department of Agriculture and in as great an extent as in the original bill. Publishers and advertising agencies are still permitted to evade responsibility by turning State's evidence.

The purpose and effect of the revised Tugwell bill insofar as its substantive provisions are concerned are the same as the original.

The procedural provisions of the revised Tugwell bill are changed in some particulars.

There has been retained in the new Tugwell bill the provisions of the old bill relating to permits, factory inspection, multiple seizures, penalties for technical violations, injunction proceedings, provisions relating to exports, and publicity.

The definition of advertising still includes representations of opinion, bringing in a wide range of discretionary interpretations that will tend to suppress even necessary descriptive expressions in advertising copy.

The term "palliation" included in this bill does not convey any specific meaning in law, as no definite knowledge exists as to the exact pathological effects of certain drugs upon the human system.

The requirement that the label be supported by demonstrable scientific facts, subjects all labels to a discretionary determination of the basis for such facts.

Under the misbranding section, a drug is deemed to be misbranded solely because it may fail to carry a word or statement which may tend to avoid adulteration or misbranding as viewed by the administrators of the law. The discretionary interpretations that may result from the application of this provision provide no assurance to the manufacturer that his label may be acceptable for any extended period of time.

Food standards are still to be prescribed by regulations promulgated by the Secretary. It may be pertinent to ask why such standards cannot be determined at the time the bill is drafted. Surely the manufacturer—with millions of dollars invested in scientifically developed processes for foods—is entitled to reasonable assurance that his investment may not be worthless at the scratch of a pen.

Manufacturers should have no objection to a declaration of substances possessing stimulant-depressant properties, but the wisdom of granting discretionary powers to a Secretary for the determination of other drugs to come within this category should be seriously questioned.

A drug is deemed to be misbranded if it fails to bear complete and explicit directions for use. It should be noted that the completeness and explicitness of the directions are solely to be determined by regulations promulgated by the Secretary, whose discretionary powers are then further broadened to include such indefinite requirements as the determination of what may be dangerous to health, dosage, or "methods of administration." The Secretary must then become prescribing physician for the administration of all drugs.

If an advertisement is unmistakably false, it is not within the province of the Secretary to declare it legal because of its appearance in a scientific publication. Yet provision is made in this bill specifically exempting such violations.

The exemption of minor violations from the institution of libel or injunction proceedings is, of course, at the discretion of the Secretary, with no requirement actually limiting his powers however minor the violation may be. To afford protection to industry it would seem desirable that some provision be included to prevent arbitrary or capricious actions of the administration in these "minor" instances. There is no reason to suppose that all officials will remain impartial and unprejudiced in the administration of this law.

Relative to seizures, protection is afforded administrative officials against damage suits resulting from the discretionary application of provisions of the law. In an equitably drafted law no cause for action would arise against an administrative official. This provision, therefore, encourages oppressive and bureaucratic interpretations under the cloak of immunity from personal liability.

The practice of instituting simultaneous seizures in many jurisdictions would be continued to the injury of legitimate industry without tangible benefits to the public interest. Multiple seizures should be authorized only in such cases where adulteration is immediately dangerous to public health.

Industry is entitled to some protection against the despotic acts of bureaucracy, and if the law cannot be so written that it is specific in its application, then the acts of administrative officials resulting from discretionary interpretations should be answerable in a court of law.

No protection is afforded the formulae and the secret processes that constitute the most valuable asset of the large majority of manufacturers in the food, drug, and cosmetic industries because of the restrictions of the term "patentable processes." The dissemination of information outside of the scope of administrative office being limited only to such "patentable processes" assures these industries no protection whatsoever.

The delegation of the power to legislate to a board of five members designated by the President is a grant of congressional prerogative open to question as to its constitutionality. The requirement that members of this board are to aid and advise the Secretary in the promulgation of regulations for the protection of public health is clearly legislative in character, such right of legislation heretofore remaining in the hands of Congress. The designation that members should be selected for their distinguished scientific attainment is indeed interesting in view of the fact that none of the members can have a financial interest in the manufacture, advertising, or sale of any food, drug, or cosmetic. It would be difficult to name an individual of such "scientific attainment" who remains utterly detached from the commercial phase of pharmacy or medicine. In fairness to industry, some representation should be provided upon any board whose duties are to determine the practical application of regulations promulgated by the Secretary. The intricate problems arising in the manufacture and marketing of not only drugs but foods and cosmetics warrant some consideration toward the selection of competent members who have some knowledge of business practice.

It is my belief that the logical solution of the problem of further safeguarding the consumer in a manner justly considerate of the problems of the manufacturer in conforming to such safeguarding will be found in H.R. 6376, which I introduced in the House of Representatives on January 4, 1934.

THE BLACK BILL (H.R. 6376)

The purpose of this bill is to correct defects existing in the Food and Drugs Act of June 30, 1906, and to modernize the act in order that adequate protection may be secured for the consuming public. At the same time it safeguards against fantastic legislation and preserves all of the present adequate provisions of the Food and Drugs Act as interpreted by the courts. The Black bill offers amendments to the present law which would:

First. Extend the provisions of the Food and Drugs Act to cosmetics, beauty preparations, and devices to affect the structure or functions of the body.

Second. Require manufacturers, packers, sellers, or distributors of products to place their true names and addresses thereon.

Third. Provide that notice and hearing be given by the Government to persons primarily responsible for alleged violations of regulations under the statute, prior to the institution of prosecutions, with reasonable opportunity to such persons to effect compliance with official rulings and provide for a certification of compliance by the Secretary.

Fourth. Limit prosecutions for alleged violations to one court action, but with power in that court to enjoin the interstate sale of articles involved pending decision of the controversy.

Fifth. Give emergency powers to the Government to effect summary protection of the public interest by impounding drugs flagrantly misbranded.

Sixth. Give jurisdiction over the advertising independently of the label of foods, drugs, and cosmetics to a bureau of the Department of Agriculture, that bureau, after due notice and hearing, to issue cease and desist orders against advertising found to be false, with provision that prompt compliance with such cease and desist orders be made upon penalty of prosecution and punishment by fine or imprisonment.

I believe the public would be better served by a bill couched in plain, understandable, and explicit terms, with as little opportunity as possible left for its alteration by regulation and varying departmental ideas. I believe H.R. 6376 accomplishes this purpose. [Applause.]

Mr. SWICK. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD].

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I was unfortunately unable to be here during the latter part of last session. Early this session, however, I asked the Chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments—and I have requested him to be present today—if he would not call a meeting of that committee in order that I, the ranking Member on the minority thereon, might know what bills or resolutions had been referred to it. Last year it was suggested that as I had had 11 years of service in the Congress I should have some more important committee assignment than heretofore and that I be placed on the Committee on Expenditures, which was no longer to be a merely dormant one but would probably sit much of the time. I accepted this assignment willingly since it appeared to be an important one.

When I courteously suggested to the chairman of the committee that a meeting thereof be called, so that I might obtain some information as to what was in prospect, there was an apparent unwillingness on his part to accede to my suggestion. A few days later I repeated my request and his reply was "What do you want to do, uncover graft and corruption?" I answered, "No, indeed; the country cannot stand that sort of thing, but I do wish to question the advisability of some of these current expenditures, and the methods used in making them." He demanded to know what I had in mind. I said, "Well, whether or not it really is sound policy to continue giving more of the Federal funds to wealthy States and wealthy towns which should be able to provide for their own."

When interviewed by representatives of the press, I suggested that they talk personally with the chairman, for whom I have real personal liking and a great deal of respect. He is indeed a lovable man and I believe that he would make a remarkable investigator if allowed to act in that capacity. To them he stated in effect that I was looking for a cheap show. In reply to that insinuation I would ask those who have served with me for 11 years when I have ever forfeited their respect by seeking for notoriety. No; it is not that, but as ranking minority member on this committee I certainly feel some responsibility to those who placed me there and to the country at large to see to it, if possible, that these current huge expenditures be fairly examined.

It is a fact that towns with tax rates of less than $20—wealthy towns with not a dollar of indebtedness—are taking money from the Federal Treasury, which is faced with a debt of $32,000,000,000; and last Saturday I had to vote to split the dollar in half and for other features of the monetary revaluation bill because I must needs back up the President, lest the bankers whom he has excoriated fail to help in the great financial operations now in prospect.

When is a nation bankrupt? Just how much can we owe? With more than $3,000,000,000 of ordinary expense every year and with less than $3,000,000,000 of income, after having killed the goose that laid the golden egg and gave us $2,250,000,000 in income and corporation taxes—having locked the barn door of banking and business after the horse had been stolen, and, as a friend wrote me the other day, "locked it so tight that we cannot use the barn any more"—what is our present situation?

We courageously voted that our President should have all the money which he demanded for relief, namely $3,300,000 last year. When November arrived he found that the same thing existed as had existed under the former administration—that organization, planning, governmental red tape, and all that sort of thing had prevented the spending of all but a comparatively small amount for actual relief of unemployment.

I recall that on January 25 of last year I made a brief speech on the floor of this House and cited the failure of the Home Loan Bank, whereupon the gentleman from South Carolina said to me with much emphasis, as you may recall, "After March 4 things will move." After March 4 that same gentleman was made chairman of the new Home Owners' Loan Corporation Board. Things were certainly supposed to move then. Did they? Oh, what a record. Up to the middle of December—and I have figures available to prove it—scarcely any relief had been given to distressed home owners. There was more organization, there were more rules and regulations, and more and more delays, but foreclosures went on and on. The actual results of most of these relief measures were most disheartening. Federal banks bursting with money, but member banks not daring to borrow. The chairman of the R.F.C. tells the banks to loosen up; the Comptroller of the Currency travels about making speeches and urging banks to do business, even advising the making of loans on good character.

It has been stated that the failure of the recovery program of the N.R.A.—or the proportion of its failure—is to be laid to the banks because they have not properly cooperated. But just visit your own banks after the national-bank examiner has been there, putting the fear of God into them by such instructions as this: "Don't you dare to lend another dollar on real estate as security or to that person whose credit is based on real estate", and after they have been subjected to criticisms which have actually resulted in banks withdrawing from business because they did not dare to carry it on. Agencies of the Government are working at cross-purposes, gentlemen. Within the last few days I have once more learned that banks in my own district have still borrowed nothing from the Federal Reserve bank to help business in their communities. When is the fear which has restrained them from doing so to disappear? Not so long as these governmental threats and this spending spree continue.

Then I look over the P.W.A. program, for which I voted last year. I was very willing to vote a grant of 30 percent of the cost of municipal projects which would result in local improvements and be worth while in future years. But last November came and the P.W.A. had woefully failed to function as it was intended that it should function in all those many, many months. Someone had to think of something else at once. Perhaps if Mr. Hoover had proposed it he would have been reelected President; that is, if the Democratic Congress could have been persuaded to back him up. They thought of practically giving away a huge sum of money—$400,000,000—and giving it away in a hurry. Some of it must reach the people's pockets by Christmas. You and I have many letters from constituents praising Mr. Roosevelt because their Christmas was made happier, and I rejoice with those who received this needed aid. There is no question of that need in countless instances. But that is only one side of the picture. Many wealthy communities and units promptly jumped in and grabbed a lot of this relief money, spending it on things which they, as municipalities, should never have spent it for. The same is true of individuals. Possibly a million men have been placed on C.W.A. pay rolls who would not have had a job even in good times. It cannot be denied that in countless instances the deserving have failed to secure help because those who were not deserving got it. "Canned music" had thrown many musicians out of employment. That they needed work is unquestionable, but many have been given jobs simply to furnish entertainment for the public. Shades of the Caesars. That is what happened in Rome in the days of the public circuses.

Mr. SWICK. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. GIFFORD. I may appear to be critical. I am critical of many of the methods which have been employed, but I am, nevertheless, backing the President. I even voted for his revolutionary proposals when many of my friends thought that I should not. If he asks for a billion dollars more, even if it is to be spent in the same manner, I shall probably vote as he requests. God knows I shall have to; he is the only President I have. If this is the only method of relief which he offers, I must support it, for the need is great.

Neveretheless, I do want a meeting of the Committee on Expenditures. Gently, oh, so gently, have I requested it. There are only 6 of the minority party against 15 of the majority on that committee, so what show have we got? I simply wish to call Mr. Hopkins down here and find out from him if it is not in fact true that greedy, rich municipalities that did not need this relief money have been taking it—taking it from those which did—and spending it on useless projects. Now, most of the P.W.A. projects are in a different category. They are permanent and worthwhile.

So, Mr. Chairman, this is the gist of my remarks this afternoon.

Confronted with only one method of bringing direct relief to our people, I am voting with the President. Just the same, I should like to have Mr. Hopkins and a few others appear before a real congressional committee, to pass on the advisability or inadvisability of giving away vast sums of money without due consideration and reasonable restraints. And my friend, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN], would, I am sure, be the one most anxious and able to settle the question as to whether this has been done and how we are to proceed in the future.

Since we had our little discussion I have received scores of communications asking me to investigate scandals in different localities. The newspapers have lately been filled with comments and criticisms along the same lines. There is certainly nothing secret about this now, and our committee was created to pass on expenditures by the Executive and, as a corollary, should hear reasonable and proper complaints. I observe that this morning's newspapers have called this giving-away proposition "the politicians' paradise." Municipalities complain because they were urged, or commanded, in the strongest terms to present C.W.A. projects in great haste, before they could properly consider the situation. Now, after they have got projects started and materials purchased they are ordered to "taper off" on employment. This tapering off will be most difficult to do, and hopes, but recently aroused, are now to be shattered.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. Yes; I yield.

Mr. KNUTSON. I do not think there is any politics in the C.W.A., because in Minnesota no man can get a job unless he is a Farmer-Laborite. [Laughter.]

Mr. GIFFORD. I said that if Mr. Hoover had only thought of this giving away money, I think he would have been elected. I do not know whether there is any politics in it or not, I do not know what the motive was, but you on the other side of the House feel happy about it. One Member over there said to me, "Well, we put something over on you that time, did we?" Well, I think you did, and you may have made a lot of votes. But, has our Government come to that?

Now, as I say, I asked the chairman to call this meeting. He well knows what I would do, if I were chairman. Perhaps I should thank heaven that I am in a position where it ought not to worry me; but it does. It is my duty to see that this committee performs its functions. I represent a section of the country where the people do their own thinking. I know that they expect me to do the same and do my duty.

I hope that the leaders on the other side have not taken the stand of asking the chairman of the committee not to call it together. The President himself is trying to clean house of the politicians who are using his administration for profitable practices. The indications are that he wishes matters to be aired and debated. Why, then, do you further resist this request? You are 15 to 6 on the committee and can whitewash any investigation if you choose to do so. [Applause.]

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN].

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, another distinguished orator is added to the heavy artillery on the Republican side, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD] joining the ranks; but able as he is, he is so lacking in information that his shots at the administration do not even make a small dent. When Congress met a few weeks ago, the guns of the enemy were trained on the administration. We heard from General FISH, General CROWTHER, General TABER, and others. Now comes the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD]. Like the previous attacks, the gentleman from Massachusetts fails to make an impression, owing, I think, to his lack of understanding of the operations of our relief agencies.

Mr. GIFFORD. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him, and I will not interrupt him further? I meant to have stated that not a single Member on my side of the House has spoken to me in regard to this, nor has any one of the Republican leaders said anything about it.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. While I did not yield to the gentleman, and do not want this taken out of my time, it is evident from what has just been said that the gentleman proceeded on his own initiative. The gentleman seems peeved because I have not called a meeting of the Committee on Expenditures to investigate the spending of money by the Public Works Administration and the Civil Works Administration. He wants an investigation, but he cannot produce any evidence of fraud of any kind. He seeks information that is contained in the monthly reports of the Administrator of the P.W.A. and the Administrator of the C.W.A. Then the gentleman complains because some of the towns of his district with small tax rates, wealthy towns, having no debts, are taking money from the C.W.A. at a time, he says, when the Government is facing an indebtedness of $32,000,000,000. Why does the gentleman complain here about what the officials in his towns do? They were not forced to accept the money. They accepted it, or it would not have been allocated. If the gentleman would stop for a moment to reason, he could realize why they accepted the money. I will advise him. Being wealthy communities, as he says, naturally they pay taxes to the United States Government. The money is being allocated to all cities and towns for relief purposes; and if they did not accept their portion of this money, the officials would find themselves in the position of paying taxes to be distributed among other cities and towns, with no direct benefit to them.

So what do they do? Like all other cities, they ask for their share. The gentleman spoke of the P.W.A. and made the statement that November came and this Administration did not function. If he will consult the record, he will find that nearly all the $3,300,000,000 was allocated by November. It has all been allocated now and the Administrator has warned States, counties, and cities that if they do not proceed with the improvements for which money was allocated he will revoke the grant. Is there any evidence there that the Public Works Administration has not functioned? It not only has functioned but is functioning now and, when Congress grants additional money for public works, it will be in a position to allocate immediately this money as applications are being approved daily and are held in abeyance awaiting action by Congress. Of course, we will not act until the President sends in his request, but we are informed that will be along in a very short time.

It is hard for me to conceive that the gentleman, who has been here so long and who has rendered such valuable service in the past, does not know how fast the Public Works Administration acted upon applications filed by the States and local communities. I can tell him that if he will just look at the record he will see that what I tell him is true and that, when weather permits, the projects not already started will be started. In the meantime the mills have been contacted and are now turning out material to be used in these projects. Look up the record of the Army Engineers and see if they have loafed on the job. They were ready, and practically all the large contracts have been let. "Gently I have asked for a meeting of the committee. I want to talk to Mr. Hopkins. I want information about those greedy, wealthy municipalities that took C.W.A. money", said Mr. Gifford in his speech. What information can Mr. Hopkins give him other than to say that the wealthy municipalities requested the money and it was allocated. It is from the officials of the municipalities that he should secure his information. The gentleman said he hoped the leaders on the Democratic side had not taken a stand against a committee meeting. The gentleman can be assured they have not. I accept the entire responsibility and I have no apology to make. I told the gentleman to produce some facts and he could have a meeting.

As the gentleman knows, I like to go fishing; that is my hobby. I am willing to go on a fishing expedition any time; but if I do, I am going to insist that the gentleman furnish the bait. [Laughter.] As soon as the gentleman, in the opinion of the chairman of the committee, furnishes any evidence that is worthy of consideration, there will be a meeting of the committee. But there is not going to be a meeting of the committee, as far as I am concerned, simply for the purpose of letting the gentleman throw mud at the administration.

Now, as to the P.W.A. and the C.W.A., everybody admits that the money is spent fast. The P.W.A. has done a wonderful job although my city has so far been denied money for our post office, a project for which Congress not only authorized the money but appropriated the money, and it was taken under authority granted in the Economy Act by the President and used for the Civilian Conservation Corps. There was a reason for the failure of the Director of the Budget and the Administration of Public Works in not allocating the amount asked for this project by the Treasury Department. The P.W.A. is willing to give us the $3,100,000 Congress appropriated, but the Treasury Department now says it needs $5,350,000 to complete the job. I hope the controversy will soon be settled, and I think it will. The P.W.A. allocated money for projects authorized by Congress and we should not condemn the Administrator for that. He simply expedited the project to place the unemployed to work. That is what we gave them the money for. If you are in doubt as to this, consult the hearings before the committees. Everybody admits, if we had had time to work out a program, that probably we would have got more benefit out of the Civil Works Administration than we really will get, but in October last 11 percent of the people of the United States were on the unemployed relief roll, and something had to be done. What were we going to do? We had a man in the White House who figured out a way to go, and rather than simply have these people walk up week after week and receive a contribution from the local, State, and Federal relief rolls, they devised the C.W.A. Is it not better to let a man earn a few dollars so that he can walk home at night holding his head up and say that he has earned this money to feed his children rather than to have him go into the breadline and beg something from a charitable organization?

As far as I am concerned, I am willing to spend twice the amount that we have spent, if it is necessary, to feed the unemployed in this country. If you had not put the men to work, it would have been necessary to allocate the money through relief agencies, because the people must be fed. You are going to have lots of complaints. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD] says that I have had them from St. Louis. I have not. I received only one complaint from his State, and he had a copy of the letter. The gentleman would break down the C.W.A., which would mean he would put 4,000,000 men back in the bread line to beg for their families. I can only say that those who oppose such a policy as we have inaugurated temporarily must never have felt the pinch. The President knows what he is doing. Let us help him rather than impede his progress. If any official—Federal, State, or local—has misused this fund—money advanced to feed the poor—no penalty is too severe.

Yesterday we heard something on the floor of the House about protecting ourselves from those without; from those on the outside. Build a great Navy, we were told. I am for that. I have always voted for it, although I live a thousand miles from the sea. Build a great Navy, we were told, so that we would be in a position to protect ourselves. I am not afraid of anyone on the outside. My thought is what will happen on the inside if we fail to see that our citizens receive proper food and shelter.

I was at a luncheon not long ago to a distinguished former Member of this House from the Republican side of the aisle, and I heard him make a very interesting speech. He made one remark that I shall always remember. He was speaking off the record—it did not appear in the press—but I do not think he will object if I repeat it. He said: "Let me tell you something, gentlemen. You cannot expect the people of this country to wave the American flag and to sing The Star-Spangled Banner on an empty stomach"; and you cannot. We do not want any trouble within the boundaries of our own country, but we cannot have all the luxuries on one side of the street and poverty on the other and at the same time expect everyone to be peaceful and happy.

The man in the White House is trying to do something for the unfortunate people of this country who have been placed in an unfortunate position not through their own choosing, and, as I said before, I believe it is the duty of all of us to cooperate with him. If we can find any fraud, let us find it; but do not come around here throwing mud, when the gentleman himself admits that he has absolutely no evidence to present to the committee. Call a meeting of the committee! If I did, where would we start, with nothing to start on? The Government practically stepped out of the picture when the allocation was made to the States. If there has been fraud, or if the money has not been properly used, then fault lies with the State and local officials handling the funds, not with the Civil Works Administrator.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Yes; always to my friend from New York.

Mr. SNELL. I do not know anything about this controversy, and I am not a party to it, but I did have something to do with establishing the Committee on Expenditures. If there ever was a time when I think there is an obligation on that committee, it is now, and for this reason: Three quarters of the expenditures being made are not under the control of the Committee on Appropriations, nor are they considered by that committee. I think the gentleman and his committee have an opportunity and duty to keep track of it. I am not throwing any mud at anybody. I simply believe that now is the time when the obligation which rests upon the gentleman's committee should be fulfilled, to keep track of these expenditures to as great an extent as possible. Just get the facts, regardless of anything else. For instance, I should like to have the gentleman give me the information of how much the C.W.A. has spent up to the present time in every State in the Union, just for information.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. The gentleman should know that Mr. Hopkins—I never met the gentleman but once in my life——

Mr. SNELL. I never did either.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Hopkins issues a monthly report and tells you how much money he puts into every State in the Union. He tells you everything that is done by the Civil Works Administration. What more could you ask?

Mr. SNELL. I have never happened to see it.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. As I understand the situation, when the allocation is made to a State, it is left to the honesty of the State officials to disburse the money. Mr. Hopkins has issued regulations which limit the spending of this money. They are very broad, but he keeps the States within the limits of the regulations, and tells you all in his report.

Mr. SNELL. I think that is true, but I did not know that they issued that. I shall call for it today.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. They issue it every month. One came to my office yesterday. In fact, it was delivered to the office of every Member. I have never asked for it, because it is sent to me as it is to you.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. GIFFORD. We are just getting the November 30 report, 2 months late.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Probably that is due to the congestion in the Government Printing Office. The report might have been down there a month ago. Then again that might not be the cause. This is no little undertaking, and reports must be had from the States before the monthly report is issued. That seems reasonable.

Mr. SNELL. Considering the number of billions that are being spent by outside sources, independent commissions that do not come under the control of the Committee on Appropriations, does not the gentleman think his committee should meet?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. The committee is going to meet, but as we all know, the President is going to ask for more money; and when that request comes along in a few days, then the Appropriation Committee will get an accounting and all the information it desires.

Mr. SNELL. That is all I ask. I think the gentleman's committee should look it over.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Wait a moment. The committee is going to meet, but the gentleman knows as well as I do that a great many of the functions of that committee were taken from it when we passed the Economy Act.

Mr. SNELL. I know that certain ones were taken away, but the general overlooking of these expenditures is still left with the gentleman's committee.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I realize that. The gentleman can depend upon the committee to do its duty.

Mr. SNELL. That is all I ask. I have nothing special in mind.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Is the Committee on Expenditures expected to go from department to department and ascertain the amount of money that is spent and what it is spent for? That is what we have the General Accounting Office for, and recent developments certainly disclose that General McCarl is on the job. He has hundreds of employees looking after these appropriations, and but recently added many more employees so he could check up on the P.W.A. and C.W.A. expenditures.

Mr. SNELL. I think there is an obligation on the gentleman's committee to look after these expenditures. That is all.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I spent the entire summer here. As the Members of the House know, I am here every day. To this hour, I have not had one complaint showing the illegal expenditure of any of the emergency funds. Show me where this money has not been properly handled by Government officials, and see how busy the committee will get. I might further add, up to this hour I have received no evidence that any State or local official has been guilty of fraud in handling this money.

Mr. GIFFORD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. GIFFORD. Having tried to interpret my views for me, in spite of the fact that I have voted and will vote for further expenditures, I should like to ask the gentleman if he favors giving more funds of the C.W.A. to wealthy towns and communities that do not have a dollar of indebtedness and have a low tax rate and do not need the money?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I will favor voting such expenditures as the President of the United States asks for, and I am willing to leave it in his discretion as to how he is going to help the unemployed. As to the wealthy municipalities and towns in the gentleman's district or any other district the responsibility rests with them not me. They are as much entitled to ask for their share of the money as any other town if they desire to do so.

In conclusion I should like to ask the gentleman once more if he has any information at all that will be of value to the Committee on Expenditures if that committee should hold a meeting?

Mr. GIFFORD. I have a lot of complaints.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Oh, complaints! Anonymous letters.

Mr. GIFFORD. No; letters that would be satisfactory to the chairman, I am sure.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I will appreciate it if the gentleman will let me see them. Mr. Chairman, no one is going to place me in the position of refusing to conduct a proper investigation. Of course, we know that other than to give the unemployed work it is not necessary to carry on some of the C.W.A. program. It is a move to help the unemployed, a move to take the citizen off charity; that we do not deny. In normal times an official would be placed in jail for carrying on some of these projects, but these are not normal times. Everyone seems to realize what the purpose of the C.W.A. is but the gentleman from Massachusetts. To make my position clear to all, I will plead with the President not to curtail the C.W.A. until at least next June. I fear the result if we do not go on with this program. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] has expired.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the following, which was received from the Federal Civil Works Administration:

FEDERAL CIVIL WORKS ADMINISTRATION,
1734 NEW YORK AVENUE,
Washington, January 23, 1934.

Hon. JOHN J. COCHRAN,
304 House Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: In response to your telephone request of this afternoon, I am sending you herewith a list of advances from C.W.A. funds made to the States through January 20; a description of the types of projects being carried on by State and local authorities; a list of projects being carried on under the supervision of Federal bureaus, together with an explanation of the method of administering them.

We trust that this is the information you desire.

Sincerely yours,

BRUCE MCCLURE,
Secretary Federal Civil Works Administration.

FEDERAL CIVIL WORKS PROJECTS

In order to put 4,000,000 men to work in 1 month on public projects that were economically and socially desirable, it was necessary to make use of all available facilities.

It was thought that the State organizations using the powers and assistance of city, county, and State governments would be able in the time allotted to assign not more than 3,500,000 people. Some procedure other than relying upon State and local Civil Works administrations needed to be evolved in order to put the remaining 500,000 men to work in the several States in the time allotted. Accordingly, it was decided to administer this part of the employment program from the Washington office of the Civil Works Administration.

The President had already asked the Federal departments to give their utmost cooperation to the Civil Works Administration. While the Civil Works Administration had knowledge of a few projects, such as improvements to the public health and the control of pest mosquitos which it desired to carry out, it immediately asked the various departments to appoint liaison officers who acquainted the bureau chiefs with the problems and relayed their suggestions for desirable work to the Federal-project department of the Civil Works Administration.

The response of the departments was excellent and resulted in the presentation of a large number of suggested undertakings. Whenever one seemed to be desirable it was explored in some detail. If it still appeared feasible it was approved. Once a given undertaking was approved as a project, a request was made to some Federal department to be responsible for its administration throughout the States.

The attempt was made to secure this cooperation from the Federal department which it might be reasonably supposed would normally have undertaken the work had the appropriation been made directly by Congress in the ordinary course of events. An example will illustrate this point. It was agreed that it was desirable to reduce considerably, if not eradicate entirely, the disease of malaria which is prevalent in the Southern States. To this end the Bureau of the Public Health Service was called into consultation and asked to submit estimates regarding the number of men and the cost for other than labor expenses that would be required to make a creditable attempt at malaria control on a Nation-wide basis. The estimates were approved and the Public Health Service was asked to assume administrative responsibility for the project. It employed 30,000 men in hundreds of separate localities in 14 different States.

In putting this program into effect, no money was actually given to the Federal Departments except a small amount to cover supervisory personnel and travel expenses. The projects were put in operation by sending an order to each State Civil Works Administration to furnish to an accredited representative of the Federal Department, the number of men agreed upon at the rates of pay prescribed and to honor suitable vouchers for other than labor expenses in the authorized amount.

The designation "Federal Civil Works project" indicates primarily a distinction of administration, because the work actually is done locally with local people. Some work that is undertaken is of such a nature that to be useful at all it should be coordinated throughout the several States in which it is being carried on. An example of this kind of project is the one for reducing the acid content of the water of certain tributaries to the Ohio River. Unless all the States bordering upon these waterways took the same precautions, it would be futile for any of them to do so. The project is being carried on by the Public Health Service cooperating with the United States Bureau of Mines and the several State health and mining departments concerned.

Since all of the work done under Civil Works must be done on public property, it was thought advisable to have some improvement work done on Federal Government property as well as on the property of State and local governments. Accordingly general improvement work which would not otherwise have been done was undertaken; for example, at the experiment stations in several of the bureaus of the Department of Agriculture, at Army and Navy posts and stations, and at Government fish hatcheries. Some of the independent offices and establishments have been aided in carrying out their work. In this category would fall the Tennessee Valley Authority, the Subsistence Homesteads Division, and the special Soil Erosion Service.

Approximately 90 projects of this kind are under way at thousands of work locations throughout the various States.

TYPES OF PROJECTS

In the following the types of projects which can be carried on by State and local Civil Works administrations are described. The general rules governing the choice of projects are indicated and lists are given, classified by types which are indicative of what is being done. They are, however, by no means exhaustive.

By far the largest part of the projects are those originated by local subdivisions. It is intended that the Civil Works projects shall fall in a field that lies between normal governmental expenditure on the one hand and the type of construction ordinarily carried forward by the Public Works Administration on the other. They are projects that can be operated on force account, can be picked up quickly and completed with rapidity. The time limit set on all projects was February 15. This made these requirements of force account, flexibility, and early completion that have had most to do with the determination of the types of projects carried forward.

At a meeting of the special board of public works on November 14, it was decided that certain projects not feasible for prosecution by the Public Works Administration be referred to the newly created Civil Works Administration. These projects are returned to the States and an application is made in the usual manner for their initiation as Civil Works projects. A great number of them which might not otherwise have been developed are being prosecuted through use of Civil Works workers.

It is required that they all be of social and economic utility and that they all have permanent value. Many of them are the sort of project that serves a community need, but that the community might find difficulty in bonding itself to provide. A classified list of projects in operation will more clearly than anything else indicate the scope of Civil Works activities.

The projects are classified as follows:

A. Streets, roads, and highways.
B. Schools and universities.
C. Parks and playgrounds.
D. Public buildings and equipment.
E. Improvement to public lands.
F. Pest control.
G. Sanitation.
H. Waterways and water supply.
I. Utilities.
J. Administrative, professional, and clerical.

Classification A—Streets, roads, and highways

Civil Works projects are a means of carrying on necessary road work which could not be carried out under the regular budget of the State or municipality or is not provided for by the Bureau of Public Roads or the Public Works Administration. This type of project is more than just a means of providing work and all efforts are being directed toward producing constructive results in this field.

1. Roadways:
(a) Reclaiming public lands for highway purposes and clearing right-of-way, brush cutting, etc.
(b) Grading, filling, leveling, widening, straightening, shouldering.
(c) Paving, resurfacing.
(d) Improving intersections, banking, and eliminating dangerous curves.
(e) Concrete and masonry constructions—bridges and underpasses.
(f) Building and repairing ditches, culverts, retaining walls, and curbs.
2. Sidewalks, pathways, and parkways:
(a) Building, repairing, and relaying.
(b) Grading and filling.
3. Landscaping:
(a) Constructing and painting guard rails and fences.
(b) Planting trees and shrubbery, trimming same.
4. Traffic:
(a) Painting and installing traffic signals.
(b) Painting and installing street signs.
(c) Building and marking parking spaces, traffic circles, safety signs, etc.
5. Materials for roadways:
(a) Concrete, macadam, sand, gravel, and rock, also cinders and asphalt.
(b) Quarrying, hauling, excavating, digging, and dredging.

Classification B—Schools and universities

Due to overcrowded conditions and general lack of funds on the part of the various local boards of education, there is a great field for worthwhile projects in this category. Projects so classed include work not only on the actual school buildings but also all work done on the ground and equipment belonging to them.

1. Buildings.
(a) Small construction jobs that can be finished in required time.
(b) Repairing, painting, and reroofing.
(c) Plastering, plumbing, and lighting.
(d) Furniture and fixtures renovated.
2. Grounds and equipment.
(a) Building and improving athletic fields and grandstands.
(b) Resurfacing tennis courts.
(c) Improving dressing rooms and field houses.
(d) Constructing and repairing swimming pools and hockey rinks.
(e) Grading and beautifying school grounds.
(f) Laying walks and paths.

Classification C—Parks and playgrounds

This includes all types of work on the grounds and provides an excellent field for good projects.

1. Improvement of grounds.
(a) Clearing, grading, filling, and brush removal.
(b) Roadways, walks, bridle paths, and streams.
(c) Drainage, gutters, and sewers.
(d) Landscaping, fences, railings, and signs.
(e) Lighting and traffic-signal system.
2. Recreational facilities.
(a) Swimming pools, bathing beaches, wading pools, and bathhouses.
(b) Golf courses, handball and tennis courts.
(c) Playgrounds, athletic fields, and skating rinks.
(d) Picnic grounds, shelters, band stands, outdoor theaters, tool houses, field houses, and camp sites.

Classification D—Public buildings and equipment

A great deal of extraordinary work in the repair and maintenance of public institutions has been instigated through civil-works projects. This includes work on airports, armories, bridges, city halls, community houses, courthouses, docks, fire houses, garages, hospitals, homes for aged and indigent, libraries, lodging houses, markets, museums, orphanages, police stations, jails, repair shops, sanitariums, schools, stables, storehouses, toolhouses, workshops.

Equipment includes tractors, graders, ditchers, concrete mixers, trucks, asphalt mixers, steam rollers, sprinklers, small tools, fire hydrants, police signals and fire boxes, etc.

1. Construction and repairing:
(a) Foundations, concrete.
(b) Roofing.
(c) Plumbing and lighting.
(d) Plastering, papering, painting.
(e) Demolition of old buildings.
2. Equipment:
(a) Painting.
(b) Servicing.

Classification E—Improvement to public lands

This classification offers a broad field for a great variety of projects of real value in communities of all sizes and locations and covers a multitude of subjects, such as: Airports, cemeteries, dumps, marsh lands, fair grounds, golf courses, natural amphitheaters, State- or community-owned farms, fish hatcheries and experimental stations, national forests, swimming pools, beaches, and community subsistence gardens, as well as the land around public buildings.

The establishment of community centers may also be included as a unit by itself, being made up of clubhouses, week-end camp buildings, athletic and camping facilities, recreation halls, playgrounds, development of bathing and boating facilities, and agricultural demonstration plots.

1. Improvements:
(a) Grading, leveling, filling.
(b) Repairing, painting buildings and fences, digging wells, and building dams on State-owned farms.
(c) Landscaping and lighting.
2. Forests:
(a) Building and improving trails, trail signs, and fire warnings.
(b) Removing brush and dead trees; erosion control.
(c) Establishing camp sites.
(d) Improving water system and reducing fire hazard.
(e) Forest pathology (tree surgery).

Classification F—Pest control

To provide the proper direction for pest-control projects, the Civil Works Division has obtained the cooperation of the following Federal Departments:

Department of Agriculture—Biological Survey, Agricultural Engineering and Economics, Plant Industry, Plant Quarantine, and Animal Industry.

Treasury Department—Public Health Service.

In some cases this work may be carried out under the direction of corresponding State or local departments. Local Civil Works authorities have called on such local departments as may be able to advise upon the initiation and/or undertake the direction of projects of this nature. State agricultural colleges and experimental stations have been especially helpful in pointing out specific local pests to be combated, as well as in supervising projects.

1. Insect control:
(a) Mosquitoes (malaria control), drainage, oiling, steam clearing.
(b) Grasshopper eradication; poisoning.
(c) Tick eradication, dipping, poisoning, quarantine.
(d) Japanese beetle control; poisoning, quarantine.
(e) Moth control and others.
2. Rodent control:
(a) Rat eradication; poisoning, trapping, laboratory control work.
(b) Prairie dog and gopher eradication.
(c) Others.
3. Animal disease control:
(a) Inoculation and quarantine (livestock).
(b) Predatory animals; poisoning and trapping.
4. Plant control:
(a) Eradication of ragweed, poison ivy, other poisonous weeds, flowers.

Classification G—Sanitation

Wherever possible, sanitary operations should be of a community-wide nature. Communities may make a Civil Works project of a survey of their sanitary conditions to determine their adequacy before starting projects. (See classification J—Administrative, professional, and clerical.)

1. Excavation and drainage:
(a) Sanitary and storm sewers, manholes, catch basins.
(b) Ditching, cleaning creek beds, filling.
2. Construction:
(a) Sewage disposal and incinerator plants, sewer outlets.
(b) Sanitary privies, septic tanks, filter extensions, cisterns.
3. Repairing and painting:
(a) Sanitary plants.
(b) Trucks, wagons, and equipment.

Classification H—Waterways and water supply

Projects of this nature are advisable where the labor cost is the major factor in the total cost of the project. This is especially true in the improvement of reservoirs, watersheds, and the manual labor involved in the laying of water mains.

1. Waterways:
(a) Rivers, canals, lakes, streams.
(b) Widening, straightening, deepening, damming, dikes, and levees (building, repairing, and cleaning).
2. Watersheds and reservoirs:
(a) Clearing, filling, cutting fire lanes.
(b) Planting, landscaping, riprapping.
(c) Development of flood control and irrigation districts, soil erosion.
3. Waterworks:
(a) Filter plants, chlorination plants, aeration plants (building and repair).
(b) Pumping stations, walls, auxiliary systems.
(c) Landscaping grounds.
4. Distributing system.
(a) Laying and repairing water mains.
(b) Erecting and inspection of hydrants.
(c) Erecting, repairing, and painting pressure tanks.

Classification I—Utilities

1. Street-car lines.
(a) Maintenance of equipment, removal of old tracks.
2. Gas Works.
(a) Installation and repair of mains and equipment.
3. Electric light, power, and heating plants.
(a) Installation and care of fire alarms and police boxes.
(b) Conduits and electric cables.
(c) Roadways and bridge lighting.

Classification J—Administrative, professional, and clerical

The possible projects under this classification are so numerous that only an outline can be included here. The variety of researches and surveys which can be undertaken by Civil Works divisions are almost limitless.

Some examples of actual projects undertaken under this head are as follows:

a. Personnel in various local C.W.A. administrative offices; clerks and machine operators in Weather Bureau stations; surveying and relocating boundary lines; plotting streets; drafting charts, maps, and diagrams; revising legal codes in cities and towns. Other work utilizing white-collar workers with a technical training, artists, architects, engineers, translators, etc.

b. Extra clerical and accounting help in public offices; repairing and indexing books, maps, photographs, paintings; filing, transcribing, and copying old records; all projects calling for research or statistical surveys are supervised by the Federal Civil Works Administration to prevent duplication.

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CARPENTER].

Mr. CARPENTER of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, being one of the newer and younger Members of this Congress, it does not behoove me to join in this affray with the powers that be. I do not want you to understand that I am so conceited that I think I can stand here and debate against those men. It just happens that I had asked for a little time to discuss a matter and call the attention of this House to a matter which has just been discussed. It so happens that I am a member of the Committee on Expenditures that has just come under fire. I wish to say, as a member of that committee, that I have implicit faith in the chairman of that committee and I am willing to abide by him and his judgment in regard to the actions of that committee.

One of the criticisms that was directed at Congress in the last campaign was the fact that during the last 4 years there was too much committee work and not enough action on the floor of this House.

I rose for the purpose of calling the attention of Congress to a very serious situation that is facing many millions of people in this country. That has to do with the discontinuance of the C.W.A. I received a letter last week from the secretary of the Federal Civil Works Administration, and I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to insert that letter in my remarks, together with a copy of the telegram referred to in the letter.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

There was no objection.

The letter and telegram are as follows:

FEDERAL CIVIL WORKS ADMINISTRATION,
1734 NEW YORK AVENUE,
Washington, January 19, 1934.

The Honorable RANDOLPH CARPENTER,
United States House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN CARPENTER: We are in receipt of your kind letter of January 15, enclosing copy of the telegram from the mayor of Junction City, Kans.

The Civil Works program can be continued beyond February 15 only if an additional appropriation is made for that purpose.

You may be interested in the enclosed copy of telegram sent by Mr. Hopkins to the State administrators.

Very truly yours,

BRUCE MCCLURE,
Secretary Federal Civil Works Administration.

[Telegram]

JANUARY 18, 1934.

To all State Administrators:

Due to the fact that average weekly wages for Civil Works is in excess of original estimated weekly pay rolls it is necessary to reduce the hours worked per week on local, State, and Federal projects to keep within the money available. You are herewith instructed that effective January 19, 1934, all per-diem workers are to be put on a work week as follows: In cities over 2,500 population, maximum 24 hours per week. In cities under 2,500 and open country, a maximum of 15 hours per week. All clerical, supervisory, and professional workers, a maximum of 30 hours per week with proportionate wage adjustment. This does not include administrative workers in administrators' offices. This applies to all Civil Works and Civil Works Service employees and must be made effective everywhere on this date since disbursing officers will be instructed not to pay wages for work in excess of the hours provided herein. From this date no name shall be added to any pay roll except in actual replacement of a worker fully terminated and finally paid off. Notify all your counties by wire today of the contents of this telegram. Wire today reduction in dollars on your weekly pay roll accomplished this action. This telegram supersedes all prior instructions.

HARRY L. HOPKINS, Administrator.

Mr. CARPENTER of Kansas. Now, if we would turn these millions of men, who are now employed, out into the streets in the middle of winter, it seems to me that would be one of the greatest calamities that could happen to this country. I am opposed to turning out these millions of men, who are now being given useful employment by this Government, into the cold and into the bread lines at this time of year. It will be the very same thing as taking a hungry man in and placing him at a table to eat, with a nice big feast before him, and then, when he got about half way through, take it all away from him. You might take an exhausted man home that you had picked up cold and exhausted along the road and put him in a nice warm bed, and, in the middle of the night, come and throw him out.

We have heard a great deal of talk about war and the reason for a larger Navy. We know that we may be faced with war any morning; any day. It may come upon us with the suddenness of an automobile accident or like unexpected sickness. If we were thrown into war, we would be up here clamoring with all the patriotism we could muster to vote for $5,000,000,000 here and $5,000,000,000 there, and we would not blink an eye and every cent of that would be going out for destruction. The only result would be crippled and maimed soldiers which would require the Government and taxpayers of this country for years afterwards to take care of them; but here is a case where the money is spent for useful purposes, for constructive purposes, and for purposes that each community has needed for years. Every cent of money that has been spent is going to a good cause. The people of this country do not want any dole. They want to work for their money. We are not going to let people starve in this country. You have heard that time after time, and we, as citizens, do not propose to let the needy starve. Oh, it is fine to appropriate money and let the contractors take all the money, but this is the first time when Government money has gone out to the forgotten man, the little man at the bottom. Here is relief starting at the bottom and going up instead of starting at the top and going down. Of course, we should not spend any more money than we need to. We should try to balance our Budget and save our money in times when we are making it so that we will have it on hand in times of sickness and when we need it. That is the position of this country today. A nation is nothing but a cooperative society anyway, organized to help the people obtain some protection or some benefit that they could not obtain alone.

I have thought in the last few years that we were trending toward socialism in this country. I thought perhaps it would come in 50 or 75 years. I now think it will come probably a great deal sooner than that. There is only one thing that will save us from socialism in this country, and that is the success of Roosevelt and his "new deal."

I want to call the attention of the Members of this House to a letter I received from a standpat G.O.P. veteran who was wounded on the battlefield of the Argonne, who has a bullet next to his heart now because it cannot be removed, whose compensation was cut, and who is getting along during these times the best he can. Let me read you what he says about conditions in general:

> There is sure some worthwhile conversation politically to tune in on these days. Now, both you and Mac know about how I stand politically. As far as the Democratic Party as a whole is concerned, I have never been able to see where it has been so hot in the past. It sure is comical to hear some of the brethren orate on the Jeffersonian principle idea. Said orator, who, if hard pressed, would be at a loss to explain. As to whether the bid for fame in that instance was based on the shinning up of Mount Shasta or the invention of a new-fangled kitchen mousetrap. All I can say at this late date is that if Thomas was guilty of some of the things that some of his political opponents accused him of, is that he was some stepper. However, at this time personally, my lack of faith in the Democratic Party is only exceeded and superseded by my entire lack of faith, trust, and confidence in the Republican Party. (May no shades of my G.O.P. ancestors be glancing over my shoulder as I type that statement.) And the dismal yelps and howls of some of the hidebound, shell-backed, age-old Republicans in our little city are sure peaches and cream to ye scribe's ear, and would make "Me Too" White's eulogy of the Ku-Klux Klan sound like a beer-salesman's address at a German picnic in comparison.
> And now eliminating both pro and anti factions from the conversation, I will give you the truth of the matter, at least in this vicinity. And that is that. I do not believe that the United States Government ever expended any large amount of money wherein a large percentage of the money expended reached the place intended or was of more material benefit. In this vicinity, Randolph, this Government work is a godsend. And believe me, the men employed sure appreciate it, and in the great majority of cases are showing that appreciation by doing a real day's work. There have been several home loans made here that have likewise been lifesavers. Just what the end will be is of course all guesswork for a fellow of my caliber. But sink or swim, win, lose, or draw, believe me, I remove my hat to President Roosevelt and this Democratic administration. They did not just sit down and say, "Now, if that isn't just too bad." Not much; they just grabbed root and commenced to growl and tug and dig. The old preamble to the Democratic platform, we view with alarm, has joined dodo bird or is being sung to the tune of "Who's afraid of the big, bad wolf," etc. And, say, that naval program, boy, oh boy, what-a-what-a building program! The best guaranty for peace in this hemisphere and the Pacific that I have seen since we scrapped our battle fleet in '21. The recognition of Soviet Russia, a master stroke of retaliatory (as regards Japan) and trade diplomacy, repealing the prohibition law, and, etc., etc. And here is where the shoe sure pinches many a Republican foot: Here is an administration that is really trying to carry out its campaign and platform pledges, and may the saints preserve us, it had to be a Democratic President and a Democratic administration! And that, Randolph, is just how the average, fair American regards this administration, regardless of what his politics may have been.

Now, I hope all of us will back the President in the recommendation I understand he is going to make to continue the C.W.A. [Applause.]

Mr. SWICK. Mr. Chairman, as a minority member of the Appropriations Committee and of the Subcommittee on Naval Appropriations, I would be most uncharitable if I failed to acknowledge the utmost consideration and courtesy extended to me by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. AYRES], the able and genial chairman of the subcommittee, with whom I have had the pleasure of working during the past 6 weeks. The work of conducting the hearings incident to the preparation of the Navy Department appropriation bill was carried through to its conclusion with one thought in mind, that of providing for an efficient and effective first line of defense, and I believe the bill before you today is the best that could be offered, and hope it will meet with your approval.

I am told that an amendment will be offered by the Committee on Naval Affairs which will bring our Navy up to the full treaty strength. I am in hearty accord with such an amendment, as I have always been a firm believer in maintaining a first line of defense second to none.

During the course of the hearings I was interested in learning that the Navy Department, like all other Departments, had contributed to the redemption of the Democratic pledge to reduce the regular expenses of the Government 25 percent. It had been able to keep within its reduced budget by using so-called "emergency funds" allotted to it from the funds provided by Congress under the N.R.A. to carry on projects that would ordinarily have been financed in the regular way. I have no criticism to make of this work, which has helped to provide jobs and reduce the unemployment. I believe the Naval Establishment should be maintained at the highest possible point of efficiency.

I regret that the appropriations for the activities of the Naval and Marine Corps Reserves could not be larger.

I had hoped that we might give them more money this year than we were able to give them. However, they are placed on a parity with the other branches, as you will notice from this statement made by Admiral Block that it was the decision of the President that the National Guard, Marine Corps Reserve, and the Naval Reserve should have a uniform number of paid drills during the fiscal year 1935. The President himself set this number at 36. So that the 36 paid drills incorporated in the bill for 1935 are in conformity with his decision that the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps should have the same number of paid drills.

I do insist, however, that the present administration's policy of operating under a two-Budget system is ridiculous and misleading. In most instances the work and material paid for by the Navy Department out of funds allotted it by the N.R.A. were necessary and routine projects, and would have been provided for in the regular appropriation bill had we been operating under a single-Budget system.

And here I want to place in the RECORD certain testimony in reference to the hedge clause. Examining these witnesses we found that 15 companies had bid on fuel oil. The three lowest bidders had hedged their bids about with these hedging clauses. The following information was submitted to the committee by Admiral Peoples:

Under schedule 989, opened November 17, 1933, covering delivery of fuel oil at various points on the east coast during the 3 or 6 months' period January 1 to June 30, 1934, a total of 15 bids were received. Three of these bids contained the so-called "hedge" clause. An analysis of bids showed that at many points the only bids received contained this hedge clause or that it was incorporated in the lowest bid. As it was considered that the hedge clause had been inserted because of possibility of price changes during the period the contracts would be effective, decision was reached to reject all bids and readvertise on a monthly basis.

It is interesting to know what they put in this hedging clause; and in order that the RECORD may show what it is, I insert a typical one at this point.

Subject: Restrictive provisions inserted in certain bids on fuel oil by bidders.

COLONIAL BEACON OIL CO., MEXICAN PETROLEUM CORPORATION, STANDARD OIL CO. OF NEW JERSEY

"If the National Industrial Recovery Act, any code, regulation, or interpretation thereof, or any future governmental law, regulation, or order, or the depreciation of the currency of the United States by the reduction in the gold content of the dollar, the issue of fiat money, inflation, expansion of credit, or otherwise, shall directly or indirectly increase the cost of the seller in furnishing the products called for herein, or shall direct that such products shall be sold at minimum prices which shall be an increase over the prices provided herein, it is agreed that, upon 30 days' written notice by seller to buyer, the prices in this contract shall be revised from time to time to include such increase. Seller's statement of its increased costs and of their application in increasing prices hereunder shall be conclusive upon buyer, but buyer may cancel this contract as to any items affected by such costs at the end of such 30-day period by giving to seller at least 15 days' advance written notice thereof. However, in no event shall the revised prices be more than seller is willing to quote generally at the time of delivery on new business for the same products, quantities, territories, kinds of customers, and handling and delivery conditions as provided in this contract."

2. No awards were made under schedule 989 covering east-coast fuel-oil requirements January 1, 1934, to June 30, 1934, because of the above-quoted clauses appearing in the bids. East-coast fuel-oil needs are now being met by month-to-month purchases until firm offers for a longer period can be obtained.

3. In fact, the Comptroller General of the United States in a decision to the Secretary of the Treasury dated December 11, 1933, held that such a conditioned bid was indefinite and uncertain and not responsive to the advertised specifications, as the bid attempts to incorporate therein terms and conditions not offered by the Government to all bidders as a basis of competition. Consequently such a bid may not be accepted.

The only actual savings or reductions in expenditures in the Navy so far as the taxpayer is concerned were those brought about by reduction in the pay of personnel and the reduction in ration allowances, neither of which, in my opinion, is justified.

The uncertainty of the Government's financial policy, fear of inflation, and issuance of fiat money have made it difficult for the Navy Department to secure bids for supplies over an extended period. When bids are secured, they are frequently accompanied by a hedge clause, which would increase the bid prices by reasons of increased costs due to operation of the N.R.A. and other causes incident to so-called "recovery plans." By reason of this fact, the policy of letting contracts for 3- or 6-month periods was necessarily discontinued. Prices quoted in certain instances ranged from 40 percent to 66⅔ percent in excess of former prices; consequently, it was decided to make monthly purchases until conditions become more settled.

After hearing the chiefs of the various bureaus, every one of them men of ability and all of them conversant with their arm of the service and the details connected therewith, it became very evident that the economy program of the administration meant only this: a more complicated system of accounting, involving two drawing accounts with the Treasury of the United States, one of which was written in black ink, the other in red.

I do not believe it a good practice, or fair, to continue the policy of hoodwinking the taxpayers of the United States by attempting to show a balanced Budget through the means of a complicated accounting system. We all know that the national debt is increasing by leaps and bounds and will continue to do so for many months to come, as has been indicated by the President when he so frankly informed Congress that we will have a $7,000,000,000 deficit at the close of this fiscal year. Why not face the facts and present them honestly, without subterfuge?

I cannot refrain from comparing the weeks required by this subcommittee for consideration of a routine supply bill with the remarkably short time required by this House to dispose of a bill passed last Saturday affecting the monetary gold stock and monetary system of the United States.

In the consideration of the Navy supply bill we had access to the experience of men identified with the Navy for years, together with the recorded history of former committee hearings, and yet, despite these enlightening helps, more than 6 weeks on almost daily hearings were required to perfect the bill.

Now, in the case of House bill 6976—a measure that proposes to make drastic changes in the Nation's monetary system and to place the sum of $2,000,000,000 at the disposal of the Secretary of the Treasury, with practically no restrictions on what he shall do with that vast sum of money—considerably less than 1 week was required by the committee in charge for its consideration. In fact, I doubt much if the committee crossed a "t" or dotted an "i" in the bill.

The Navy appropriation bill which you have before you stands on its own feet. It is not bolstered up by weeks of propaganda.

The so-called "gold bill", giving unprecedented and exceedingly dangerous powers to an official who is only a political appointee—one who has been rewarded for his political activities rather than one who is in office by reason of the votes of the electroate—was passed with little consideration, because it embodied the much-propagand'zed impounding of gold and devaluation of the dollar. I personally am quite willing to impound the gold and to revalue the gold dollar, but I could not by my vote grant the Secretary of the Treasury or any other individual the right to play with $2,000,000,000 belonging to the United States. Father Coughlin, who is recognized as a monetary expert by the administration, one of very few men called as a witness before the committee, in his radio address January 20, 1934, said:

Our Constitution proclaims that Congress and Congress alone has the right to coin money and regulate the value thereof.

He also said:

The will of the American people is that Congress shall retain that right by keeping the control of gold and by regulating its value from time to time when necessary, not abdicating this right into the hands of an appointed Secretary over whom they have little control.

He also criticized the internationalization of our gold. I have always believed that, as far as possible, we should keep our own gold in the United States and out of the hands of the international bankers.

I trust that this bill as passed by the House will be shorn of its autocratic powers and tempered with justice and safety at the other end of the Capitol.

I respect and admire the fearless and tireless manner in which the President has labored unceasingly since his inauguration to bring about national recovery. His has been a difficult task. I dare say no man in the United States has worked harder than he to accomplish his purpose.

Mr. Chairman, like the majority of men in the House I am past the half-century mark in life. I was blessed with a mother and a father who were typical of the sort of God-fearing people who make up the backbone of this great Nation. No man is infallible—that word can only be used in conjunction with the name of the Great Architect of the Universe. It is an insult to the intelligence of every Member of this House to say that we must accept the mandates of any individual citizen, regardless of his position, be it high or low, without the right of comment or criticism. I have pledged allegiance to the Constitution of the United States and shall do what I believe is right for my country, regardless of the demands of any individual, party, or group of individuals. When the time comes that Congress adopts the policy of being a rubber-stamp, then representative government ceases to exist in these United States. [Applause.]

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I yield 7 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. DOCKWEILER].

Mr. DOCKWEILER. Mr. Chairman, I hope what I say will be heard over at the White House and in the Navy Department.

Yesterday when CARL VINSON, Chairman of the Naval Committee, had finished his address on the subject of a great Navy, I asked him the question what his attitude would be, and his committee's attitude, on the removal of the fleet from Pacific waters to Atlantic waters at this particular time. He said he would not be willing to express his own opinion or the opinion of his committee on the subject, because that was a matter of Executive determination.

As a member of the Pacific-coast congressional delegation, I stand before you and protest the removal of the Pacific Fleet, which is our entire fleet, both the battle force and the scouting force, from Pacific waters to Atlantic waters. You will ask me what my reasons are. I am not raising the hue and cry of war. I am the last man in this House or in this country that will vote for war other than a war of defense; but, gentlemen, conditions are bad on the Pacific coast and in international affairs so far as the Far East is concerned. Would it not be far better to bring this fleet around to the Atlantic coast for maneuvers, not this spring, but the next spring or the following spring? These things can be done in years to come when times are not so ticklish in international affairs.

What do we find our condition to be today? We have not settled the Philippine situation by a long shot in this House or in the Senate or with the Philippine Legislature. This matter is now pending, and it is a serious situation. The Philippine Islands are populated by more than half Japanese. We have just recently witnessed the spectacle of the Japanese Government retiring from the League of Nations, and yet they have retained their mandated islands that were given to them while they were members of the League of Nations. We do not know whether the Japanese have put defenses upon those islands situated in Pacific waters. The Japanese will protest that they are a peaceful people. I admire the Japanese for what they have accomplished in the last 50 years. It was an American admiral that opened the Japanese Nation to the world, and they have done great things since that time. The Japanese have diplomatically protested the location of our fleet in the Pacific waters.

This fleet is not in my congressional district, even though I do represent many miles of the Pacific coast. This is not in my congressional district, and I do not speak from the standpoint of commercial advantage by reason of keeping the fleet in Pacific waters; but I tell you, gentlemen, that the Japanese protest the appearance of the fleet there, and they have apparently convinced the State Department and the Navy Department that in order to alleviate the critical feeling in Japan, which has been built up through newspaper publicity and propaganda in Japan, that our fleet should be brought around through the Panama Canal to the east coast at this time. But this is all a misnomer, so far as the Japanese Government is concerned, because their nation is completely censored. Nothing can be published in any newspaper in Japan unless it is properly censored by the proper Government officials. Consequently if there are articles being published in newspapers on the subject of the maintenance of our fleet in Pacific waters, that talk is generated by the propaganda bureau of Japan in order to keep the Junker party, the militaristic and naval party, in power in Japan. Is this the time to remove our fleet when this party is in control? The Japanese people are a people who desire peace, but these people are being controlled at the present moment by the wrong sort of leaders—by executives who have built up machinery for war.

I remember when Woodrow Wilson declared war upon the Central Powers, he drew the distinction that he was not declaring war upon the German people, because they were a good people, but he was declaring war upon the German Government, the government that had brought about a situation that had caused the war, and he said he would stamp out that kind of government and return to the German people a popular government.

The Japanese have disregarded the nonaggression Kellogg Pact. The Minister of the Japanese Government, Mr. Hirota, has just addressed their Parliament, the full text of which speech is in the morning papers, and in which he obliquely complains of the Russian attitude toward themselves. We have recently recognized Russia. This apparently has been offensive to Japan. All of these things are occurring at this present moment and very recent history.

I tell you, gentlemen, this is no time—and I speak for peace—to remove the Pacific Fleet to the Atlantic waters. This is no time to remove the fleet through that little bottle neck, the Panama Canal, and into the expanses of the Atlantic waters.

There is another thing to be remembered. In my State there are over 100,000 Japanese, half of whom are native born and supposed to be citizens of this country under our rule of law, but under the imperial rule of Japan these people are still citizens of His Imperial Majesty.

Mr. SWICK. I yield an additional 5 minutes to the gentleman. I want to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. DOCKWEILER. Yes.

Mr. SWICK. Has the gentleman taken into consideration the cost of transferring the Navy from the Pacific to the Atlantic?

Mr. DOCKWEILER. Yes. I have tried to get that figure, but I have not been able to get it so far. It will be quite expensive to remove the fleet from the Pacific to the Atlantic.

Mr. SWICK. I can give it to the gentleman. According to the best figures available now, it would cost approximately $4,000,000.

Mr. TABER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOCKWEILER. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. TABER. I want to say to the gentleman that I am not very much of an admirer of the administration, but I do not believe that the Navy Department will at any time permit the removal of the fleet from any place where it is needed for the defense of the United States.

Mr. DOCKWEILER. In answer to the gentleman's question, I am not the kind of citizen who insists upon the keeping of the fleet in any particular locality just because it will produce commercial profit for that particular place. I believe every one of us in this Congress, as well as every other citizen, should rely upon the judgment of the Navy Department and the heads of that Department when they make any of these moves that apparently have some bearing upon the efficiency of the Navy or the Army. But, Mr. Chairman, I am fearful that Washington does not understand the real undercurrent on the Pacific coast. For this reason I have risen to make these remarks.

We have a situation in California, as I commenced to say, of over 100,000 Japanese. Their citizenship is quite dubious, as I have explained. Under the imperial rule they are still subjects of His Imperial Majesty across the Pacific waters, and yet we construe those who are native born as citizens of our own Government. Now, what kind of patriotism can we expect this to produce from such persons?

Also there is a distinct, diplomatic movement right now in my State and with the State Department here to relieve the Japanese and the Chinese of the embargo on immigration that is against them. They want to be placed under a quota, and I have this morning signed a letter to the President which, as I recall, was also signed by practically every one of the 21 Members of Congress from the State of California, protesting the relaxation of the present statutory condition so as to permit any Japanese or any Chinese to come into the State of California or into this country, even under a quota system.

Of course, the Japanese say this is offensive to their natives, and that at home their local writers write this up and picture themselves as being discriminated against. Of course, Mr. Chairman, in California we have to discriminate against them. If they come in under any conditions, they cannot intermarry under our laws. If they come in under any conditions, they cannot expect social equality so far as our State is concerned. They cannot be assimilated as citizens under our laws. Consequently, is it not better for them that they do not come into our State, whether they are Chinese or Japanese?

Mr. Chairman, this is the position of California and myself, particularly, because I am a native son of that great State. I started 20 years ago to fight the encroachment of Orientals into my State. We have fought the fight and successfully, and we have prevented further encroachment by immigration of Chinese or Japanese into our State. Now, Mr. Chairman, they will come to Congress and ask for a modification of these immigration laws.

I warn you that the Japanese are going into the next conference in London in 1936, and they are going to ask for one thing. They are going to ask for the elimination of the aircraft carrier and the naval aircraft division between navies.

Mr. SWICK. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentlewoman from California [Mrs. KAHN].

Mrs. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I was very glad to hear the gentleman from Pennsylvania say that an amendment is going to be introduced to bring our Navy up to treaty strength. It is just about time that we did something in this direction.

I need hardly tell the House how strongly all my life I have been in favor of national defense. When I say I am in favor of a strong national defense I do not mean in any sense that I am in favor of war. I abhor war in every way, shape, and manner. I feel our only protection against war is in an adequate national defense.

I hold in my hand now a copy of the San Francisco Examiner, which is running a series of war pictures, previously censored, that to my mind are the most potent argument in favor of national defense. These pictures are a timely reminder of what an inadequate national defense does, and are most opportune, lest we forget the price we paid for unpreparedness. Let us not err that way again.

Certainly, with unemployment a major problem, the stimulation given to industry by this program will be a real stimulation, not a false one. It will be a permanent stimulation, not a temporary one, putting men back to work at their own jobs in almost a hundred related industries.

I trust in the next fiscal year to see all appropriations for national defense in every branch increased, rather than decreased, for our own protection and for our prestige. [Applause.]

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WEIDEMAN.]

Mr. WEIDEMAN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the Committee, I fully agree with the sentiments expressed by the lady from California, who has just taken her seat, concerning her attitude on war. There is no glory in war. I am going to vote for this naval bill and for any other proper naval or Army bill that comes before this House. [Applause.] I will do that because we can have no peace unless we have an adequate defense. Let profits of war be conscripted. I hope when the bill is presented to this House to conscript the profits made out of war in the future it will receive approval, because, if it is necessary to conscript human lives in the conduct of a war, it is all the more necessary that no one be allowed to make any money or a profit out of war. If we do this we will not have so many advocating war.

If the theory of war is correct, a necessary defensive war should make patriots, and not war millionaires. Let us properly take care of the human wreckage cast upon our shores as a result of our last war for democracy before we allow ourselves to be drawn into another slaughter.

Now, I want to bring to the attention of the House a most vital matter—not a matter of potential destruction but a measure of construction. That is the continuation of the Civil Works Administration. I believe that a bill will be brought in asking the House to continue the C.W.A. until May 1. I think that is the only or chief remedy that has helped the depressed cities of the country and it should be extended beyond May 1 if necessary. I realize that there may be a difference between the rural communities and the urban as to their viewpoint of the C.W.A. For instance, spring is coming along. I understand from men representing the rural districts that the farmers are having difficulty in getting labor due to the fact that the wages by the Government in C.W.A. work is in excess of what the farmer pays his farm hands in some sections of the country. This will make it difficult for him to get sufficient help to work his farm. For this reason I believe the Administrator of this law should cooperate with both sections of the United States and of the various States and that when the quotas of the various States are reduced the reductions should be made from the rural sections. The reason for this is that the farms can take up the excess labor sooner than the industrial areas, due to the busy season on the farms being in the spring and summer. The quotas should be continued in the cities until industry is further established to again take up and absorb the unemployed.

I think, however, that is a matter of administration. I want to call the Administrator's attention to the future allocation of funds, that there should be some discrimination used in allocating this fund—that the cities should be favored.

If you will help in the reestablishment of our industrial centers we will be in a better position to pay a higher price for your farm commodities. There is no purchasing power in pauperism. The morale of the entire country is being restored rapidly by allowing men the chance to work and earn an honest living for their families. It is much nobler to give a man a pay check so he can buy in an open market than to give him unwillingly a welfare check for a few groceries.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEIDEMAN. I yield.

Mr. KNUTSON. Does not the gentleman think that larger sums could be better used to provide more and better highways?

Mr. WEIDEMAN. I agree with the gentleman. There is no reason why the funds could not be used for highways—for more and better highways. I would be in favor of a liberal allowance for materials so men could be put to work and improve our national highways and to build new highways. I am in favor of building highways to enable the people to travel from one end of the country to the other in Detroit-built automobiles, the finest produced in any country of the world.

Now, I have not asked for one penny for my district from the P.W.A. I am one of those who believe that we should not make a grab at public funds every time the pork barrel is passed around. I should like more money for materials to enable us to build roads that all the people of the Nation can enjoy.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to insert a telegram that I have received from the city clerk of Detroit and a letter from William Cohen, C.W.A. administrator for the city of Hamtramck.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. Now, I want to read this telegram:

DETROIT, MICH., January 22, 1934.

CARL M. WEIDEMAN,

United States Representative, House Office Building:

It is impossible for Detroit to proceed in a businesslike way with C.W.A. projects because of the suspension of funds for materials.

We urge your assistance in promptly securing such legislation as will make funds available for carrying on all present projects and further commitments. We appreciate your cooperation of the past.

RICHARD W. READING, City Clerk.

HIGHLAND PARK, MICH., January 15, 1934.

Hon. CARL WEIDEMAN,
Care House of Representatives:

Would be serious to stop C.W.A. Do all in your power to continue same. Morale of the people would be ruined.

R. RAY MARKLAND,
Mayor Highland Park, Mich.

HAMTRAMCK, MICH., January 19, 1934.

Hon. CARL M. WEIDEMAN,
House Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: May I take this opportunity of calling your attention to the absolute necessity of Congress making adequate provision for the continuance of the C.W.A. program in Michigan.

As director of the C.W.A. in the city of Hamtramck I have personal knowledge of the tremendous benefit to this community as a result of the C.W.A. work.

Our Hamtramck C.W.A. employees receive approximately $34,000 weekly, all of which is spent for the necessities of life which have been so long denied them.

All of the projects upon which the C.W.A. workers are employed are of a permanent and lasting nature and are projects which were necessary for the welfare and benefit of the community at large. Most of the projects consist of work which has long been delayed by the administration, due to lack of funds.

At a recent meeting of the Hamtramck retail merchants it was unanimously agreed that their business has increased considerably, due to the additional sales made possible by the money spent by C.W.A. employees.

Approximately 1,800 residents of the city of Hamtramck are now employed on Hamtramck C.W.A. projects. At least 1,100 of these were formerly receiving dole from the welfare department. Said employees are no longer dependent on charity but are earning their own living, and an attitude of optimism toward the future has almost completely dispersed the dark clouds of pessimism which formerly prevailed.

It is the consensus of opinion that the C.W.A. program has shown tangible beneficial results and is one of the most, if not the most, helpful measures yet adopted by the United States Government in combating this depression.

On behalf of the city of Hamtramck, its residents, citizens, and business men, and those who have finally found their independence through employment on C.W.A. projects, I urge you, as our Representative, to assist with all the power at your command in passing the necessary legislation to continue the C.W.A. program.

Thanking you, I remain,
Very truly yours,

WM. COHEN,
Hamtramck Director, C.W.A.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD] said that none of this money should be given to cities that have no tax burden. Up to this time I have failed to read of any notice from anybody in Massachusetts saying that they do not want this C.W.A. money. They are still taking it. As far as Detroit is concerned, we are getting on our feet. The automobile industry is picking up. I talked yesterday with a representative of the Pittsburgh Plate Glass Co. He said that their factory, making automobile glass, is working to capacity to fill the orders for the automobile plants. But notwithstanding that, we are not yet on our feet. The few thousand men thrown out of employment by the curtailment of the C.W.A. last week were thrown on the welfare relief roll. I think you should give us more time to rehabilitate ourselves, and I think you should appropriate some more money for the C.W.A. work, even after May 1, until we can get our industry started again. We are willing to bear with the gentlemen from the agricultural districts. I think the Representatives from the cities went along with you, hook, line, and sinker, all the way. We will do so in the future. We want to help you, and we will go the full limit for you. In addition, we are asking you when this bill comes up to go along with us, and I think it should be brought to the attention of the administration that the farmer should not be handicapped by putting too much of C.W.A. labor in rural districts in competition with this farm labor. The farm and the factory must recover from this depression together. We have a mutual problem.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LANHAM, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee had had under consideration the bill H.R. 7199, the naval appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

REFINANCING OF FARM DEBTS

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H.R. 6670 to provide for the establishment of a corporation to aid in the refinancing of farm debts, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments thereto, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H.R. 6670, with Senate amendments thereto, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Senate amendments are as follows:

Page 1, line 3, strike out all after "That" down to and including "charter" in line 5, and insert "there is hereby established."

Page 1, line 7, after "The", insert "principal office of the corporation shall be located in the District of Columbia and the management of the corporation shall be vested in a."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Chair appointed the following conferees: Mr. JONES, Mr. FULMER, Mr. DOXEY, Mr. HOPE, and Mr. KINZER.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H.R. 7199, the naval appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the naval appropriation bill, with Mr. LANHAM in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS].

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, being connected with the Committee on the Judiciary of the House, I am in a position to appreciate the pressure being exerted on the Federal Government by the States, by subdivisions of the States, and by the people to take over a larger and larger share of governmental responsibility and just now of enforcing the criminal laws of this country. I believe every student of the situation, regardless of his politics, will not fail to be apprehensive as to the probable effect upon the governmental capacity of the people of the Federal Government doing for the people so many things during this emergency which the people, through their State governments and their smaller units of government and as individuals have formerly done for themselves. I believe it will be agreed that there is a law of nature, universal in its application, under which power to do things is lost by the people who cease to do them. That law is stated most generally, I believe, that nature will not waste her energy. I believe we all appreciate the necessity—I think I do—of the Federal Government doing now most of the extraordinary things that are now being done by it dealing with the economic situation of this country; but the doing of those things by the Federal Government tends to have the people for whom those things are done want their Government to do many other things. This economic program, justified by necessity, creates for them a mental attitude of dependence, a lack of self-reliance, a lack of courage, a lack of determination to take care of their own affairs. In the presence of a situation like that it seems to me the clear duty of public officials and Members of Congress, of everybody, to hold to the people of the State all of the governmental responsibility which they have the governmental capacity to discharge. It must be evident to every student of the present situation that when we come to abandon, as we shall, the present method of doing things, it is going to require people of a great deal of governmental capacity to take up and carry on where the Federal Government is going to have to leave off, and to take care of the governmental responsibilities of the people.

WHAT IT IS ALL ABOUT

I believe, too, that every student of what it is all about—this living on this earth for a brief time—must agree that what it is all about is evidently nature's effort to develop people. Certainly it is Nature's plan to develop people by forcing people to do things that are difficult. For these reasons I am anxious, having concern for the future governmental capacity of the people, that the people shall not shift the enforcement of the criminal law to the Federal Government, and that the agents of the Federal Government shall not reach out and take those responsibilities from the people. It is not the mere matter of sending somebody to the penitentiary or of hanging somebody or who or what agency of government shall do it that is involved. The question is shall we leave to the people something to do that will enable that people to develop their capacity to govern against the day when they are going to have to tackle the biggest job the people of any country ever tackled. That is just plain, ordinary, common horse sense. It is largely through the governmental agencies of the States, which function largely through officers chosen directly by the people in the political subdivisions, such as counties and cities, that State governments operate. Everybody who has any sense knows that we cannot continue to run this Government and its economic and political machinery by somebody in Washington telling everybody what to do and letting them have a part of their own money back in order to induce them to do it. There is a vast difference between a governmental arrangement where public officials are selected to effectuate the public will and a governmental arrangement where appointed officials substitute theirs for the public will and effectuate that substituted will through bureaucratic organizations. The latter, we may concede, tends for the moment toward a more efficient government, but at so great a draft upon the governmental capacity of the people as to warn of its danger and of the necessity to abandon it as soon as the emergency is ended.

EFFICIENCY OF GOVERNMENT DEPENDS UPON THE GOVERNMENTAL CAPACITY OF ITS CITIZENS

Since the efficiency of government such as ours is dependent upon the governmental capacity of its citizens, it is my contention that while acting through concentrated governmental power in order more effectually to deal with a great emergency, the destructive tendencies of such arrangement should be counteracted as far as possible by leaving with the people of the States the doing of all governmental things within their power which are not necessary to be done by the Federal Government in order effectively to deal with the emergency.

Now, I have called attention to a community that I have been studying. I had something to say about it the other day. I have been watching with great interest the city of Chicago undertaking to deal with its problem. Chicago attracted national attention a few years ago by reason of the fact that it was gangster-ridden and apparently gangster-controlled. Every person who has been to Chicago lately, who has watched the signs of the times there, and who is familiar with the situation at all, knows that those people have grown tired of being bossed by a lot of gangsters. What made them grow tired of it? It was the gangster who made them grow tired of it. The Federal Government might have gone after these racketeers, but it is my contention, not my contention merely, it is a fact, that the Federal Government would thereby have robbed the people of Chicago, and robbed itself of the chance to have the type of citizen in Chicago which their fight against these criminals is developing. The getting rid of these gangsters is not important, but the struggle of the people, the development of the people in getting rid of the gangster is the important thing. The strength which they get, the consciousness of responsibility, the strength of an aroused civic decency, is the important thing; and the depredations and tyranny of the gangster apparently were the only things that could give it to them.

Cities may be a little slower than the appointed agents of the Federal Government. Great results do not come quickly. It takes a good while to bring about great results. The regeneration of the people of a great city is a great result. That is another one of nature's notions about how it does things. We may not like it, but there is nothing we can do about it. When we see people beginning to be stimulated, aroused, making an effort, I do not care if it is a feeble effort, if it is in the right direction for an agency of a supergovernment to come in and let those people sit down and relax where they were, is an act against the best interests of this country.

On yesterday I had called to my attention an editorial published in one of the Chicago papers. It made reference to some observations which I have recently made concerning the effort of Chicago to rid itself of the gangsters. It is a short editorial. It is one that is constructive and helpful to all, and I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks to insert the editorial.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS]?

There was no objection.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I refer to Chicago because it is our outstanding example familiar to the people of all the country.

The editorial referred to is as follows:

[From the Chicago Daily News, Saturday, Jan. 20, 1934]

CHICAGO AS A NATIONAL EXEMPLAR

If the ears of Chicago burned yesterday, they had unusual occasion. A friendly voice from another State was raised in commendation of the city's morale in fighting crime. It was a reversal of experience and therefore the more gratifying. But no false modesty can induce a good Chicagoan to say the praise was unmerited. Representative HATTON W. SUMNERS, of Dallas, Tex., a lawyer and for years a public prosecutor, made the floor of the House of Representatives a rostrum for depicting Chicago as an example of self-reliance and effective energy in dealing with the racketeers and other criminal denizens of its underworld.

Mr. SUMNERS, who is Chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, formed his laudatory impressions of Chicago and its citizenship last summer while participating in that committee's investigation of local crime conditions. His timely point, driven home and illuminated by reference to Chicago, is that danger lies in the increasing dependence of American citizenship upon Federal aid even in local affairs. He sees the probable development of a flabby and resourceless spirit in States and municipalities if the tendency to shift burdens to remote shoulders is not checked, if there is not a revival of courage and self-confidence on the part of local governments. He is by no means alone in that disturbing appraisal of current trends.

Against that fear he sets as encouragement and inspiration the story of Chicago's awakening. Chicago, he asserts, affords the most magnificent demonstration to be found on the continent of the ability of its people to govern themselves.

Some may take exception to that sweeping tribute and discount its unmeasured terms as Texan eloquence. It is qualified by Mr. SUMNERS' statement that Chicago yet has much to do. Every Chicagoan knows the truth of that, and if the Texan's praise is fully to be justified that truth must be borne constantly in mind. There is no question, however, that the civic morale is higher today than it has been for years. The arrogance has gone out of the underworld. Its tail is between its legs.

Coincidentally with Mr. SUMNERS' congratulatory words President Frank J. Loesch, of the Chicago Crime Commission, declared at the commission's annual meeting that the last year had been notable for the vigorous warfare waged on organized crime by local authorities. Criminals have been driven to desperation by police and public prosecutors. The city is riding the lawless elements by which it once was ridden. National recognition of its fight against crime should stimulate Chicago to maintain that fight and also its fight against political corruption, against franchise fraud. Acclaimed as exemplar of self-reliant courage, Chicago must not fail to live up to that role.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman give the name of the newspaper?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. It is the Chicago Daily News.

Now, in order that I may not detain the House any longer than necessary, I am going to ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks, and then I am going to read a speech that I made last fall before the Flag Association of the United States when they were discussing the suppression of crime, and I discussed the "Responsibility of the people for the suppression of crime."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS]?

There was no objection.

THE PEOPLE ARE THE GOVERNMENT

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I discussed the responsibility of the people for the suppression of crime. I do not like to be continually discussing this subject, but it happens to come to me and other members of the Committee on the Judiciary as it probably does not come to the rest of you gentlemen.

There may be crooked officials who make copartnership with hijackers, and kidnapers, and racketeers, and murderers, but these officials have been selected by the people. That more or less intangible thing spoken of as the "government" cannot select public officials. It cannot tell them what to do. It cannot discharge them for breach of faith. It cannot sit on juries. It cannot convict criminals. It cannot create the necessary public opinion. Such a government does not exist aside from the people who possess all its powers, operate its machinery, formulate its will, and create the public opinion and public purpose which is its supreme law and dynamic force. It has no agencies except the people through which to correct any condition. The people possess all the power there is, and therefore fundamentally and basically all the responsibility there is.

The only government we have is myself and you, my neighbors and your neighbors, just we, the people. Every failure of such a government is my failure and your failure, the failure of the people. There is nothing more absurd than the favorite indoor sport of the American people, "cussing" the Government.

We got started wrong insofar as the suppression of crime is concerned, and rather naturally so. Many of our ancestors were fugitives from governmental oppression. In the effort to protect the individual against the crimes of the State, we have so weakened the State by legislation, by judicial construction, and by the attitude of public opinion and public sympathy that money and organization give to crime a large element of immunity from punishment.

There is much truth in the saying that technicalities which used to make justice in spite of law, with us make law in spite of justice.

With us, the proper presumption of innocence and burden of proof have been distorted beyond all rational proportions. Revolting against the old custom of torturing defendants to force confessions, we have not only secured the defendant from being put to any involuntary examination, but we have gone so far that even under circumstances where every social duty imposes the obligation to make an explanation, and every impulse of an honest person would be to explain any reference in argument or otherwise to the failure of the defendant to avail himself of the privilege and natural duty to testify, is held to be reversible error.

In many of the States now in the trial of criminals supplied with plenty of money, the trial judge, instead of having the necessary power to control the trial, sits in a reserved seat refereeing a battle between lawyers, witnessing a judicial farce.

Whose business is all this? It is the people's business. It is their responsibility. Of course, there is the responsibility of leaders, but the people choose their leaders. There can be no leaders without followers.

There can be no decent governmental conditions among a people who permit newspapers to come into their homes which place before their children as men of courage and as heroes these dirty rats, lost to every sense of true courage and civic obligation, who, by political corruption, machine guns, and cowardly assassination make the lives and homes and property of supposed-to-be-free American citizens insecure. There can be no decent governmental conditions while these supposed-to-be-free American citizens are afraid to testify as witnesses, shirk their obligations as jurors. There is one other thing, the people must put into their proper place these murderer and hijacker aid societies, these old sisters and sisterettes who, whenever a jury has had the courage to rid society of one of these people who has forfeited his right to live, begin bedeviling the Executive to undo the work of a courageous jury.

The time has come when as a responsible, self-governing people, we must begin intelligently taking care of the business of a self-governing people.

It is perfectly evident that we have been getting away from the "I and we" notion of government, and shifting to the "they and it" notion of government, and as we have done so we have been moving further and further toward the condition at which we have arrived.

WHAT PRICE JAZZ

We could not be bothered. We had all got young. Instead of pointing the youth of the country to persons of stable, sound judgment, meeting the serious responsibilities of life, youth became the ideal. Everybody got a horn. On with the jazz; getting a little gasoline to go somewhere, to leave there to go somewhere else, in such a hurry to see some distant mountain that we did not have time to look at the mountain we were passing.

We have refused to heed the admonition of sound-thinking, serious students of public problems, and have yielded the public forum to those who would bite a dog anywhere in order to make the front page of the public press.

There is no mystery why organized crime walks the streets of our great cities unafraid. We have refused to make our contribution to the formation of an advised, conscious of responsibility, intelligent public opinion, which is the only safe guide for government among a free people. We have applied in its stead in no small measure the theories of some persons who evidently got overheated in the process of education; too much temperature, too many college degrees, too many theories, too much fermentation, and too little of the sunshine of common sense in their curing. They are supposed to have been doing our thinking for us. As a matter of fact, much of what they have paraded, as the result of their original thinking, are schemes and theories which they have dragged from the junk heap of discarded failures.

If perfection and the absence of criminal inclination are the normal state of man, such theories as that these emenies of society ought to be sent to hospitals instead of punished, would not be so absurd. But we all have criminal inclinations. People cannot live together on this earth if the aid to self-control of a reasonable certainty of punishment for crime is withdrawn.

Confucius was evidently a man who walked about the world with his eyes open. He said that knowledge without thought is labor lost. These people have been losing a lot of labor. He said also that thought without knowledge is dangerous.

PEOPLE ARE BEGINNING TO THINK AGAIN

These are dangerous times. We are trying to think now. Our faces are turned toward higher ground. Of course, we are still willing to escape our difficulties, to pass them on to somebody else, but we are beginning to realize, however, that we will not be able to do so. There is nobody else.

We will not be able to turn over the suppression of crime to public officers while we take a vacation from civic duties. We are under the lash of necessity. This task which we are going to have to put our shoulders to is not going to be such a bad thing for us. This sort of thing which we are going to have to do is as essential to the development of a great people as is the necessity to struggle in order to break through an opposing football team essential to the development of a great football team. The great epochs in the world's history are those, and only those, when the people, with a high purpose and a will that would not yield, have fought their way through great difficulties to the consummation of great victories. We have the chance, the challenge, the necessity to make this the greatest age of all time.

May I follow through with this football illustration? Great football teams are not made great by weak opposition. Neither are they made great by having the captain do all the playing. Just as the youth learns how to play football by playing it, people learn to govern by governing, how to suppress crime by suppressing it, by working at the job themselves. It is the universal law of life. Nowhere, except in government, is there failure to recognize this fact, and it is in the realm of government that this age is registering its colossal failure. Governments are not accidents. They are governed by natural laws which people must respect. We may be able to go places faster than our ancestors went, but we are not following their example when we beg to shift the responsibility of local domestic government and personal responsibilities to a great Federal bureaucracy, and when we cower in the face of an organized, superimposed government of criminals.

It is not in the development of government or of any other such thing per se that nature is concerned. It is in the development of people that nature is concerned. That is what it is all about, this living on this earth for a brief space of time. Whatever operates against the development of people operates against the plan of nature, and in violation of the laws of nature which have been provided to make certain the cooperation of human beings in carrying out nature's plan. Human beings who refuse to cooperate must pay the penalty. We are paying it—this scourge of crime.

DIFFICULTIES, THEIR PLACE IN THE SCHEME OF THINGS

It is for this development of people that such difficulties as suppressing crime are provided. Difficulties are nature's gymnastic paraphernalia provided for the development of people. These difficulties in government are a part of that equipment. Government could have been made a fool-proof, self-perpetuating thing. Everything could have been made all right, but we would have been as a field of cabbages. No great character ever came out from the Tropics, where he had only to climb a tree for his breakfast, and pull off a few leaves on the way down to make himself a full-dress suit.

The right of the States to govern was never important, but the necessity of the States to govern always was important and always will be important, because they are the agencies of government in which the private citizen has the greater power and the greater responsibility.

The best way to study a big question is to reduce it to such dimensions as to bring it as an entity within the scope of human comprehension. These general problems of law enforcement and the effect upon individuals and communities of the presence or absence of the sense of responsibility of the people have come several times under my personal observation. I am not discussing theories; I am discussing what I have seen.

I was prosecuting attorney of Dallas County when we were completing the task of emerging from wild-west conditions. A condition obtained in one of the best village sections of the county which was highly unsatisfactory to many of the people there, but they did not want to come out into the open in their opposition. Some of them were merchants. They were afraid of the hurt to their business. As far as they would go at first was to tell me in confidence of conditions and ask for their correction. They wanted somebody else to clean up their local condition. In that state of public attitude nothing effective could be done about it. I watched the evolution of that people through the several stages from that in which they would not do right because it would probably cost them money and might involve some personal danger to them, from a feeling of dependence and helplessness to that when those same persons were standing up courageously in open meeting putting themselves and their money to the task. Persons developed into leaders who never knew before they had that ability. There developed during that struggle a community solidarity, a consciousness of responsibility, and a militant decency. With the accomplishment, which was easy then, came a sense of community power, of courage, and of self-respect, which through all the intervening years has been their glory and their salvation.

Several years ago this community was visited by a terrible cyclone. Many of its people were killed and many more wounded, with corresponding property loss. I heard of it very early next morning. It was my old home. I was preparing to go out with a relief expedition from Dallas. Before we could get away a committee came in from the stricken community and told us that they appreciated what we were proposing to do, but that they had taken care of the situation. In an hour and a half after the storm the citizens had taken care of their dead, got their wounded to the hospitals, estimated their damages, taken stock of their resources, and without any pose, with ability and resolution, set about the work of relief and reconstruction.

I have recently been to Chicago. There was a great fair in progress, but there was something greater than the fair going on in Chicago, which had for me too strong a competition in interest for me to spend more than an afternoon at the fair. The people of Chicago, under the lash of necessity—when I speak of the people of Chicago I mean the individual citizens of Chicago—with a new-born courage are awakening into action, into consciousness of responsibility, and are feeling the thrill of power. They are beginning to demonstrate the capacity of that people for self-government. How long their difficulties, their necessities, this task of the criminal shall be required to break the lethargy of that people and make them to be the type of citizens which the general necessities of Chicago require, no one can forejudge. But they are moving in the right direction.

It is not the war on gangsters which is important; it is not the ridding of that community of gangsters which is important. The gangsters, under the circumstances, are the best asset Chicago has. They are the nasty tasting dose of medicine which a sick community had to have. These gangsters are not the disease; they are the evidence of the disease and of nature's effort to cure it. They have not happened accidentally. There is no result without an antecedent adequate cause. That cause lies deep. If that community had been civicly healthy, these rats could not have lived in their midst.

The great thing is not getting rid of these gangsters but getting rid of that something in the attitude, in the purpose, in the courage of these people which made these gangsters possible. The development of decent attitudes among the people, the development of leaders among those who never knew before they had the capacity to lead, in a sentence it is the redemption of the people of Chicago resulting from the inescapable necessity to struggle to free themselves from the power of these criminals which is the thing of importance.

THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT COULD HAVE ROBBED CHICAGO OF ITS CHANCE

That is why I opposed the Federal Government going into Chicago and robbing that people of the supreme opportunity to develop themselves, and to demonstrate their ability to win a great victory, and in that winning redeem themselves and stand forth as a great people, to stand forth for all time as a great testimonial to the capacity of Anglo-Saxon people to govern themselves.

Of course, Chicago is not going to get rid of these criminals permanently any more than a farmer cultivating his fields, ridding them of the weeds which would choke out his crops, gets rid of all the weeds for all time. It is the weeds and the hazards and difficulties in raising crops which makes good farmers, just as the hazards of a golf course makes a good golfer. No farmer need have fear that he will ever get his fields so clean and in such perfect condition that he will deteriorate as a farmer because there is nothing to do. Nature takes care of that in the fields of corn, and in the fields of government.

I suppose a grown man could carry the football for his young son through the line to the goal better than the boy could do it, and if the big thing was getting the ball to the goal that would be the sensible thing to do, but the thing of importance is the physical and mental development which nature gives to the young boy as a reward for his struggle to place the ball behind the enemy's goal line.

Even if it were conceded that the Federal Government, or any other agency, could suppress crime, which it cannot, and take care of all the other things which are of concern to the people, and thereby relieve the people of the necessity to do it, that would no more prove it a good thing to do than would the fact that the father could be more effective in placing the ball behind the goal line prove that he ought to do it while his young son sat on the side line and watched.

I have no apology to offer for continuing to use this illustration because the laws of nature are the same everywhere and are universal in their application. The thing, however, which makes this football illustration inapt in an important particular is that there is with us in the suppression of crime, fundamentally considered, no father and not even an Uncle Sam, in the sense that we have fictionized that bewhiskered caricature. We have no king. We have no hereditary nobility, no ruler by divine right. Our Government is not an "it"; it is not a "they." There is no government other than ourselves—myself and you—the people. Whenever we take a vacation from the discharge of our duty to govern we pay the price in corruption, in inefficiency, in the hijackers, kidnapers, in the reign and rule of crime of every sort.

We have been taking a vacation in this country. That is what is the matter with us. Not until the last few months has it been possible to bring to public consideration anything which burdened thinking and required the serious consideration of serious matters. There are a number of indications that we are at the end of the vacation.

In order that I may not be misunderstood, I want to say that I realize that, by reason of certain surrenders to the Federal organization when the States came into the Union and that the States maintain no border patrol, there are certain Federal responsibilities, but most of these can be cared for by compacts among the States without necessitating a duplication of State and Federal police personnel, and without going any further than we have gone toward converting our Federal courts into police courts adjudicating matters of internal police control.

But I want to warn you now that, unless the people set their faces against it, the time is not far distant when the Federal Government will be stepping in, and as a result the States and the communities and the private citizens will be stepping out, not in the same degree, perhaps, but in the same way as occurred with regard to prohibition. It is not only in government that this may be observed but it is everywhere in life. Divide responsibility between the greater and the lesser and the lesser loses his share by surrender or by usurpation.

ONLY BY GOVERNING CAN CAPACITY TO GOVERN BE PRESERVED

There is no way under heaven or among men by which the capacity of a people to govern can be preserved and developed except by governing. There is no way to have the people in their private lives and in their homes before their children stand forth as an influence in behalf of things which are the antithesis of crime and cowardice and in favor of good and efficient citizenship except for them to be an actual, courageous force in the suppression of crime in their community. In this we see the practical philosophy of preserving the power of local government and the responsibility of the private citizen. It is that responsibility which is the great developer of good citizenship and of governmental capacity, which is the only foundation strong enough to bear the weight of a great governmental superstructure such as we have.

We might burn our Constitution and tear down our capitols, but if we preserve the governmental capacity of our people they would build again. But if the capacity of the private citizen to govern is lost through its nonuse, the Constitution dies, and our capitols become monuments of our failure. This we know, nature will not give greater power where the power possessed is not used. It will not waste its energies. The fish in the Mammoth Cave have no eyes. Tie your arm by your side and it withers. The active, determined, courageous discharge of the obvious duty of the private citizens, who, in fact, are this Government, is not only necessary in order that the shameful reign of crime shall end in this country, but it is necessary because of its effect upon these private citizens and upon their capacity to preserve the governmental institutions of a free people. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield.

Mr. CANNON of Wisconsin. The gentleman referred to the Chicago gangster a moment ago. Is not the crime condition throughout our Nation, particularly in Chicago, due to the judiciary more than anything else? How does the gentleman account for the fact that in the city of Chicago, where they have approximately 3,000,000 people, they have around 65 or 70 criminal court judges, while in the city of Milwaukee, where they have almost 1,000,000 people, we only have one criminal court judge, and we have the model city of the United States as far as crime is concerned?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Let us assume that Milwaukee is the model city. I have heard many good reports about it. But I want to answer the gentleman's question. When we get right down to the bottom of it, the responsibility is not the judges, because the judges do not get their own jobs by their own volition. The judges are either appointed by somebody whom the people elect, or the people elect those judges. I know it is not the right way to court public applause. The right way to do it is to abuse somebody else and tell the people they are all 100 percent right and somebody else is wrong, but that does not get us anywhere. Only an aroused, determined private citizenry can do it. In a sense, the Government is the agent of the people, but in just as definite a sense, the people are the agents and instruments of the Government. Governments are provided for in nature just the same as human beings are. People have to have government. That shows it is provided for in the scheme of things. Let me illustrate; I have to go to the farm for my illustrations. I do not see how you town-raised people ever did get any real information. Suppose I ride by somebody's farm, and I do not like the way that farm is being conducted. It is rundown; the crops are not being properly cultivated. I am the one who hired the people who work that farm, I am the one who tells the people who work that farm what they must do and what they may not, and I am the only one who can discharge them. Would it lie within my mouth to go around criticizing the owner of the farm because the thing was not done right? I know we get a lot of satisfaction cussing the Government, but we, the people, employ the persons who operate the Government.

ONLY A PEOPLE CAPABLE OF SELF-GOVERNMENT CAN DEFEND THEIR LIBERTY

And we, the people alone, can tell them what to do. We alone are the people who can discharge them. If there is anything being done wrong in the operation of the Government fundamentally, we, the people, are to blame and not that intangible thing which people love or ought to love with that holy love called patriotism. Only a people possessed of power and conscious of responsibility can guard that government and perpetuate its institutions. A people bottle-fed and rocked to sleep by the hand of a great Federal bureaucracy cannot do it. Neither can the great Federal bureaucracy do it. The plan of God in nature is made sure of final execution as well by the limitations placed upon human capacity as by the capacity given to human beings.

I see where we are drifting and I do not like it. I do not want to see the people of this country turning over to the Federal Government the protection of the lives and property of the people of this country. I want to see the people of this country retain all of the governmental responsibility which they can discharge because only such a people can keep a country free. I have no pet theories about this matter. Only a deep concern for the happiness and security of my people and of my country prompts me to speak. When a people weaken from lack of exercise, of their governmental muscles, if I may use that expression, then they are easy marks and become the prey of any scoundrel who gets into public office or into positions of economic power. But when you have got a strong people, conscious of governmental responsibility, growing stronger and more capable all the while through the discharge of that responsibility, if we are not the right people in Congress, they take us out and put the right people here. They do the same thing in other positions of public importance and power. But I do not care what else you have. If we permit the great body of American citizenship to lose their governmental power by its nonuse, I do not care who your statesmen are, what their capacity is, I do not care how eloquent they are, I do not care what may be the wisdom of the man who holds public office, this country cannot preserve its institutions—no people can preserve their liberty who lose the strength to defend it. We have no kings; we have no hereditary nobility. In this country we have nobody to govern except the people. There is not anything more destructive than this notion abroad in this land—on to Washington for everything the people may want! This creation of an attitude of national dependence upon a great Federal bureaucracy is one of the most dangerous things that a free people can do. I am supporting this recovery program, but I am not unmindful of the price we will have to pay for having got ourselves in a condition which makes this program necessary, and I am not unmindful of the high type of citizenship which will be necessary to deal with its aftermath if we are to avoid disaster. [Applause.]

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am prompted to put an inquiry to the gentleman from Texas because I recognize in him—and I am sure he will take this in good part—the type which has been somewhat submerged recently—the Jeffersonian Democrat. I might like to count myself in if a Jeffersonian Democrat stands for the principles which the gentleman from Texas has just enunciated.

The gentleman from Texas has touched upon an issue which I believe is the most vital and fundamental to be confronted by our people for many a year; and I am wondering what comment or thought may come from the gentleman from Texas when he recalls, in connection with the centralization of power at Washington and the atrophying of the power of self-government which may be inflicted upon the people as its result, that the President of the United States in his annual message to the Congress delivered before this House but a few days ago, openly indicated that this whole new program embarked upon incident to the emergency shall become the permanent policy of the United States.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I shall answer the gentleman very candidly my own opinion about it.

Here is what I think about these times, and what I say about this is not said in a controversial way, if I am able to diagnose this particular period in which we are—it is the recurrence of a very interesting phenomenon to be found not infrequently in the governmental history of Anglo-Saxon peoples; crises come in the history of all peoples. Frequently they result from the failure of the people to do what they could have done safely when they ought to have done it. Anyway they get themselves up against a crisis that exceeds the capacity of ordinary Anglo-Saxon governmental machinery functioning as it ordinarily functions with distributed responsibility and a slow pick-up, because our governmental system has a slow pick-up and it has a distributed governmental responsibility.

Ours is a very old system of government. Through long processes of time certain governmental instincts seem to develop.

Our people seem instinctively to sense the existence of a crisis which exceeds that capacity of their governmental system functioning in the ordinary way. In such a situation instead of permanently changing their system of government they have the genius to concentrate governmental power, give to the agency into which the concentration has gone all the power that a dictator could have, which carries with it as quick a pick-up as a dictatorial government could have, but at the same time they are able to retain the power—I am talking about power now—retain the power over the exercise of the delegated power, and retain the power to recapture and redistribute this concentrated power when the crisis shall have ended. What will happen in the future only time can tell, but I do not believe we will permanently operate under the present arrangement. As I see it, the present arrangement is the offspring of a great crisis and must disappear with the going of that out of which it grew. Doubtless we will salvage something, possibly much, out of this experience, but it is not a governmental revolution. It is not new in Anglo-Saxon governmental experience. There is a fairly well defined course which is run. Anyway we had better begin to get ready for a parallel swing back toward the other extreme from that toward which we have been moving. [Applause.]

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time—5 minutes—to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WILSON].

Mr. SWICK. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WILSON].

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Chairman, I would not at this time refer to the pending election contest from Louisiana if it had not been that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS] took the matter up yesterday.

On the first day of the present session of this Congress, the Committee on Elections No. 3 was instructed by a resolution unanimously approved by this body to determine the prima facie question and the ultimate right and privilege of Mrs. Bolivar E. Kemp and J. Y. Sanders, Jr., to a seat in the House of Representatives.

This resolution was introduced for the sole reason that the issues involved effect the rights and privileges not only of the citizens of the Sixth Congressional District of Louisiana and the State of Louisiana but also of every congressional district and every State in the Union.

This is not based upon the operation of political factions, but because vital and important legal questions are involved.

I deeply regret that conditions have arisen making this action necessary and imperative. I infer from the speech delivered on yesterday by my colleague from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS] that his conclusion is that the committee in its report has not correctly construed the law, and that the decision unanimously reached is not sustained by the Constitution and laws of the United States or of the State of Louisiana. In that connection, I differ with the gentleman from Mississippi, and I confine my statement to an outline of the law, as I see it.

The issues now before the House relate to an election to fill a vacancy in the office of a Representative in Congress. Now what does the Constitution and laws provide in connection therewith.

Section 2 of article I reads:

When vacancies happen in the representation from any State, the executive authority thereof shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies.

Section 4 of article I reads:

The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time, by law, make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.

Now it has been unanimously held that where a State has enacted legislation as directed by the Constitution the laws of the State govern and control the election procedure.

The Hoge case has been cited in support of the action of the Governor of Louisiana in calling an election to be held in 7 days to avoid the opportunity given by the laws of Louisiana to select their nominees in a primary election. What are the facts?

The actual decision has the opposite effect and supports the conclusions rendered by Elections Committee No. 3 of the present Congress.

The John Hoge case (Pennsylvania):

It appears to the committee that, though by the second section of the first article of the Constitution of the United States it is made the duty of the executive authority of the respective States to issue writs of election to fill vacancies, yet, by the fourth section of the said article, it is made the duty of the legislature of each State to prescribe the times, places, and manner of holding such elections. It appears, however, that several elections to supply vacancies in Congress have been held heretofore in Pennsylvania; yet, on examining the laws of that State, it appears that no law exists prescribing the times, places, and manner of holding elections to supply such vacancies as may happen in the representation in Congress.

The State of Louisiana had enacted laws prescribing the time, place, and manner of holding elections to supply vacanicies in the representation in the Congress.

The inference is that the only reason why the Committee on Elections at that time and the House of Representatives upheld the executive order of the Governor of Pennsylvania was that there was no law in Pennsylvania fixing the time, manner, and place of holding elections.

Mr. MONTET. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILSON. I yield.

Mr. MONTET. In the Pennsylvania case did it appear that the people of the State have been imploring the Governor to call an election for 3 months before he did it?

Mr. WILSON. I am not sure about that.

Mr. MONTET. It is true in the Louisiana case, is it not?

Mr. WILSON. Yes; that is true; they had appealed for the calling of the election.

Mr. MONTET. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILSON. I yield.

Mr. MONTET. Is it not also true that in the case pending before us now, the Kemp-Sanders case, despite the implorations made on the Governor by the people of the Sixth Congressional District for months and months, that 3 days before the Governor actually issued the call for the Kemp election he made a public statement on the 24th day of November that he would not call an election?

Mr. WILSON. I do not know whether that is in the record or not, but it would not matter so far as the legality of this question is concerned.

Mr. MONTET. Is that not a fact?

Mr. WILSON. Is that in the hearings?

Mr. MONTET. Yes.

Mr. WILSON. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILSON. Yes. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I must confess that under ordinary circumstances I would be inclined to look with extreme disfavor upon a precedent which refused to accept the apparently bona fide credentials of the Governor and secretary of state showing that a person was entitled to a seat in this House; but if I understand the facts in this case, that contention was waived by the agreement of both parties to this contest; is that not true?

Mr. WILSON. That is correct. It was to go to the committee for a report upon the legality of the election and whether or not either party should be seated.

Mr. BANKHEAD. So far as this record is made up, Mrs. Kemp in this case waived, as I understand it, by agreement, her right to insist upon being immediately sworn in as a Member under her credentials.

Mr. WILSON. That is what I understood from my colleague, Mr. FERNANDEZ, who spoke on that subject.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILSON. Yes; I yield.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman support the committee report?

Mr. WILSON. Yes. I have but a short time, and what I want to do is to get into the RECORD my construction of the law.

Mr. COX. Very well. I will not detain you.

Mr. WILSON. It comes now to the fact that the sole contention, as I understand it in this case, is whether or not the Congress of the United States will uphold the order of the Governor of Louisiana as being legal when he called this election to be held within 7 days, after the 6 months had elapsed, since the vacancy occurred.

THE GENERAL ELECTION LAW OF LOUISIANA

Now, what are the provisions of the law of the State of Louisiana in this case? It says:

That it shall be the duty of the Governor, at least 30 days before every general election, to issue his proclamation giving notice thereof, which shall be published in the official journal.

The board of supervisors of election of each parish shall give 15 days' notice of every general election by advertisement in the official journal of their parish, if there be one, and by posting at four public places in the parish if there be no official journal in said parish. But no default by the Governor or parish board of supervisors of election to issue said proclamation shall deprive the people of their right to hold an election as fixed by law or vitiate said election when held.

SECTION 6. Be it further enacted, etc., in case of vacancy in said office of Representative in Congress between the general election, it shall be the duty of the Governor by proclamation to cause an election to be held according to law to fill such vacancy. Elections shall be held in the precincts and at the polling places hereinafter defined and hereinbelow directed to be established.

It shall be held according to the laws of the State of Louisiana. That is the direct declaration to us.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILSON. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. COX. In what respect did the election in which Mrs. Kemp was supposed to have been elected fail to follow the State law?

Mr. WILSON. That is what I am getting to now. In the State of Louisiana, as probably in every other southern State, the primary election is the election. That is the controlling factor. Of course, there is no opposition after the primary election is over.

LOUISIANA PRIMARY ELECTION LAW

Be it enacted by the Legislature of Louisiana, That all political parties shall make all nominations for candidates for the United States Senate, Members of the House of Representatives in the Congress of the United States, all State, district, parochial, and ward officers, members of the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Louisiana, and all city and ward officers in all cities containing more than 5,000 population, by direct primary elections.

That is the mandatory provision of the Louisiana law.

That any nomination of any person for any of the aforesaid mentioned offices by any other method shall be illegal, and the secretary of state is prohibited from placing on the official ballot the name of any person as a candidate for any political party not nominated in accordance with the provisions of this act.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILSON. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. COX. How did the action of the committee, giving Mrs. Kemp the nomination, affect the right of any other elector of the district to offer for the office in the general election?

Mr. WILSON. The gentleman from Georgia knows that the nomination at a Democratic primary under the emblem of the Democratic Party, which is the rooster in Louisiana, is equal to election, and to tell someone outside after this ticket is prepared that anybody may go in and write his name on it is useless.

Mr. COX. I am not antagonistic to the position the gentleman has taken, but as Mrs. Kemp had no such nomination, how did the fact that two committeemen came together and offered her the nomination deprive any other citizen of the district of the right to participate in that election?

Mr. WILSON. Because this nomination prohibited any other name going on the ticket as the candidate of the Democratic Party.

Mr. COX. But that is a part of the machinery down there. How could the action of that committee be construed as a nomination that would operate against anyone else participating in the election?

Mr. WILSON. Because the tickets were printed with that name only.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILSON. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. BLANCHARD. The only way any candidate could have his name placed on the ballot is by writing it in? The only way he could receive a vote is by having his name written in?

Mr. WILSON. Oh, yes; by having the name written in.

Quoting further the primary election law:

SEC. 9. That whenever a special election is held to fill a vacancy for an unexpired term caused by death, resignation, or otherwise of any officer, the respective committees having authority to call primary elections to nominate candidates for said office shall have full authority to fix the date at which a primary election shall be held to nominate candidates in said special election, which date shall not be less than 10 days after the special election shall have been ordered.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILSON. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. KNUTSON. Who called the primary that nominated Mr. Sanders?

Mr. WILSON. That was a mass meeting of citizens of the Sixth District.

Mr. KNUTSON. It was not a legally constituted organization?

Mr. WILSON. It was a mass meeting called for the purpose of holding an election. The claim for legality of the action of the committee presenting the nominee is based upon the exceptions made in the primary law after a primary election has been called.

Mr. SWICK. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Louisiana 3 additional minutes.

Mr. WILSON. The only conditions under which a name may be certified as a party nominee on a Democratic ticket in Louisiana is set out under section 6 of the Primary Election Laws of Louisiana:

That all vacancies caused by death or resignation or otherwise among the nominees selected by any political party, under the provisions of this act, shall be filled by the committee, which has jurisdiction over the calling and ordering of the said primary election, and in the event that no person shall have applied to become a candidate for a political office within the time fixed by law, or the call of the committee ordering the primary, or in any other event wherein the party shall have no nominee selected under the provisions of this act, the committee calling the primary shall select the nominee for any position named in the call of the committee and shall have full authority to certify said name as the nominee of the said party.

There is no way under the law or under this provision of law whereby anyone's name can be placed upon that ticket as the nominee of the Democratic Party except after a primary has been called and a vacancy occurs by death or resignation or there may be some office for which no one has offered as a candidate.

So, Mr. Chairman, I have simply taken this time to clear up the matter so far as I can and give my construction of the law on account of what was said about the case on yesterday.

The Governor of Louisiana had waited more than 6 months after the vacancy occurred. He had had plenty of time to have given all opportunity to anybody who wanted to be a candidate, but he calls the election to be held within 7 days, with no time for a primary and the committee makes the certification without having ordered a primary, when the direct provision of the law is that no such certification can be made except by the committee calling a primary and after the primary election had been called. [Applause.]

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks made earlier in the day, and if I can secure them in time to include some statistics from the C.W.A.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. SWICK. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentlewoman from Kansas [Mrs. MCCARTHY].

Mrs. MCCARTHY. Mr. Chairman, the Department of Agriculture recently issued a report giving the results of the wheat allotment plan.

The results were somewhat discouraging, and because of this fact I have introduced two bills, which, to my mind, would help to correct the situation. One of my bills is a bill to license the producer and the other one provides a tax on expansion of acreage.

The first bill would give the Secretary of Agriculture the power to license producers who do not reduce their acreage. The theory behind this measure is that such licensing power would be used only when necessary to hold down threatened expansions. In the event the Secretary of Agriculture would decide that reduction of acreage was not necessary, he would not be compelled to exercise this licensing authority. Use of the tax plan on additional acreage is also optional.

I will now give you some information about this report issued by the Department.

The 11 principal wheat States went along with the Department's program and greatly reduced their acreage.

For example, in the State of Kansas 97 percent of the wheat farmers reduced their acreage the agreed 15 percent. In these 11 wheat States 33,000,000 acres is the amount of winter wheat planted last fall as compared with thirty-six and a half million acres, which is the annual average during the base period, 1929 to 1931. This reduction, 77 percent of the gross reduction expected, shows that the winter-wheat States are responding well to the adjustment plan. On the other hand, taking the Nation as a whole, 41,000,000 acres of wheat were seeded this fall as compared with the 42,500,000 for the fall of 1932, giving a reduction from last year's planting of only 4 percent for the entire Nation. As compared with the base period, fall plantings are 7.2 percent less.

These figures mean a great deal to a Member from the greatest wheat State in the Nation. Closer study shows that while wheat-State farmers have practically all pledged to control acreage, farmers in the eastern Corn Belt, on the northern edge of the Cotton Belt, and in the Northeast have increased their wheat acreage, their reason, of course, being that they hope to realize the higher prices resulting from the reductions of the regular wheat farmers.

One bill I have introduced places a per-acre tax on plantings in excess of that during the base period, the tax being paid into the wheat allotment fund.

The other measure I propose is simply to give the Secretary of Agriculture the power to place under license all farmers not cooperating in a production-control plan if they display evidence of extending their wheat acreage or other surplus crop above the amount ordinarily raised by them in their regular rotation of crops. Neither plan would work a hardship on anyone, but would give assurance to those farmers who have contracted to reduce their operations in a given product that they would not be penalized for joining in a great program to control production and raise the level of farm prices. This measure is similar to the one giving licensing powers to the N.R.A. Administrator, and such power should also be valid for the A.A.A.

The benefits of the allotment plan have been made clearly apparent to the wheat industry. Farmers have received 65 to 75 cents per bushel for their grain instead of 24 to 30 cents. Wheat producers are now receiving the first installment of the $102,000,000 adjustment payment. Their incomes have been doubled, and for the first time in 10 years they feel they are attaining permanent stability through the adjustment program. For the good of this industry it is important that the plan not be jeopardized by actions of a minority not dependent on wheat, and in return the wheat farmer is, no doubt, willing to restrain from expanding his production of hogs, or other products, as the case may be.

Mr. SWICK. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BLANCHARD].

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Chairman, there are just a few observations I want to make on the Kemp case, inasmuch as it was discussed yesterday and again today.

It is an important question, and I am pleased that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] asked a question with reference to the prima facie right of a person to be administered the oath of office when credentials are presented from a sovereign State in the proper manner.

I am glad this matter has been cleared up, because I believe the RECORD should be kept absolutely straight and that it be made clear that any individual who comes with proper credentials should not be denied the right to take the oath of office.

There have been, of course, two notable exceptions to the general procedure, and I question at least one of them; the decision of the House in the Berger case, where the oath was denied. In the other case, the Utah case, I am not familiar enough with it to speak with any degree of knowledge.

Now, I want to present three propositions for consideration. The first is the prima facie right of a person to take the oath of office unless there are objections, constitutional or legal, against it. Secondly, the propriety of Congress going back of an election and determining whether or not the nomination is properly made, and thirdly, the election itself.

In connection with the propriety of Congress investigating the nomination, I want to call your attention to the case of Wise against Young in the Fifty-fifth Congress:

> The contestee introduced much in his answer and something in his testimony concerning the manner of the contestant's nomination. Now, in the case of Lowry against White it was well said:
> "In contested cases it is improper to consider allegations in the testimony intended to show simply by what means the person became a candidate." And so we dispose of that question. (Hinds Precedents, vol. 2, sec. 1103.)

In the same connection I desire to call your attention to the Federal Corrupt Practices Act of 1925, which specifically excludes from its operation primaries and conventions of political parties, recognizing to that extent a lack of jurisdiction by Congress to legislate concerning such instrumentalities for the selection of candidates.

If we are to pass on the legality of the situation in Louisiana, in the Sixth Congressional District, the failure on the part of the Governor of the State to call an election in ample time so that the primary or the run-off primary might be held, then I think the conclusion is quite clear that there is no legal election in this case.

As has been so well stated, the law is specific that no candidate unless nominated in accordance with the laws of the State of Louisiana can have his name placed on the ballot.

Again, I repeat that if we are to go back of the election there is only one conclusion we can arrive at and that is that the election was not proper and not legal.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANCHARD. I yield.

Mr. COX. It is not a fact that the precedents of the House and the Senate are that either body has the right to pass upon the right of a candidate to sit in that House, and to go back of the election?

Mr. BLANCHARD. The Senate has its rules and it is a fact they do go back of the election.

Mr. COX. And the precedents of the House are all in support of that proposition.

Mr. BLANCHARD. On the question of the election itself I cite this provision of the Louisiana law:

> That in case of vacancy in said office of Representatives in Congress between the general elections, it shall be the duty of the Governor, by proclamation, to cause an election to be held according to law to fill such vacancy.

That pertains not to the primary election but to the election to fill the vacancy.

The language is significant "To cause an election to be held according to law." What law? Not a law promulgated by the Governor of Louisiana, but a law promulgated by the legislature, a law in existence in the State where this arises.

And by any process of reasoning we must in this case, if we are to examine the primary election laws in Louisiana, conclude that the people were foreclosed from having any right to hold a primary election, and on the question of the election itself there was no legal election on the basis of this law.

Mr. TERRELL of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANCHARD. Yes.

Mr. TERRELL of Texas. I want to ask the gentleman two questions that are easily answered. Do the election laws of Louisiana require that in a special election the candidate must be nominated before his name is put on the ticket?

Mr. BLANCHARD. I answer that as I answered the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox], that the law specifically says that any candidate nominated in any other way than by the laws of the State of Louisiana—and they refer to the primary election laws—is not entitled to have his name on the ballot.

Mr. TERRELL of Texas. I do not think the gentleman has answered my question clearly.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I think I did.

Mr. TERRELL of Texas. I want to know if the laws require that a person to be elected in a special election has to be nominated in the primary?

Mr. BLANCHARD. My contention is that he must assuredly be selected in the primary.

Mr. TERRELL of Texas. The other question is, Does the law require the Governor to call an election far enough in advance to have the primary election held?

Mr. BLANCHARD. It presupposes——

Mr. TERRELL of Texas. "Presupposes" is not the law.

Mr. BLANCHARD. The gentleman has a right to his interpretation. There are interpretations—and they will be found in the brief and argument submitted to this committee—which contend that this election could be held without the necessity of a primary election, but they base their conclusions on what they regard to be the law of the State of Louisiana. That is not my conclusion, however. Yesterday in the argument on this same point, the question was raised as to whether or not under the Governor's proclamation the primaries could be held in time to permit an election prior to the convening of Congress on January 3. That is not controlling. We had a case in the State of Wisconsin in the Fifth District, now represented by my able colleague, Mr. O'MALLEY, where there was no representation for a period of 2 years.

It is always unfortunate when a district is without representation, but the Governor of Louisiana had ample time to provide a date for the election so that primaries could be held, and his failure to issue the call in proper time is surely no reason why we should overlook the laws governing the case. This House cannot be held responsible for the laws passed by a State, but we are responsible when it comes to an interpretation of those laws.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired. All time has expired. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment under the 5-minute rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

Naval training stations: For maintenance, operation, and other necessary expenses, including repairs, improvements, and care of grounds of the naval training stations which follow:
San Diego, Calif., $155,150.
Newport, R.I., $46,813.
Great Lakes, Ill., $227,503.
Norfolk, Va., $215,950.

Mr. CONDON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. CONDON: Page 7, line 22, after the words "Rhode Island", strike out "$46,813" and insert "$191,211."

Mr. CONDON. Mr. Chairman, it is apparent from this naval appropriation bill and the remarks of the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee on yesterday that the Navy is about to be greatly enlarged and brought up to the strength authorized by the London Naval Treaty. This is what many of us, who believe in an adequate Navy, have long sought for but scarcely hoped to see. The consummation of this patriotic purpose will be not the least of the crowning glories of this administration of which it now seems there are to be many. It further appears quite clearly from the speech that followed later in the day by the able Chairman of the great Committee on Naval Affairs that steps will be taken without delay to authorize the immediate building of much needed ships in all categories. This announcement brought a favorable response from the House and there is no doubt but that its publication in the press has by this time brought a like favorable response from the country.

The American people want a great Navy, and they will no longer tolerate, much less support, the pursuit of a mistaken policy, based upon a misunderstanding of the policies of other nations, which has prevented too long the building of the Navy to treaty strength.

Naturally I am for that kind of a Navy, and I was happy to hear what was said here yesterday in the direction of our getting it in the not distant future. But when I looked further into this bill I was much surprised to find little, if any, consideration given to the present and future needs of the most essential part of such a Navy, namely, the enlisting and training of an adequate enlisted personnel.

Ships without men are as useless and silly as guns without ammunition. And yet this bill gives scant consideration to this vital need. In this matter the subcommittee is still thinking in terms of the false economy of last year which stripped all but one of our naval training stations of apprentices in training and practically stopped all recruiting throughout the country. I am informed that this policy has now been scrapped and that it is the intention of the Department to resume training activities in preparation for the increased demand for men that must come with the completion of these new ships. If that is true, the training stations must be reopened and put on an active operating basis, and it must be true if we are not going to have another long list of empty expensive ships of war rotting at their docks waiting for the junk pile.

In this regard let me say a word about the naval training station at Newport, R.I., which I am sorry to say has been grossly overlooked by this committee. This station is now on a bare maintenance basis. No recruits are being trained there. This was in accord with the economy program of last spring. Unless the committee reconsiders its action and appropriates at least the amount contained in the last appropriation bill no recruits will be trained there this year. In other words, Newport will continue on a so-called "economy basis." Why? If there is a reasonable answer, I have not heard it.

The other three stations, San Diego, Great Lakes, and Hampton Roads, by this bill receive approximately the same appropriation as in the last supply bill. It is difficult, and I undertake to say here impossible, to justify this discrimination on any basis of economy or sound naval policy. I do not know the adequacy of these other stations for training purposes. I assume that they are needed, and I make no criticism of their treatment by the committee. But I do know the character and high quality of the facilities at Newport. I do know the favorable and unique situation which this station enjoys for training our naval apprentices. I do know the high competency and the splendid history of this station in producing the fighting men of our Navy since 1883.

It was in that year that the station was established by Secretary of the Navy William E. Chandler on land ceded to the United States by the State of Rhode Island without compensation. Its location there has ever since been considered by those competent to judge, a wise decision. There are many reasons for this but I shall mention but a few of them. Its location on Narragansett Bay is in proximity to shipping of every description and thus the new recruit is introduced to a point of view of nautical life unsurpassed elsewhere. Narragansett Bay has long been a favorable concentration point for the fleet in the North Atlantic and ships are constantly calling there, thus facilitating easy delivery and reception of personnel. New York is within easy steaming distance, as are related stations at Portsmouth, Boston, and New London. The station itself has a high record for healthfulness and is an ideal place from this standpoint for the training of young men.

All of these natural advantages are important, but equally important is the fact that over the years since 1883 the Government has invested millions of dollars here in developing and bringing up to a high state of efficiency the physical plant of an up-to-date, modern naval-training station. It was testified in the hearings before the committee by Admiral Leahy (p. 142) that the investment was $4,729,076.

The barracks at this station are all of brick construction, fundamentally staunch, and good for years of use in the future. While this station remains closed these fine modern buildings are empty and idle, a source of expense to the Government without yielding the slightest return, and inevitably deteriorating and depreciating notwithstanding all efforts at maintenance. What excuse is there, what can there be, for neglecting to utilize such facilities in the face of the intention of the Department to train, at Hampton Roads, 4,812 recruits this coming fiscal year, partly in old war-time frame buildings, which are difficult to maintain and expensive to heat, as testified to at the hearings by Captain McCain on page 145?

If there is such an excuse, I hope the committee will let the House know of it. It neither appears in the hearings nor in the report of the committee.

How can the failure to provide for the resumption of training at Newport be justified on any plea of economy or otherwise when the Great Lakes station has had its full appropriation of 1934 restored, and this in spite of a contrary Budget estimate and without any request therefor by the Department? The argument made by the committee in its report to support its action can be made with even greater force and cogency for Newport. I suggest that the committee reconsider its action in this matter and restore the 1934 appropriation of $191,211 for Newport. Let it leave to the further reflection of the Department the matter of reopening this station, as it has done in the case of the Great Lakes, according to its own report, on page 8, as follows, referring to Great Lakes:

> The committee has added to the Budget a total of $376,697, in order that the Department may be free to reopen the station if upon further reflection it should decide to pursue that course.

I am asking for fair play in this matter and no favors. I am completely willing to leave the question of the usefulness and efficiency of the Newport station to the sound judgment of the Department, because I am convinced of the unsurpassed qualifications of that station to perform this essential service to the Navy. This very matter has been inquired into before by naval experts, and, after full and exhaustive investigation, they reported their findings, which are a matter of public record. In January 1923 the so-called "Rodman Board" reported as follows:

> The board recommends that training activities on the Atlantic coast be centered at the naval training station at Newport, R.I.

That report, signed by 4 admirals and 3 captains of the Navy, was approved by the Secretary of the Navy on June 26, 1923, and to my knowledge has never been superseded by any subsequent report based upon an investgiation of comparable scope and character as the Rodman inquiry.

Improvements at other training stations, it is true, have been made since the above date, making them more competent to perform efficient training service, but in no particular has Newport suffered the loss of any of the natural and material advantages that appealed so strongly to the expert minds of this board at that time.

In the face of this evidence it seems to me that the committee ought to fairly reconsider this matter and restore the appropriation of 1934, and I hope that the chairman will accept the amendment.

The same consideration ought to have been given to Newport as has been given to the Great Lakes, and again I repeat I have no criticism whatever to make of the appropriation that has been made for the Great Lakes. I am asking for fair play in this matter and no favors. I appreciate the fact that this country ought not to spend a single unnecessary dollar for any part of maintaining its great Naval Establishment unless that dollar can bring back to the country something of value. I am not asking anything for Newport merely because it happens to be in my district. I believe that Newport is incomparably the best station on the Atlantic coast to train these men. I am completely willing to leave that question in the discretion of the Department and let them say whether or not this station should or should not be open during the year 1935. Admiral Rodman and his associates declared this training station was the only training station on the Atlantic coast at which ought to be centered the training of apprentices of our Navy.

Mr. HEALEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONDON. Yes.

Mr. HEALEY. Can the gentleman tell us what part of the country most of the apprentices are recruited from that have been trained at Newport?

Mr. CONDON. The Newport Training Station, I am informed, serves New England, New York, and New Jersey. Boys coming from that particular section of the country were always trained at Newport.

Mr. HEALEY. So that quite an item of expense would be involved in sending those recruits elsewhere?

Mr. CONDON. I am reliably informed that it is more expensive to send recruits from that section of the country, particularly New England and New York, to Hampton Roads or to any of the other stations than it is to send them to Newport. That makes a very substantial increase in expense for the station at Hampton Roads and the one at Great Lakes.

Mr. HEALEY. Is it not a fact that the amount of the increased appropriation you have asked for in your amendment, $144,000, will not be saved by not using the facilities at Newport, but that the depreciation of those facilities, plus the expense of sending those recruits elsewhere will more than amount to the sum you have asked?

Mr. CONDON. It is quite likely that will happen.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. CONDON] has again expired.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may be allowed to proceed for 3 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN]?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONDON. I yield.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I should like to join in urging the adoption of the amendment which has been offered by the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. CONDON]. I live in a State in very close proximity to the Naval Station at Newport, R.I. It is easily accessible to thousands of recruits from New England who join the Navy. It is ideally equipped, and it is in the interest of economy that this station be continued. I sincerely trust the amendment offered by the gentleman from Rhode Island will be agreed to.

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONDON. I yield.

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. The gentleman spoke a moment ago about the extra expense of sending recruits from New England and New Jersey and New York to Norfolk. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that after recruits have been trained at Newport it is necessary to send the major portion of them to Norfolk anyway, either to join with ships based there or for transfer to the Pacific via naval transport?

Mr. CONDON. I do not understand it is necessary to send those men to Norfolk to get additional training aboard ship. I have talked with officers at Newport and it is my understanding that ships come into Newport regularly, and have taken on apprentices from the naval station for their fleet training. I talked this matter over with the Assistant Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Roosevelt, last spring, and he was not then in a position to tell us there was going to be any saving by concentrating the training at Hampton Roads on the Atlantic coast. He was not able to controvert our argument that there was a distinct saving in having these men from the northeastern section of the country trained at Newport.

Mr. MILLARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONDON. I yield.

Mr. MILLARD. About how many men are trained there?

Mr. CONDON. The training station has been closed for the past few months.

Mr. MILLARD. But I mean when it is in full operation.

Mr. CONDON. They have trained as high as 2,600 men at Newport, as I understand it.

Mr. MILLARD. All from the section of the country to which the gentleman referred a moment ago?

Mr. CONDON. All from the Northeastern States; yes, sir.

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, as much as I think of the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. CONDON] and as much as I think of the good citizens of Newport, at the same time I must oppose the amendment offered by the gentleman from Rhode Island for the reason that it is absolutely unnecessary to open the Newport Training Station. In the first place, under this bill we will have a training station operating on the Pacific coast at San Diego. We will have a training station at Chicago, which is in the center of the United States, as near as it can be placed, assuming that the department will reopen it, and we will have one on the Atlantic coast at Norfolk. That is all that are necessary. Those three training stations can accommodate and train over 19,000 recruits a year—19,088, to be exact. There will not be more than 10,000 recruits trained next year, so what is the use of going to the expense of opening another training station on the Atlantic coast? In other words, it is time for us to begin to think of confining appropriations to the necessities or essentials in order to have enough to provide for the Navy in an efficient way and not be making appropriations where it is not necessary simply to satisfy a local demand.

Now, on that score the gentleman ought not to have any complaint. Newport is very well taken care of. For instance, Newport has a naval hospital where we spent in 1933 $187,151. Newport has a Navy purchasing office where we spent in that year $36,977.55; it has a Navy torpedo station where the 1933 expenditures totaled $3,190,410. It has a naval station, not a training station but a naval station, for which the 1933 expenditures totaled $262,252, and a naval war college, all at Newport, for which the expenditures during 1933 amounted to $739,656, or, all told, $4,416,448. Newport has no ground for complaint—or at least no just ground—that it is not being fairly treated. It is an absolutely useless expenditure to open up the Newport Training Station, because, as I said, with the training station on the Pacific coast, the one in the interior at Great Lakes, and the one on the Atlantic coast at Norfolk, we will have more than enough accommodations for the training of recruits. I hope the amendment will be voted down.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. CONDON].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. CONDON) there were ayes 19 and noes 42.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the figures in line 24.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. CONDON] made a splendid effort, worthy of his reputation, in behalf of his training station, and I want to compliment him upon the comprehensive way in which he presented the facts. I wish I could have supported his amendment; but being at all times for strict and rigid economy, I could not conscientiously do so.

I feel that the committee, under the leadership of the able gentleman from Kansas [Mr. AYRES], has been eminently fair in making appropriations and recommendations, and I myself have cause to be and am thankful to him and to his subcommittee for the splendid way they have treated the great Middle West.

Before leaving Washington some weeks ago I called attention to the fact that the Middle West was again being discriminated against when the Navy Department eliminated the appropriation for the Great Lakes Training Station. Therefore I am indeed thankful and greatly appreciate, and I know the people of the Middle West will greatly appreciate, the fact that there has been provided the sum of $227,503 for the purpose of reopening the Great Lakes Training Station.

I am sure no one will charge me with being desirous of supporting large appropriations for the Army and the Navy; nevertheless, I believe that we are legislating in the right direction when we provide for the reopening of the Great Lakes Training Station. During the war and up to a year ago I think more young men were trained at that station than at any of the other stations.

Invariably the Great Lakes region gets but little in comparison with the South and the East; so this little appropriation will be thankfully received.

I shall not dwell longer upon the need for this appropriation. I am not fearful of any of these statements I hear and articles I read from time to time about the approaching dangers of war. Such things appear invariably just preceding the time we have a military or a naval bill before us. There are a certain number of gentlemen in Japan who like to hear themselves talk. Why, to me it is amusing that these gentlemen even could contemplate for one moment provoking war with this great powerful Nation of ours. So it is not through the prompting of such statements that I support this item, but it is for the purpose of enabling the young men of the Middle West to be trained in their own section of the country and to save them and their parents all unnecessary expenditures of going way down East or way out on the coast. I feel the reopening of this station will be of great help and economical benefit in general.

During general debate today I was amused when I heard these gentlemen from the East, especially the gentleman from Massachusetts, demanding with vigor and determination that there be an investigation.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. SABATH. Well do I remember his attitude and the attitude of the other Members on his side of the House when in 1930, and long before that, I demanded upon this floor honest investigation of certain nefarious practices and conduct. Invariably when the opportunity was given me to secure a vote of the House, I did not see him backing my arguments or hear his voice voting with me for any of those much-needed investigations.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question at that point?

Mr. SABATH. Yes; I am glad to yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. TABER. Will the gentleman tell us some of the investigations he brought up on the floor? I think the House will be interested to hear of them.

Mr. SABATH. Yes; I shall be pleased to explain some of them to the gentleman. I asked for and urged and insisted upon an investigation of the stock exchange in 1929. Day after day on the floor of the House I pleaded that we investigate that den of incorrigible gamblers, as well as the damnable investment bankers who brought wreck, ruin, and sorrow to America.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. Not now. I shall be glad to yield in a minute.

I also demanded in 1930 an investigation of the Federal Reserve Board. That was the time when most of us thought the Federal Reserve Board should be a little more liberal in accepting for rediscount the $2,000,000,000 of finance corporations' paper, short-term municipal bonds, and mortgages on homes, which would have saved the Nation from the resultant destruction and the closing of hundreds of small banks; but under the leadership of the party to which the gentleman belongs, which is, happily for America, a decadent party, I could not secure any favorable consideration notwithstanding my continuous appeals.

I also requested and urged an investigation of the Treasury Department, as the gentleman knows, when we desired to find out who were the beneficiaries of the $3,000,000,000 of tax refunds under Mellon's and Mills' Republican administration; but we could not secure any favorable action or cooperation from the gentlemen on the other side of the aisle.

The gentleman also remembers, perhaps, that in 1932 I asked for the investigation of the Post Office Department in the matter of unconscionable air mail contracts, exorbitant leases, and the purchase of undesirable sites. True, we did pass that resolution and secured a few votes for it on the Republican side. Of course I was grateful for that. But since that time it has been demonstrated that the investigation should have been conducted more thoroughly by the House Committee, with enlarged powers and more facilities, so that it would not have been necessary for the Senate committees to investigate, as they are doing, not only the air mail contracts, but also the stock exchange. I do not mean to infer that the House Post Office Committee was derelict. It did very well indeed with the facilities at hand.

I think it would have been better had the House listened to me and voted a reasonable appropriation for such investigations.

I also demanded and insisted upon an investigation of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation when the unwarranted loan of $95,000,000 was made to Mr. Dawes' bank. I am reliably informed that we are going to lose between $50,000,000 and $55,000,000 on that single loan; but to date I have not seen or heard any of the Members on the Republican side asking or advocating any such investigation.

As the gentleman knows I also made a strenuous effort to secure an investigation of the moving-picture industry. That was during the last session of Congress. The gentleman knows how the Republicans were whipped into line by Mr. Hays, Mr. Hilles, Mr. Mayer, Judge Henning, and a few other leading Republicans; and I was voted down.

Last but not least, I recall that very few gentlemen on the Republican side helped by voting for the resolution to investigate the gigantic bankruptcy-receivership ring throughout the United States, which investigation is now going on with the approval of the general public, including the American Bar Association. It is hoped that I have briefly given the gentleman [Mr. TABER] some of the investigations I have sponsored and some of which were ordered by the House without the assistance or approval of any leading Republicans. I hope I will in the near future have opportunity to dwell at length upon what has been accomplished by these investigations, which were all for the general public good and not for selfish political purposes, as the proposed investigation of the C.W.A., the administration of which agency is in the State of Illinois and elsewhere in the Middle West, unfortunately, in the hands of Republicans.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 more minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. SWICK. Mr. Chairman, I object.

By unanimous consent, the pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. DELANEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words for the purpose of making a statement to the committee.

My reason for making the statement at this time is because I am compelled to leave. For this reason I wish to call to the attention of the committee an amendment I should like to offer to the bill. The section of the bill dealing with Naval Reserves reads as follows:

NAVAL RESERVE

For expenses of organizing, administering, and recruiting the Naval Reserve and Naval Militia; pay and allowances of officers and enlisted men of the Naval Reserve when employed on authorized training duty; mileage for officers while traveling under orders to and from training duty; transportation of enlisted men to and from training duty, and subsistence and transfers en route, or cash in lieu thereof; subsistence of enlisted men during the actual period of training duty; subsistence of officers and enlisted men of the Fleet Naval Reserve while performing authorized training or other duty without pay; pay, mileage, and allowances of officers of the Naval Reserve and pay, allowances, and subsistence of enlisted men of the Naval Reserve when ordered to active duty in connection with the instruction, training, and drilling of the Naval Reserve; pay officers and enlisted men of the Fleet Naval Reserve for the performance of not to exceed 48 drills per annum or other equivalent instruction or duty, or appropriate duties, and administrative duties, exclusive, however, of pay, allowances, or other expenses on account of members of any class of the Naval Reserve incident to their being given flight training unless, as a condition precedent, they shall have been found by such agency as the Secretary of the Navy may designate physically and psychologically qualified to serve as pilots of naval aircraft, $2,745,509, of which amount not more than $150,000 shall be available for maintenance and rental of armories, including pay of necessary janitors, and for wharfage; not more than $81,000 shall be available for employees assigned to group IV (b) and those performing similar services carried under native and alien schedules in the Schedule of Wages for Civil Employees in the Field Service of the Navy Department; not less than $614,196 shall be available, in addition to other appropriations, for aviation material, equipment, fuel, and rental of hangars, not more than $397,914 shall be available, in addition to other appropriations, for fuel and the transportation thereof, and for all other expenses in connection with the maintenance, operation, repair, and upkeep of vessels assigned for training the Naval Reserve, and of such total sum $978,491 shall be available exclusively for and on account of Naval and Marine Corps Reserve aviation: Provided, That no appropriation contained in this act shall be available to pay more than one officer of the Naval Reserve and one officer of the Marine Corps Reserve above the grade of lieutenant or captain, respectively, the pay and allowances of their grade for the performance of active duty other than the performance of drills or other equivalent instruction or duty, or appropriate duties, and/or the performance of 15 days' active training duty, and other officers above such grades employed on such class of active duty shall not be entitled to or be paid a greater rate of pay and allowances than authorized by law for a lieutenant of the Navy or a captain of the Marine Corps entitled to not exceeding 10 years' longevity pay: Provided further, That no appropriation made in this act shall be available for pay, allowances, or traveling or other expenses of any officer or enlisted man of the Naval or Marine Corps Reserve who may be drawing a pension, disability allowance, disability compensation, or retired pay from the Government of the United States; and "retired pay" as here used shall not include the pay of transferred members of such reserve forces.

I should like to offer an amendment on page 13, raising the appropriation from $2,745,509 to $2,776,761 for this reason:

The Naval Reserve appropriation contains a proviso to the effect that only one Naval Reserve officer above the rank of lieutenant and one Marine Corps Reserve officer above the rank of captain employed on active duty may receive the pay of their grades, as contemplated by basic law governing the Naval Reserve, and that all other officers employed on active duty in connection with necessary Reserve activities, shall receive only the pay of a lieutenant of the Navy of 10 years' service.

This proviso would appear to constitute legislation contrary or in addition to existing law. It was first contained in the Naval Reserve appropriation for the fiscal year 1933; it was repeated for the fiscal year 1934; and it appears to be the intention of the committee to continue this proviso indefinitely, since it is again repeated for the fiscal year 1935.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DELANEY. I yield.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. The gentleman will remember that we fought this thing out once before and learned that it was not subject to a point of order. Therefore it will be necessary to accomplish the objective by amendment. The committee does not feel at this time that they should make any change whatsoever. So these Reserve officers who are drawing lieutenants' pay or captains' pay are deprived of the rights they otherwise would enjoy in regard to pay.

Mr. DELANEY. That is true.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. There is absolutely nothing that can be done as far as changing the law except by amendment, as it was carried in the previous appropriation bills, and is not subject to a point of order. The committee declines to accept an amendment.

Mr. DELANEY. I made that statement at the beginning of these remarks.

Of the 31 Naval Reserve officers on necessary active duty in connection with Naval Reserve activities throughout the country, 17 are affected by this proviso, of whom 4 are of the rank of captain, 2 are of the rank of commander, and the balance are of the rank of lieutenant commander. The duties performed by all of these officers are most necessary, and are in accordance with rank. If an officer of the Regular Navy should be assigned to the same duties it would be necessary that one of approximately the same rank be designated. However, due to the greater familiarity of the Reserve officers themselves, with the various features of their work, Regular Navy officers could not perform the work with equal efficiency.

The injustice of compelling a captain of the Naval Reserve to accept the pay of a lieutenant, and on top of that the reduction of 10 to 15 percent applied to all Government employees, is too patent to need discussion, and too iniquitous to be retained in this bill.

The entire Naval Reserve resents this stigma which has been placed upon them, in that theirs is the only branch of all the Federal service whose officers are not considered worthy to receive the pay of their rank.

In the event of the elimination of the proviso, an additional $31,252 would be required in the total amount of the appropriation.

The changes are as I have indicated above. That is all I desire to say, except to voice my protest against this legislation at this time.

The Clerk read as follows:

Instruction: For post-graduate instruction of officers in other than civil government and literature, and for special instruction, education, and individual training of officers and enlisted men at home and abroad, including maintenance of students abroad, except aviation training and submarine training otherwise appropriated for, and for the care and operation of schools at naval stations, Guantanamo Bay and Tutuila, for the children of Naval and Marine Corps commissioned, enlisted, and civilian personnel, $159.772;

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I rise to make a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GOSS. Line 16, after the word "for", down to and including the word "personnel" in line 20. I understand this provides for the current operation of schools at naval stations in Cuba, Guantanamo Bay, Tutuila, and Samoa. It seems to me this is putting the old nose of the camel under the tent. It is new legislation that has not been covered before in bills, and it seems to me that we should not create the precedent in this bill of establishing new schools for enlisted men, officers, or others without having the Military Affairs Committee go into the subject. It seems to me that is an injustice to other parts of the world where we have naval stations. It would perhaps be an injustice to naval stations in our own land. I want to ask the chairman if this is not brandnew language, simply putting the camel's nose under the tent, in this appropriation bill rather than having hearings before the committee and determining a policy in reference to this matter?

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. We had hearings before the committee. There is no question but what the language to which the gentleman refers is subject to a point of order. It is relatively a very small matter. It will only cost $1,600.

Mr. GOSS. I understand it only costs $1,600 this time, but next year we will have another bill come in without proper hearings, and that will make this a uniform practice in connection with all of our naval stations, Mr. Chairman, and therefore I am going to make the point of order so it will be handled in the proper way.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman makes the point of order that the provisions referred to are legislation on an appropriation bill, and the Chair sustains the point of order. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

NAVAL RESERVE

For expenses of organizing, administering, and recruiting the Naval Reserve and Naval Militia; pay and allowances of officers and enlisted men of the Naval Reserve when employed on authorized training duty; mileage for officers while traveling under orders to and from training duty; transportation of enlisted men to and from training duty, and subsistence and transfers en route, or cash in lieu thereof; subsistence of enlisted men during the actual period of training duty; subsistence of officers and enlisted men of the Fleet Naval Reserve while performing authorized training or other duty without pay; pay, mileage, and allowances of officers of the Naval Reserve and pay, allowances, and subsistence of enlisted men of the Naval Reserve when ordered to active duty in connection with the instruction, training, and drilling of the Naval Reserve; pay of officers and enlisted men of the Fleet Naval Reserve for the performance of not to exceed 48 drills per annum or other equivalent instruction or duty, or appropriate duties, and administrative duties, exclusive, however, of pay, allowances, or other expenses on account of members of any class of the Naval Reserve incident to their being given flight training unless, as a condition precedent, they shall have been found by such agency as the Secretary of the Navy may designate physically and psychologically qualified to serve as pilots of naval aircraft, $2,745,509, of which amount not more than $150,000 shall be available for maintenance and rental of armories, including pay of necessary janitors, and for wharfage; not more than $81,000 shall be available for employees assigned to group IV (b) and those performing similar services carried under native and alien schedules in the Schedule of Wages for Civil Employees in the Field Service of the Navy Department; not less than $614,196 shall be available, in addition to other appropriations, for aviation material, equipment, fuel, and rental of hangars, not more than $397,914 shall be available, in addition to other appropriations, for fuel and the transportation thereof, and for all other expenses in connection with the maintenance, operation, repair, and upkeep of vessels assigned for training the Naval Reserve, and of such total sum $978,491 shall be available exclusively for and on account of Naval and Marine Corps Reserve, aviation: Provided, That no appropriation contained in this act shall be available to pay more than one officer of the Naval Reserve and one officer of the Marine Corps Reserve above the grade of lieutenant or captain, respectively, the pay and allowances of their grade for the performance of active duty other than the performance of drills or other equivalent instruction or duty, or appropriate duties, and/or the performance of 15 days' active training duty, and other officers above such grades employed on such class of active duty shall not be entitled to or be paid a greater rate of pay and allowances than authorized by law for a lieutenant of the Navy or a captain of the Marine Corps entitled to not exceeding 10 years' longevity pay: Provided further, That no appropriation made in this act shall be available for pay, allowances, or traveling or other expenses of any officer or enlisted man of the Naval or Marine Corps Reserve who may be drawing a pension, disability allowance, disability compensation, or retired pay from the Government of the United States; and "retired pay" as here used shall not include the pay of transferred members of such reserve forces.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

I wish to commend the committee for restoring in this bill the funds to provide for 36 drills instead of 24 now enjoyed by the Naval Reserve. I am very much interested in the Naval Reserve, because of the fact that in the city of Atlanta, which I have the privilege of representing, although it is located 300 miles from the Atlantic Ocean, we have a unit of the Naval Reserve which for 3 consecutive years has won the title of being the best-trained unit in the United States. The late Admiral Rabey presented to that unit in Atlanta the trophy which they won for the third consecutive time this last summer.

I think it is to the credit of this fine group of young men who give up their hours in the evening, men who are employed in the regular vocations of business and devote their time to studying the tactics of the Navy so that in time of need they can come to the assistance of our Government. They are entitled to special credit, since they have no method of securing training on the water, being 300 miles away from the ocean, except when they are on a cruise each summer. These men give up their vacations each year for the purpose of fitting themselves to answer the call of this great Government should they be needed. I wish to pay this tribute to that fine group of men and to assure the committee that I hope next year they will be able to restore to them 48 drills, which they ought to have.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

The committee has been very liberal to the Naval Reserve and they have not only increased the number of drills of the Naval Reserve, but they have increased the flying hours, although the estimate did not provide for this.

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. We increased the drills from 24, the number to which they have been administratively restricted this year, to 36, and we increased the Budget estimate for the flying hours from 30 to 45 hours. We have been very liberal with the Naval Reserve, in my judgment.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. The gentleman from Atlanta speaks of being 300 miles away from the sea. We have a Naval Reserve in our city and we are 1,000 miles away from the sea. They are very much interested in their work. As the gentleman knows, and I have called it to his attention on numerous occasions, I realize the situation that confronts the committee, but I do want to express the hope that when the situation will permit the committee will provide for the 48 drills.

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. I may say further to the gentleman from Missouri that we also have provided for the 15-day cruises.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. DOBBINS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DOBBINS: On page 13, beginning in line 18, after the word "provided", strike out the remainder of that line and the following lines down to and including all of line 5 on page 14.

Mr. DOBBINS. Mr. Chairman, this amendment would strike out the proviso against which the gentleman from New York [Mr. DELANEY] protested a few minutes ago.

This amendment is offered for the purpose of striking out of the paragraph the words which limit the pay of 17 reserve officers who are detailed to active duty, ignoring the fact that they have earned and are entitled to enjoy a rank higher than that of lieutenant. These officers have the positions to which they are now assigned because they deserved the promotions that brought them this rank. There are 17 of them, not enough to have numerous friends on the floor of the House, but that is no reason they should not have justice in the matter of pay. They are doing the work now.

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOBBINS. I yield.

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. Does the gentleman know there is not a single one of these officers who is compelled to accept this duty which he is performing now? Not even the President of the United States could compel one of these men to serve on active duty in time of peace. It is entirely voluntary on their part.

Mr. DOBBINS. There is hardly an officer of this Government who is drafted into service, but the Government needs their services or it would not be utilizing them. The Government is utilizing the services of these men and declining to give in return, by reason of this provision, a fair rate of pay to them.

I have heard no explanation of why a captain or a commander or a lieutenant commander who is assigned to this work and who is performing this duty should receive the pay of a lieutenant who has only had 10 years of service in the Navy. I cannot conceive of any explanation.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, if the Government is to utilize the services of these men, it should pay them according to their worth. Of course, it may be argued that the pay is high. The pay of any senior officer of the Army or Navy when he has attained a high degree of proficiency and efficiency may seem to some rather high, but they are performing services that merit that pay. One of them is acting as adviser of the Naval Affairs Committee of the other body in this building. He is capable and competent and is a lieutenant commander and yet receives only a lieutenant's pay.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, this proviso should be eliminated.

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment just offered.

I may say, Mr. Chairman, so far as I am personally concerned—and I am inclined to think I speak for the balance of the committee, although I cannot state that positively—I do not see any need to have any Reserve officers in active service, with the possible exception of 1 administering Marine Reserve and 1 administering Navy Reserve affairs, and yet we have 31.

In the first place, we have about 381 surplus regular naval officers who could perform these duties just as well as the Reserve officers who are now performing them, and save this expense.

The National Guard, which is a much larger organization than the Naval Reserve, has not more than five officers performing active duty and receiving pay for it.

As chairman of the committee I may say that if anyone on the floor of this House should offer an amendment that no Reserve officer shall receive pay for the performance of continuous active duty, I should not object to it for a single moment, except, as I said, one with the Navy and one with the Marines as general administrative officers. We do not need any more. We have plenty of Regular officers who can perform these duties, and there is no need of building up an organization of this kind and using officers of the Reserve to perform active duty.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I am impelled to say a few words about this after hearing the chairman of the committee in charge of the bill mention his opposition to the placing upon active duty of any Reserve officers at all, and citing the National Guard as a comparable situation.

As a matter of fact, under the National Defense Act, National Guard officers may, and nearly all of them do, take out Reserve commissions in the same grade which they occupy in the Guard itself. As Reserve officers they are eligible for being ordered to active duty, and while on active duty, of course, they draw the pay of their grade.

I think the chairman of the committee is misinformed as to the number of National Guard officers thus placed from time to time upon active duty. There is a very considerable number of them, because it is the policy of the War Department, within its appropriations, to encourage as many National Guard officers holding Reserve commissions to go on duty for limited periods in order to weld them into the Army of the United States, as contrasted with the old policy which existed before the World War, and so long advocated and insisted upon by the old-fashioned Regular Army of keeping every citizen soldier in the background and refusing to give him a chance.

So National Guard officers, holding Reserve commissions, attend the Army schools. They go to Benning for 3 months, they go to the Signal Corps for 3 months, they go to the Field Artillery school for 3 months at a time, and serve with the General Staff for a year at a time, and while there they draw the pay of their grade.

The policy laid down by the chairman of the committee in charge of this bill, if put into effect, will run absolutely contrary to the policy of the Army. The effort of the War Department is to popularize the Army and bring it closer to the people. The policy proposed by the chairman of the committee is to take the Navy away from the people and not let Naval Reserve officers serve with the Navy in any capacity in time of peace upon an active-duty status. It would be a great pity, and the amendment offered in this particular case will cure one of the grievances, one of the injuries, which from time to time is inflicted upon citizen sailors, as it used to be inflicted upon citizen soldiers by the professional services.

In this bill they are employed in active service, and in the same breath they say they are not worth the price of their grade. These men are sensitive.

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes.

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. Does the gentleman mean to say that there are Reserve officers in the Army serving on permanent active duty?

Mr. WADSWORTH. They are ordered into active duty for various reasons.

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. I mean continuous active duty. We provide in this bill for Naval Reserve officers to be on active duty in the sense the gentleman means.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Why discriminate in regard to the pay?

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. We do not. This is permanent duty.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That makes it worse, if it is permanent duty.

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. I should agree with the gentleman if the duty were of a necessary character. The gentleman is referring to another class of duty than that here in question. If I am not mistaken, the Army has no reserves on permanent continuous duty.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It depends on how you define "permanent." The officers succeed each other.

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. We are talking about two different things altogether.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The principle is the same in respect to pay.

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. It would be if it were necessary active duty in both cases. I am in agreement with what the gentleman has said as regards the class of duty he speaks of. But I am opposed to reserves being put on permanent active duty which can be performed by a regular naval officer at a saving to the Government. In other words, my aim is to do the same as is done in the National Guard.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The gentleman is not succeeding in getting it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and on a division (demanded by Mr. DOBBINS], there were 17 ayes and 42 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 13, line 1, after the comma, strike out the sum "$2,745,509" and insert "$3,038,047."

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, a brief explanation will suffice. The figures I propose will permit the holding of 48 drills per year as compared with 36. If I am correctly informed, the past year the men were allowed to be paid for 24 drills. My plea is to put them on the statutory base, restoring it to 48 drills a year. The reason for that plea is this. It is these 48 drills which keep these men together, and keep their incentive held up during the long months of the year when they come in contact so very, very seldom with the naval authorities themselves. These weekly or nearly weekly drills are the ones which inbue into the men the basic training. I think it is fair to say that a very serious state of affairs arose in both the guard and the Naval Reserve as a result of the paid drills being cut in two, from 48 to 24. The amount involved is very small, compared with the total sums we are dealing in these days, and the money is exceedingly well spent, to my mind. The 48 drills are necessary for the maintenance of the discipline and basic training of these units, and I had hoped the committee would see fit to restore the statutory number of drills for the fiscal year 1935.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I ask recognition in support of the amendment, for many reasons. One reason is that this is the first of the supply bills coming out on national defense, and I take it that as the naval bill goes so will the Army bill go. If we have 48 drills in the Army bill, we want 48 drills in the Navy, because they are going to be treated alike.

Last year this Congress passed a new National Guard Act, which federalized the National Guard, with certain restrictions, which the membership will remember, and made the National Guard a component part of the Army. All of us know that the Regular Army is small enough. Perhaps in this territory of the United States it is just about twice the size of the New York police force. Surely, when we have federalized the guard, we do not want to cripple it to the extent of giving them 36 drills a year instead of 48.

It is well known by all the membership here that the people who come to make up our National Guard and the Reserve of the Navy, for the most part, are men who work in industry, men who work in stores. They are civilians. We ask them to give up 2 weeks of their time every year to go to camp and train for active duty. What encouragement are we going to hold out to them for becoming more proficient in their line of duty unless we give them the proper number of drills throughout the fall, winter, and spring months to put them into good training so that they can make the best out of their summer practice. I appeal to the House at this particular time, because if we put back the 48 drills in the National Guard and the Naval Reserve it will cost the Government only 3½ million dollars for the next year. That surely is little enough to spend on the national-defense item in these strenuous times, with ships and men trained and ready to perform their duty. I ask gentlemen sincerely to support the amendment of the gentleman from New York. The amount is very small in this bill, $292,538. It is little enough to put us on record as to supporting 48 drills in this bill, so that the House can be at least consistent when the War Department appropriation bill comes on the floor to support the 48 drills in that bill.

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, of course, no one is in a position to say what will be done in connection with the War Department bill. All of the services should be treated alike. The President has recommended that they all be treated alike and he has proposed 36 drills. I think we have been very liberal in this matter. We have increased the drills from 24, the number to which the Reserves have been administratively limited to this year, to 36. In this connection let me read a paragraph from our hearings. On page 168 of the hearings, in response to a question I asked, Admiral Bloch, the Navy Budget officer, made this statement:

May I state that it was the decision of the President that the National Guard and the Marine Corps Reserve and the Naval Reserve should have a uniform number of paid drills during the fiscal year 1935. The President himself set the number at 36, so that the 36 paid drills incorporated in the estimate for 1935 are in conformity with his decision that the Army, the Navy, and the Marine Corps have the same number or 36 paid drills.

To increase the number to 48 would mean an increase in expenditure of roundly $3,500,000 for all services.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. GOSS. That is for both the War Department and this bill.

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. GOSS. This bill actually increases $292,538.

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. That is true; I mean for an increased number of drills for the three services. It seems to me we should not go beyond 36 drills at this time. It would occasion an extra expense that ought not to be incurred, and, therefore, I hope that the amendment will not be agreed to.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment. I agree with all that has been said about the efficiency of the National Guard units in the various States. As a matter of fact they are the backbone of our first line of defense in case of emergency. I happen to be quite familiar with the Ohio National Guard, with practically all of its higher officers, and having had the direction of the Ohio State Fair for 6 years, it was my privilege to employ the Ohio National Guard each year to police that fair. We always received more efficient service than we could receive from the local police.

These boys are not alone from the stores and the factories, but many of them are from the farms and from the rural communities. I personally have in my possession a number of letters from the boys in the Ohio National Guard, stating that up until the time of the inauguration of the C.W.A. program, they and their families lived upon the meager drill pay received from the Government.

I happen to know of instances in my home town where families of 4 or 5 or 6 actually weathered the storm through this little drill pay check that came in to these boys. Suppose it does cost a few hundred thousand or a million or so dollars, in these days when we are spending millions and billions of dollars to put people to work and keep them at work, I think every one of my colleagues will agree with me that this money should be appropriated. My colleagues will also agree that if by any circumstance whatsoever the C.W.A. work should be discontinued at this time or in the near future, God only knows what might happen to this country. You are deluged with letters, as I am, from people who are employed on C.W.A. projects. As far as I am concerned, I expect to support any amount that may be asked for by the President of the United States to keep these men at work and give them a chance to have a job instead of a dole. Here is an opportunity to keep men on the pay roll, to give them an income so that they do not have to obtain C.W.A. jobs or do not have to be put on a dole. For one, I heartily concur with the amendment and expect to support it.

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TRUAX. I yield.

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. I understood the gentleman to say he was ready to support the President on any matters of this kind. The gentleman heard what I read a moment ago, that the President himself had determined that 36 drills would be sufficient.

Mr. TRUAX. I would reply to the gentleman by saying that I would vote on this amendment the same as I voted on the Economy Act——

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. In other words, the gentleman will support the President when he feels like it——

Mr. TRUAX. Please allow me to answer in my own way.

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. Certainly.

Mr. TRUAX. I shall vote on this amendment the same as I voted when the Economy Act was before this House. I felt it was an injustice to war veterans. I felt that the President was misinformed on it, and I think since then he has partially rectified the mistake by liberalizing the act to the extent of $21,000,000.

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. I suppose, pursuing the same reasoning, the gentleman assumes the President has been misinformed with reference to these drills?

Mr. TRUAX. I do not presume to say what the President thinks, nor to be his spokesman. I am reciting actual conditions as I know them, and I expect to vote for this amendment for that reason.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. AYRES of Kansas) there were ayes 33 and noes 43.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DOBBINS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DOBBINS: Page 14, line 3, after the word "than", insert the following: "the average between that authorized for their own grades and that".

Mr. DOBBINS. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is in the nature of a compromise between the amendment I formerly offered, which was rejected by the committee, and the position advanced by the chairman of the subcommittee. It is a concession to the opinion of the chairman, in that he feels that Reserve officers should not be detailed to permanent active duty. It is also a concession, and I think a just concession, to the right of those men who are so assigned to be paid something according to their worth. This amendment, if I may explain it to the committee, provides that an officer above the rank of lieutenant, who is so assigned, shall receive half the difference between the lieutenant's pay and the rank which he enjoys. In other words, a captain who is assigned to this work shall receive pay midway between that of a lieutenant and the pay of a captain. Now, it is said that these positions are unnecessary. If they are, the way to get rid of them is to abolish the positions and not to penalize the men who are doing the work in those positions. It is just as logical to say, and I can agree with the principle, that there ought not be any Republicans in this House; but the Almighty, in His wisdom, has sent a few of them here, and while they are here they should be paid.

In other words, when assigned to the work from the Reserve, some of these officers are doing the same work as a captain in the Navy, but they are being paid according to the pay of a lieutenant in the Navy. I do not think they should be penalized, because they wish to perform this service. Every one of us is here because he wishes to perform some service to his Government. They are occupying positions which the machinery of this Government has provided, and they should be paid according to their rank. I have not heard one word of explanation why a captain, with many years to his credit, much more experience to his credit, and more ability to his credit, should be subject to the humiliation of drawing a lieutenant's pay when he is assigned to this work; and I do not expect to hear any. This is a compromise. Perhaps I am not talking in a compromising tone of voice. However, this amendment recognizes the contention that these officers, who, through circumstances not within their control, are occupying positions which somebody thinks ought not exist at all, for that reason alone should not receive as much as others who are occupying similar positions. But the amendment also does make some difference between the pay of a captain and the pay of a lieutenant in those positions. A captain in the Navy and a lieutenant in the Navy are as far apart in rank as a colonel and a captain in the Army.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DOBBINS] has expired.

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, of course I could not accept a compromise of that kind. In the first place, my contention is that we do not need these officers on active duty at all. I have nothing to say against the individuals affected. They may be and probably are very fine gentlemen and thoroughly patriotic, and all that, but we do not need them, and if we allow them to be continued on active duty I think they ought to be well satisfied with a lieutenant's pay. We are not seeking to reduce any man's pay under $4,158. They may draw that maximum rate as Reserve officers on active duty. As I said before, we have a surplus of regular officers who could take their places. We have a surplus of 381. I am just as much opposed to this compromise as I was to the original proposition. I hope the amendment will not prevail.

Mr FADDIS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment.

Under our system of national defense we do not maintain a large standing Army. It is one of our national characteristics that we object to a large standing Army and a large Navy. Therefore we try to make up this lack somewhat by taking into our armed forces the civilian components of the Army. It is quite obvious that in order to maintain these civilian components in any degree of efficiency they must be given something to bring their morale up to the state where it should be. They must not be discouraged or they cannot exist as an efficient organization.

These men for the large part are men who give their vacations to this kind of training. They furnish their own uniforms; and when all is said and done the pay they receive will little more than cover their actual expenses of training and equipment. So it is no more than just, and I think it is no more than proper encouragement to these civilian components, that they receive as liberal treatment as possible.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

ENGINEERING

For repairs, preservation, and renewal of machinery, auxillary machinery, and boilers of naval vessels, yard craft, and ships' boats, distilling and refrigerating apparatus; repairs, preservation, and renewals of electric interior and exterior signal communications and all electrical appliances of whatsoever nature on board naval vessels, except range finders, battle order and range transmitters and indicators, and motors and their controlling apparatus used to operate machinery belonging to other bureaus; searchlights and fire-control equipments for antiaircraft defense at shore stations; maintenance and operation of coast signal service; equipage, supplies, and materials under the cognizance of the Bureau required for the maintenance and operation of naval vessels, yard craft, and ships' boats; purchase, installation, repair, and preservation of machinery, tools, and appliances in navy yards and stations, accident prevention, pay of classified field force under the Bureau; incidental expenses for naval vessels, navy yards, and stations, inspectors' offices, the engineering experiment station, such as photographing, technical books and periodicals, stationery, and instruments; services, instruments, machines and auxiliaries, apparatus, and supplies, and technical books and periodicals necessary to carry on experimental and research work; maintenance and equipment of buildings and grounds at the engineering experiment station, Annapolis, Md.; payment of part time or intermittent employment in the District of Columbia or elsewhere of such scientists and technicists as may be contracted for by the Secretary of the Navy, in his discretion, at a rate of pay not exceeding $20 per diem for any person so employed; in all, $15,564,127: Provided, That the sum to be paid out of this appropriation for employees assigned to group IV (b) and those performing similar services carried under native and alien schedules in the Schedule of Wages for Civil Employees in the Field Service of the Navy Department shall not exceed $1,575,000.

Mr. OSIAS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word and ask unanimous consent to speak out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the Resident Commissioner of the Philippine Islands?

There was no objection.

Mr. OSIAS. Mr. Chairman, the Senate Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs this morning met and deliberated on the problem of independence for the Philippines. A decisive action was taken. It consists of extending the time of the Philippine Independence Act (Public, No. 311, 72d Cong.) to October 17, 1934. This important action and the historic announcement of the distinguished chairman, Senator TYDINGS, constitute a triumph of democracy within the meaning of the highest traditions of the American people. They signify, too, a victory for the Filipino people. They are a recognition of the Filipino people's right to determine their fate and liberty, their independence and destiny.

On January 15, 1934, on the very floor of Congress, I rose, pleading for an extension of time by about 9 months, which will be up to October 17. Having asked for this extension of time, in the absence of a definite proposal from the Quezon Mission, in face of the danger of not having any kind of Philippine independence legislation, I am naturally pleased with the action taken by the Senate committee. I feel that it will be welcome news to the preponderant majority of the Filipino people.

I might add that the decision of the Senate committee is in conformity with the views of over two thirds of the Members of the Seventy-second Congress that approved the Hare-Hawes-Cutting law on January 17, 1933, and with the present temper of the Seventy-third Congress. It also accords with the report of the Ninth Philippine Independence Commission headed by Messrs. Osmeña and Roxas, who unanimously recommended acceptance of the Independence Act or the Hare-Hawes-Cutting law, emphasizing that such action would not jeopardize the rights of the Filipino people subsequently to petition Congress for desired and desirable modifications.

The Senate committee's decision to extend the time of the law by 9 months is a fundamental proposal demanding solidarity of sentiment and unity of action. It is a way out of the present dilemma and a means to achieve the freedom and independence of the Philippines.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to include in my remarks at this point the statement of Senator TYDINGS for the Senate committee on the Hare-Hawes-Cutting Act.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the Resident Commissioner from the Philippine Islands?

There was no objection.

Senator TYDINGS' statement follows:

At the meeting of the Territories and Insular Affairs Committee this morning (January 23), the question of independence for the Philippine Islands was discussed and the following action taken:

1. That there will be no new Philippine legislation in reference to ultimate independence at this session of Congress. However, it was the sense of the committee that the Hawes-Cutting bill would be amended in one particular only and that is to extend the time of the bill which was January 17, 1934, when the Philippine Legislature must move to carry out its provisions to October 17, 1934, and that no other changes in the Hawes-Cutting bill will be considered.

2. Under the Hawes-Cutting bill passed last year the Philippine Legislature was required if it desired independence to take action prior to January 17, 1934. This the legislature refused to do one way or the other and consequently the Philippine people have had no opportunity to accept or reject the Hawes-Cutting bill.

3. As the elections to the Philippine Legislature are to be held this coming June, and as the last legislature did not act on the Hawes-Cutting bill at all, it was the sense of the committee that an extension of time to give the new legislature a chance on it was fair and the only action the committee would take to alter or consider alterations to the general subject matter.

4. Therefore, it is the committee's desire to give the Filipinos one more chance to accept or reject the Hawes-Cutting bill, if after the new elections the legislature again fails to take action or acts adversely upon the provisions of the Hawes-Cutting bill, it will be notice to Congress that the people of the Philippines do not desire independence and desire to continue with their present status.

5. It is the overwhelming opinion of Congress that the Hawes-Cutting bill is the fairest bill to both nations which can be passed and if the Filipino people do not want it, no better bill can be written and passed.

6. It should be recalled that President Roosevelt in his last campaign on two occasions stated he favored the Hawes-Cutting bill and that this statement of the President makes the above observations complete as far as the two branches of Congress dealing with it have to do.

Mr. OSIAS. Senator TYDINGS said the committee's action was final, and that it placed determination of their destiny squarely before the Philippine people.

Congress retains an open mind about modification of the Hawes-Cutting bill at some future period—however, we must first know if the Filipinos want independence. Perhaps in a few years it will be found some of the provisions of the bill are unfair either to the Philippines or to the United States; in that case Congress would have no objection to consider the objections, with a possibility of modifying the measure if it was deemed advisable.

Mr. TYDINGS, in announcing the committee's action, said it emphatically represented his personal views as well.

The Clerk read as follows:

Pay of naval personnel: For pay and allowances prescribed by law of officers on sea duty and other duty, and officers on waiting orders (not to exceed 908 officers of the Medical Corps, 186 officers of the Dental Corps, 556 officers of the Supply Corps, 83 officers of the Chaplain Corps, 233 officers of the Construction Corps, 109 officers of the Civil Engineer Corps, and 1,461 warrant and commissioned warrant officers: Provided, That if the number of warrant and commissioned warrant officers and officers in any staff corps holding commission on July 1, 1934, is in excess of the number herein stipulated, such excess officers may be retained in the Navy until the number is reduced to the limitations imposed by this act), pay, $27,515,049, including not to exceed $1,170,297 (none of which shall be available for increased pay for making aerial flights by more than 8 nonflying officers or observers, to be selected by the Secretary of the Navy) for increased pay for making aerial flights; rental allowance, $5,589,216; subsistence allowance, $3,511,677; in all, $36,615,942; officers on the retired list, $6,003,774; for hire of quarters for officers serving with troops where there are no public quarters belonging to the Government, and where there are not sufficient quarters possessed by the United States to accommodate them, and hire of quarters for officers and enlisted men on sea duty at such times as they may be deprived of their quarters on board ship due to repairs or other conditions which may render them uninhabitable, $3,000; pay of enlisted men on the retired list, $4,631,886; interest on deposits by men, $3,000; pay of petty officers (not to exceed an average of 6,760 chief petty officers, of which number those with a permanent appointment as chief petty officer shall not exceed an average of 5,910), seamen, landsmen, and apprentice seamen, including men in the engineer's force and men detailed for duty with the Fish Commission, enlisted men, men in trade schools, pay of enlisted men of the Hospital Corps, extra pay for men for diving, and cash prizes (not to exceed $75,000) for men for excellence in gunnery, target practice, and engineering competitions, $60,611,606, and, in addition, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed upon request of the Secretary of the Navy, to make transfers during the fiscal year 1935 from the clothing and small stores fund to this appropriation of sums aggregating not to exceed $2,000,000; outfits for all enlisted men and apprentice seamen of the Navy on first enlistment, civilian clothing not to exceed $15 per man to men given discharges for bad conduct or undesirability or inaptitude, reimbursement in kind of clothing to persons in the Navy for losses in cases of marine or aircraft disasters or in the operation of water- or air-borne craft, and the authorized issue of clothing and equipment to the members of the Nurse Corps, $878,194; pay of enlisted men undergoing sentence of court-martial, $57,960, and as many machinists as the President may from time to time deem necessary to appoint; pay and allowances of the Nurse Corps, including assistant superintendents, directors and assistant directors—pay, $402,272; rental allowance, $15,552; subsistence allowance, $14,191; pay retired list, $121,361; in all, $553,376; rent of quarters for members of the Nurse Corps; pay and allowances of transferred and assigned men of the Fleet Naval Reserve, $10,573,590; reimbursement for losses of property as provided in the act approved October 6, 1917 (U.S.C., title 34, secs. 981, 982), as amended by the act of March 3, 1927 (U.S.C., Supp. VI, title 34, sec. 983), $5,000; payment of 6 months' death gratuity, $90,000; in all, $120,027,328, and no part of such sum shall be available to pay active-duty pay and allowances to officers in excess of four on the retired list, except retired officers temporarily ordered to active duty as members of retiring and selection boards as authorized by law: Provided, That during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, no officer of the Navy shall be entitled to receive an addition to his pay in consequence of the provisions of the act approved May 13, 1908 (U.S.C., title 34, sec. 867): Provided further, That no appropriation contained in this act shall be available for the pay, allowances, or other expenses of any enlisted man or civil employee performing service in the residence or quarters of an officer or officers on shore as a cook, waiter, or other work of a character performed by a household servant, but nothing herein shall be construed as preventing the voluntary employment in any such capacity of a retired enlisted man or a transferred member of the Feet Naval Reserve without additional expense to the Government;

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of making an inquiry of the chairman.

Is this the section that carries the limitation on the number of officers and enlisted men of the Navy?

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. That is right.

Mr. GOSS. I recall that last year in the hearings it was developed that some 5,000 marines were assigned to able-bodied seaman duty with the Navy. How many are on such duty now because we do not have enough sailors to man our ships?

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. I do not recall the number, but I do not think any appreciable change has occurred since last year. I have not the figures right at hand, but my recollection is the number is about the same as it was last year.

Mr. GOSS. So that we still have to call upon some 5,000 marines to do able-bodied seamen's duty on our battleships, cruisers, and so on.

We are proceeding with a new program of naval construction, and it will be further extended by the bill reported out by the Naval Affairs Committee. How many officers and men will we be short of meeting that construction program with the language of limitation contained in this section?

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. That all depends upon the policy to be adopted as to the number of ships to be kept in active commission and the extent to which we are willing to raise the present complements. For the present, I do not believe we will be short any men. This bill contemplates that the enlisted personnel will be raised to 82,500. In other words, the appropriation provides for 82,500 enlisted men by the close of the fiscal year.

Mr. GOSS. I would like to call attention particularly to the proviso contained in lines 7 to 12 on page 21:

Provided, That if the number of warrant and commissioned warrant officers and officers in any Staff Corps holding commission on July 1, 1934, is in excess of the number herein stipulated, such excess officers may be retained in the Navy until the number is reduced to the limitations imposed by this act.

Now, it is apparent from the language of the bill that we are imposing certain limitations in this act on the number of personnel, not only of warrant officers and enlisted men, but also of officers. If, as the gentleman says, we have some 5,000 marines doing able-bodied seamen's duty, should not the limitations be removed, or have other limitations been put on the number of officers and sailors necessary to man our warships?

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOSS. I yield.

Mr. TABER. The limitation appearing on pages 20 and 21 is entirely with reference to staff officers, that is officers of the Medical Corps, the Dental Corps, the Supply Corps, and so forth.

Mr. GOSS. This proviso mentions warrant, and commissioned warrant officers, and officers. It is not limited to the staff.

Mr. TABER. Yes; but the limitation in the bill is applicable only to staff officers.

Mr. GOSS. What are we going to do when these new ships are put into commission? I ask the chairman where are we going to find these officers and enlisted men?

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. The construction to which the gentleman refers is all replacement construction. However, we have a surplus of officers at the present time, I may say to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. GOSS. Even with 200 line officers on duty with the C.C.C.?

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. GOSS. And with the two-hundred and odd medical officers on duty with the C.C.C.?

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. Yes; we still have a surplus.

Mr. GOSS. So the gentleman thinks the Navy is overmanned with officer personnel?

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. I do. There is no doubt about it.

Mr. GOSS. How much is it overmanned?

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. I should say several hundred.

Mr. GOSS. But we have 400 with the C.C.C. organizations. The gentleman is not overlooking them, is he?

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. No.

Mr. GOSS. What I am trying to find out is whether we will have a sufficient personnel to man these new ships.

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. We are overly supplied at this particular time. I see no occasion to be alarmed about future requirements. They will be available, I am sure, if and when needed.

Mr. GOSS. What about the enlisted personnel? It seems a crime to have to take enlisted men of the Marine Corps, men especially trained, devil dogs, as they have been called, to do ordinary seamen's duty.

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. As the gentleman well knows, there is nothing unusual about that. Marines aboard ship have always been assigned battle stations.

Mr. GOSS. But they are supposed to be doing Marine Corps duty rather than able-bodied seamen's duty.

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. They have always performed naval duties in addition to their duties as marines.

Mr. GOSS. If we got into a scrap would we have enough men to man our ships?

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. I am sure the gentleman understands that it has never been the policy to maintain full complements in times of peace.

By unanimous consent, the pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

Subsistence of naval personnel: For provisions and commuted rations for enlisted men of the Navy, which commuted rations may be paid to caterers of messes in case of death or deseration, upon orders of the commanding officers, at 50 cents per diem, and midshipmen at 75 cents per diem, and commuted rations stopped on account of sick in hospital and credited at the rate of 66 cents per ration to the naval hospital fund; subsistence of men unavoidably detained or absent from vessels to which attached under orders (during which subsistence rations to be stopped on board ship and no credit for commutation therefor to be given); quarters and subsistence of men on detached duty; subsistence of members of the Naval Reserve during period of active service; subsistence in kind at hospitals and on board ship in lieu of subsistence allowance of female nurses and Navy and Marine Corps general courts-martial prisoners undergoing imprisonment with sentences of dishonorable discharge from the service at the expiration of such confinement; in all, $13,408,072.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of calling the attention of the House to a certain situation. This relates not only to the particular item that has just been read, but also relates to the entire supply features of the bill. This appears on page 200 of the hearings on the bill. This bill was gotten up on the basis of prices back in the fiscal year 1933, as I understand it.

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. I think the gentleman is in error. I think it is based upon prices obtaining in 1932.

Mr. TABER. Nineteen hundred and thirty-three, I said. The gentleman from Connecticut here suggests 1932, but I did not.

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. I say 1932 also; late in 1932.

Mr. TABER. Late in 1932; all right. At the present time if we were to go into the market to buy these supplies, the Department tells us we would have to pay from 20 to 25 percent additional, and if we were to go ahead and operate on the basis of present prices, we would have to have from 13 to 15 million dollars more money. That situation means just this, either prices are going to collapse and go down to where they were a year or a year and a half ago, or else we are going to have to passa deficiency approproation in order to meet this situation. I am not going to offer an amendment to meet this situation, but I think the House and the country should know as we approach consideration of these different items what is in store for them later on.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

AVIATION, NAVY

For aviation, as follows: For navigational, photographic, aerological, radio, and miscellaneous equipment, including repairs thereto, for use with aircraft built or building on June 30, 1934, $672,152; for maintenance, repair, and operation of aircraft factory, air stations, fleet air bases, fleet and all other aviation activities, accident prevention, testing laboratories, for overhauling of planes, and for the purchase for aviation purposes only of special clothing, wearing apparel, and special equipment, $10,066,800, including $120,000 for the equipment of vessels with catapults and including not to exceed $100,000 for the procurement of helium, and such sum shall be transferred to and made available to the Bureau of Mines on July 1, 1934, in addition to which sum the Bureau of Mines may use for helium-plant operation in the fiscal year 1934 the unexpended balance of funds transferred to it for such operation in the fiscal year 1933, and the Bureau may lease, after competition, surplus metal cylinders acquired for use as helium containers; for continuing experiments and development work on all types of aircraft, including the payment of part-time or intermittent employment in the District of Columbia or elsewhere of such scientists and technicists as may be contracted for by the Secretary of the Navy, in his discretion, at a rate of pay not exceeding $20 per diem for any person so employed, $1,773,368; for new construction and procurement of aircraft and equipment, spare parts and accessories, $6,131,000, of which amount not to exceed $2,400,000 shall be available for the payment of obligations incurred under the contract authorization carried in the Navy Appropriation Act for the fiscal year 1934; in all, $18,643,320; and the money herein specifically appropriated for "aviation" shall be disbursed and accounted for in accordance with existing law and shall constitute one fund: Provided, That the sum to be paid out of this appropriation for employees assigned to group IV (b) and those performing similar services carried under native and alien schedules in the Schedule of Wages for Civil Employees in the Field Service of the Navy Department shall not exceed $971,200: Provided further, That in addition to the amount herein appropriated, the Secretary of the Navy may, prior to July 1, 1936, enter into contracts for the production and purchase of new airplanes and their equipment, spare parts, and accessories, to an amount not in excess of $2,800,000: Provided further, That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed, upon the request of the Secretary of the Navy, to transfer not to exceed in the aggregate $24,000 from this appropriation to the appropriations "pay, subsistence, and transportation, Navy", and "pay, Marine Corps" to cover authorized traveling expenses of officers and enlisted men in connection with flying new airplanes from contractor's works to assigned station or ship, including travel to contractor's works and return of personnel to station of duty, and the amount so transferred shall be in addition to any limitations contained in the appropriations "pay, subsistence, and transportation, Navy", and "pay, Marine Corps": Provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for maintenance of more than six heavier-than-air stations on the coast of the continental United States: Provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be used for the construction of a factory for the manufacture of airplanes: Provided further, That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to consider, ascertain, adjust, determine, and pay out of this appropriation the amounts due on claims for damages which have occurred or may occur to private property growing out of the operations of naval aircraft, where such claim does not exceed the sum of $500.

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I offer a committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: On pages 35 and 36, after the comma in line 23, page 35, strike out all of the matter down to the word "and", in line 2, page 36.

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, this clause, which appears in the 1934 appropriation act, was left in the print inadvertently. It is perfectly obvious it will be ineffective as to next year and should be omitted.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. JONES: Page 35, line 22, strike out the words "and such sum" and insert in lieu thereof "which sum of $100,000."

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I will accept the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read down to and including line 13, page 46.

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LANHAM, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill H.R. 7199, the naval appropriation bill, had come to no resolution thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES—MAINTENANCE OF CREDIT OF THE UNITED STATES (H.DOC. NO. 224)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments and ordered printed.

To the Congress of the United States:

Pursuant to the provisions of section 20, title I, of the act entitled "An act to maintain the credit of the United States Government", approved March 20, 1933, I am transmitting herewith certified copies of the following Executive orders, which were approved by me on January 19, 1934:

Executive Order No. 6565 (Veterans' Regulation No. 1 (c)).

Executive Order No. 6566 (Veterans' Regulation No. 6 (b)).

Executive Order No. 6567 (Veterans' Regulation No. 9 (b)).

Executive Order No. 6568 (Veterans' Regulation No. 10 (c)).

Executive Order No. 6565 amends Executive Orders No. 6156, June 6, 1933, and No. 6229, July 28, 1933.

Executive Order No. 6566 amends Executive Order No. 6232, July 28, 1933.

Executive Order No. 6567 amends Executive Order No. 6158, June 6, 1933.

Executive Order No. 6568 amends Executive Orders No. 6098, March 31, 1933, and No. 6234, July 28, 1933.

These veterans' regulations were issued in accordance with the terms of title I, Public, No. 2, Seventy-third Congress "An act to maintain the credit of the United States Government."

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 23, 1934.

FURTHER MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A further message from the Senate, by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate insists upon its amendments to the bill (H.R. 6670) entitled "An act to provide for the establishment of a corporation to aid in the refinancing of farm debts, and for other purposes", disagreed to by the House; agrees to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. FLETCHER, Mr. GLASS, Mr. WAGNER, Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH, and Mr. TOWNSEND to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

APPOINTMENTS

The SPEAKER announced the following appointments:

Pursuant to the provisions of title 34, section 1081, United States Code, the Chair appoints as members of the Board of Visitors to the Naval Academy the following Members of the House: Mr. BULWINKLE, of North Carolina; Mr. BOLAND, of Pennsylvania; Mr. CADY, of Michigan; Mr. FREAR, of Wisconsin; Mr. CARTER, of Wyoming.

Pursuant to the provisions of title 16, section 715a, United States Code, supplement VI, the Chair appoints as members of the Migratory Bird Conservation Commission the following Members of the House: Mr. MCREYNOLDS, of Tennessee; Mr. BOLTON, of Ohio.

Pursuant to the provisions of title 16, section 513, United States Code, the Chair appoints as members of the National Forest Reservation Commission the following Members of the House: Mr. DOXEY, of Mississippi; Mr. WOODRUFF, of Michigan.

Pursuant to the provision of title 24, section 236, United States Code, the Chair appoints as Directors of the Columbia Institute for the Deaf the following Members of the House: Mr. BLOOM, of New York; Mr. FOCHT, of Pennsylvania.

Pursuant to the provision of title 20, section 43, United States Code, the Chair appoints as Regents of the Smithsonian Institution the following Members of the House: Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH, of Maryland; Mr. CRUMP, of Tennessee; Mr. GIFFORD, of Massachusetts.

MEMBERS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I offer a resolution and move its immediate adoption.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 234

Resolved, That CHARLES A. PLUMLEY, of Vermont, be, and he is hereby, elected a member of the Committees on Military Affairs and World War Veterans' Legislation;

That CHARLES D. MILLARD, of New York, be, and he is hereby, elected a member of the Committee on Elections No. 2.

The resolution was agreed to.

FOREIGN MARKET FOR AMERICAN COTTON

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including a letter from Hon. William Murphey, president of the Citizens and Southern National Bank of Savannah, Ga., and an editorial from the Savannah Morning News, with reference to providing foreign markets for the disposition of American cotton.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following:

THE CITIZENS AND SOUTHERN NATIONAL BANK,
Savannah, Ga., January 19, 1934.

Hon. HOMER C. PARKER,
Congressman First District of Georgia,
House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR HOMER: I have been reading in the papers every day of different proposals made to the Congress of the United States concerning the control of cotton production in this country, and I am forced to write this letter to ask if anyone is giving any consideration whatever to the foreign market for our cotton.

Normally the South produces about 15,000,000 bales of cotton annually. The production, buying and selling, financing, and distribution of this cotton give occupation to approximately 2,000,000 farm families, to the railroads, boat and ship lines, gins, compresses, warehouses, port facilities, merchants and bankers, and to several million workers. American mills consume about 6,000,000 bales. The exported balance normally brings between four and six hundred million dollars annually to the South to feed lifeblood into all of its economic enterprises. This is new wealth created and obtained.

If we are to abandon our foreign market for cotton and then solve the surplus problem only by reducing again and again the quantity produced, not only will economic collapse result in the South but several million workers now employed in the South will be turned loose to seek jobs elsewhere in competition with other labor.

I hope that the Members of Congress for the cotton-producing States will get together and insist that instead of ruining our basic crop production and abandoning our outside markets to the other nations of the world that we take steps to broaden our market and bring into the South this new wealth which is so much needed.

Sincerely yours,

WILLIAM MURPHEY.

[From the Savannah Morning News, Jan. 22, 1934]

BUILD FOREIGN COTTON MARKET

Considerable thought to the problem of increasing the foreign market for American cotton has been given by William Murphey, president of the Citizens and Southern National Bank, as evidenced by his recent communication to Senator WALTER F. GEORGE and Congressman HOMER C. PARKER, inquiring whether anyone is giving any consideration whatever to the foreign market for our cotton.

The conclusion drawn from his letter is that, instead of concentrating entirely on crop reduction as a panacea for the surplus-cotton problem, attention should be directed to means of stimulating world demand for cotton. He sees grave danger of economic collapse in the South if we are to abandon our foreign market for cotton, and then solve the surplus problem only by reducing again and again the quantity produced and turning loose several million workers to seek jobs elsewhere in competition with other labor.

Mr. Murphey's reasoning convincingly demonstrates that the problem is being tackled at the wrong end and that, instead of curtailing production, intensive study should be directed to promoting exportation to other countries. If a merchant finds he has too large a stock of goods on hand, he does not start chucking part of it into the furnace, but turns his thoughts to creating a greater demand and increasing the number of his customers. It seems logical that Uncle Sam should pursue a similar policy in connection with his surplus cotton. As pointed out by Mr. Murphey, the South normally produces about 15,000,000 bales of cotton annually. American mills consume about 6,000,000 bales. The exported balance normally brings between four and six hundred million dollars annually to the South. It behooves the South, therefore, to safeguard and broaden its market for cotton, since far less than half of the cotton produced is consumed in our own country.

Glancing back at the statistics at the close of the 1932–33 season on July 31, we find that England was Savannah's best customer during that year, having absorbed 145,830 bales. France took 3,080 bales and the remainder of the European continent divided 98,697 bales, while the Far East's buying of Savannah cotton, which the previous year had been Savannah's best customer, was limited to 17,597 bales.

An encouraging view of the situation was taken in the review of the 1932–33 season by the New York Cotton Exchange, the annual year book of which said: "While the expansion of the supply was being checked by reduced production in the United States, world consumption of cotton recorded a very great increase. The increase occurred entirely in American cotton, since many mills used American cotton in place of foreign growths because of the relative cheapness of the American staple. The total consumption of foreign cottons was a little less than that of the previous season. World consumption of American, together with a small amount destroyed, aggregated 14,435,000 bales, as against 12,568,000 the season before. World consumption of foreign cotton totaled 10,367,000 bales, as against 10,501,000 the season previous. Hence world consumption of all cottons was 24,802,000 bales, as compared with 23,069,000 in the previous season. The consumption of 24,802,000 was highly encouraging, considering the severe trade depression throughout the world and the fact that the normal consumption in pre-depression years was only 25,000,000 bales. In consequence of the reduced production and the increased consumption, the world all-cotton carryover at the close of the 1932–33 season was only 16,247,000 bales as compared with 17,412,000 the year before."

THE HOUSE SURRENDERS THE CONSTITUTIONAL OBLIGATION OF CONGRESS TO CONTROL AND REGULATE MONEY

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, including some editorials, which I quote therein.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Speaker, the House of Representatives, in its hasty, ill-considered deliberation on the far-reaching monetary bill, which passed the House Saturday, brought severe criticism upon itself. This criticism against the House is not only because it passed the bill but the manner in which it passed it. The leadership in control of the House refused to permit the committee in charge of the bill to have any reasonable time to consider the bill. Then, when the bill was brought upon the floor Saturday, the House did not conduct itself as a serious deliberative body. It is such conduct as this which leads the people to lose confidence in representative government.

There was no occasion for the House to conduct itself as it did. The leadership of this House had fair warning that the committee in charge of this bill wanted time to study the contents of the bill and to hear expert witnesses upon the bill.

Let us review the record on that subject. In the proceedings of the House on January 18, Mr. BYRNS, majority leader, undertook to obtain the unanimous consent to start the program to railroad this bill through the House. Mr. SNELL, the minority leader, appealed to him and to the House to give the committee in charge of this bill sufficient time to consider it. Let me quote from the words of Mr. SNELL, on page 880 of the RECORD of January 18:

I may say to the majority leader, considering the importance of the bill and how vitally it affects not only the present generation but several generations to come, it seems to me that the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures has not yet had sufficient time to secure the information that should have been given to the committee and, in my judgment, is absolutely necessary before we pass on such an important measure.

Mr. MCFADDEN, of Pennsylvania, in column 1, page 882, in the RECORD of the 18th, offered the objection which denied unanimous consent. Under the rules of the House, this denial of unanimous consent for the request of the majority leader, Mr. BYRNS, could only stay the matter for 24 hours. Immediately after Mr. MCFADDEN offered this objection, the Rules Committee was called together and began to prepare a rule which could be presented the next day to bring this bill up for immediate consideration. Thereupon the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures went into immediate session. The committee wanted a longer time. The committee instructed the Chairman of the Coinage, Weights, and Measures Committee to appeal to the Rules Committee, at least, to give the Coinage, Weights, and Measures Committee until Monday to consider the bill. The chairman, Mr. SOMERS, made such an appeal to the Rules Committee. It was in vain. The Rules Committee insisted upon bringing the bill up for final consideration Saturday.

The minority members of the Coinage, Weights, and Measures Committee wanted to bring in witnesses whose knowledge of this subject is unquestioned. Among the witnesses who would have been called were Newton D. Baker, a former Democratic Secretary of War; Mr. Houston, a former Democratic Secretary of the Treasury; prominent economists associated with some of the leading universities of America; and outstanding men in American finance. Of this list of witnesses there was not a single one to whom any partisan bias or prejudice against the bill could possibly be credited. We, in the minority, in presenting these names, refrained from calling in any prominent Republicans, who might also be students of finance. We did this because we sincerely wanted light and advice on this bill, and we did not want anyone to be able even to point the finger of partisan suspicion toward any witness who might appear before the committee. We could not have the witnesses because the Democratic leaders in control of the House, thereby in control of the Rules Committee, would not permit us to have sufficient time to deliberate over this bill.

Warning was not only given to the leadership of the House that time should be given for the consideration of this bill from the Republican Members of the House, but a similar warning came from the Democratic press of this country. In this connection, I wish to quote an editorial from the Baltimore Sun of January 20, a Democratic paper which supported Mr. Roosevelt in the campaign and has been and is now one of the outstanding Democratic papers in the country. I quote:

LOOK BEFORE YOU LEAP

One of the most encouraging signs appearing on the legislative horizon since Congress met is the disinclination of a few Members of the House and Senate to be stampeded into immediate acceptance of the President's recommendations for a new monetary policy. If the only question involved were the question of dollar devaluation the case for a thorough scrutiny of the monetary program might not be so impressive. Devaluation, as Roy A. Young, governor of the Boston Federal Reserve Bank, told the Senate committee yesterday, is an accomplished fact in general, although the precise rate remains to be determined. And it would be supererogatory to make too much of a fuss over water that is already over the dam.

But there are a great many other things that are involved in the bill the administration is asking Congress to pass by Tuesday. Some of the sections, as Mr. Young said, commit us permanently to an irredeemable currency. Adoption of those sections would mean not a simple change in the gold value of our currency but a complete reversal of the whole theory upon which our monetary system has been built up. Members of Congress who want to know what it is all about before making a commitment of such tremendous consequence are showing a commendable sense of their legislative responsibilities.

Nor is the reversal of our monetary policy the only issue on which more light is needed before final action on the monetary program. The bill embodying the President's recommendations covers a great variety of things. It proposes to vest in the Secretary of the Treasury alone a perpetual authority over the $2,000,000,000 stabilization fund to be created from the paper profits of dollar devaluation. It proposes to ratify and confirm everything the President and his advisers have done under the Emergency Banking Act and the Thomas inflation amendment to the Farm Relief Act. Congress, as Representative MCGUGIN of Kansas said in the House on Thursday, cannot vote intelligently on these matters without some time for study and examination.

Mr. MCGUGIN might have added to his catalog of questions on which time for study is necessary the proposed reforms in the system of issuing bonds and short-term securities which Secretary Morganthau has asked to have tacked on to the monetary bill. Mr. Morgenthau's request, submitted at the eleventh hour, envisages an authorization for the increase of the short-term debt from $7,500,000,000 to $10,000,000,000. Under the same program the Secretary of the Treasury would also be empowered to offer long-term securities to the banks without advertising for public subscriptions. These are changes of policy potentially far-reaching in their implications.

It may be that the changes can be shown to be desirable. But it is to be remembered that our short-term debt is already unwieldly and that its increase by one third would add materially to the weight of the problem of refinancing that hangs over the Treasury. It is to be remembered further that the banks are already loaded up on Federal securities and that to authorize the Treasury to issue a banking loan of the proportions envisaged in the recent Budget message might create a situation in which one half of the banking resources of the country would be tied up in Government bonds. Congress ought to know whether this is good banking and good public financing before accepting such a proposal.

With the desire of the administration to expedite the consideration of the monetary program it is easy to sympathize up to a certain point. Current monetary uncertainties are interfering with Government financing and with the operations of private business. It is important to end them at the earliest practicable moment. But the need for monetary certainty is not so great as to override all the ordinary precautions of representative government. Congress ought at least to look before it leaps.

In the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 18, on page 881, as a minority member of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, which was considering this bill, I made the following statement in the House and directly to Mr. BYRNS, majority leader:

If the House will give the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures an opportunity to proceed in an orderly manner, as every other committee has had the opportunity to do, it will report this bill promptly. I think the committee should have the opportunity of holding not to exceed 2 days of legitimate hearings. If we cannot have this, of course, we shall have to bring the bill in without any consideration.

In the face of appeals for a reasonable time to consider this bill from both Republican and Democratic members of the committee, and from the minority leader, Mr. SNELL, and from the Democratic press, the Democratic leadership of the House, through its control of the Rules Committee, forced this bill into the House for consideration on Saturday before the committee or the general Membership of the House had had a reasonable opportunity to consider this important and far-reaching legislation. Then, laying the party lash upon an overwhelming majority, the bill was forced through the House on Saturday. Not only did this majority force this bill through the House, trampling under foot every amendment offered, but did so with little or no consideration of the merits or demerits of the amendments. The House not only overrode these amendments without reasonable consideration of the contents of the bill or merits of the amendments, but conducted itself in a manner wholly unbecoming of a legislative body. I call your attention to an editorial comment from this outstanding Democratic paper, the Baltimore Sun. I quote an editorial from the Sun of Monday, January 22, which pertains to the conduct of the House in the consideration of this bill:

THE LEGISLATIVE PROCESS

In passing the gold reserve bill, the House of Representatives acted more like a boss-controlled party convention than a serious legislative assemblage. Here was a measure which proposed not only to devalue the dollar but also to reverse the whole direction of our monetary policy. It was a bill which in the opinion of not a few informed students of banking proposed to nullify the theory of the Federal Reserve Act and to invest a single public official with power to manage in perpetuity a fund of $2,000,000,000 set up for the express purpose of jiggling the money markets.

Yet the House adopted it as a national convention might adopt a platform couched in meaningless platitude. The bill had been rushed through committee without adequate hearings, chiefly because the committee which handled it wanted to get ahead of another committee bursting with ambition to consider it. It came to the floor in such questionable form that the very chairman of the group reporting it announced that after its passage he was "going to call his committee together to study ways to perfect it." The debate on the floor was dull and perfunctory, and was limited to 8 hours on the bill itself, with an additional hour on the gage rule under which the bill was forced to an immediate passage. The only amendment to arouse the slightest interest was a silly proposal by Representative PATMAN prohibiting the use of exported gold to aid the Bank for International Settlements or to assist any foreign institution.

The vote of 359 to 40 by which the bill was adopted at the end of this travesty was the sort of verdict which a mob of superheated delegates might be expected to register on orders from a group of bosses in a smoke-filled room. It was not the sort of thing to be expected from a body of seriously intentioned legislators desirous of directing their action to the ends of national welfare. This is not to say that the bill for which the House fell over itself to vote is undesirable or that, with certain perfecting amendments to which Chairman SOMERS, of the Coinage Committee, may or may not have been referring, it is not adapted to the purposes of the moment.

The point is that neither the committee nor the Members of the House had any opportunity to satisfy themselves on this point. They simply took a leap in the dark of monetary experimentation because the White House cracked the whip. The Members of the House, which is supposed to be the great popular branch of the National Legislature, left the real responsibilities of a popular assemblage up to the Senate. We have heard a great deal in recent months about the delegation of legislative power. The manner in which the House passed the buck to the Senate on a measure as momentous as any to come before a momentous Congress is one of the supreme acts of delegation in our national history.

If we are to go into this monetary experiment with our legislative eyes open, it is now up to the Senate to open them. The Senate Banking Committee has started out very well. It has inaugurated a series of hearings at which the pros and cons of the President's program are being discussed in orderly and measured fashion. Should the committee and the Senate carry on in the same tempo and on the same level, Senators and citizens as well may know more about this thing before its inevitable adoption. To this illumination of a difficult question, neither the administration nor its fondest supporters can reasonably object. If the President's program is as well prepared to stand the test of experience as they say, it ought to be able to stand the test of a few days' debate in a Congress which the administration controls.

If it is fit to challenge the verdict of history, it ought at least to be able to challenge a little legislative illumination.

The bill has been passed by the House. Now, if parliamentary government in America is to retain reasonable public respect, the Congress must depend upon the Senate. In support of this statement I offer an editorial from another great Democratic paper, which was most friendly to Mr. Roosevelt in his campaign and is now friendly to his administration. That paper is the New York Times. Following is the editorial in the New York Times of January 23:

HOW NOT TO LEGISLATE

The full report of the proceedings of the House of Representatives on Saturday, January 20, as printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD presents an extraordinary picture of legislative hurry and confusion. The business was consideration of the President's monetary bill. Of it two different prints were in the hands of Members. They did not agree in either pagination or phraseology. Many sincere efforts were made by Representatives like Mr. WADSWORTH, of New York, Mr. LUCE, of Massachusetts, and Mr. BEEDY, of Maine, to elicit from the Democrats in charge of the measure explanations of some of its ambiguous clauses. All was in vain. The time was too short or knowledge was lacking. When debate was cut off and the bill was about to pass, Mr. BEEDY stated: "I do not think there are 10 Members in this House who can go back to their constituents and intelligently explain the provisions of the bill."

Along the same trend of thought I present an editorial from another newspaper, the Philadelphia Inquirer:

IT IS UP TO THE SENATE

In rushing the administration gold bill to passage late Saturday the House did exactly as it had been expected to do. Debate had been limited to 3 hours, but was extended to more than 7 hours by discussion of amendments. However, in view of the sketchy treatment which the highly important legislation was accorded by House committees, the debate on the floor could hardly be called thorough and exhaustive.

While the House was sweeping the bill through, the Senate Banking and Currency Committee was hearing additional vigorous opposition to the measure from prominent financial advisers. And in the volcanic debate in the House enough opposing views of the Republican minority were aired to bring from Representative BEEDY, Maine Republican, the remark that anyone who could vote for the measure after the proceedings "has an elastic conscience and an india-rubber brain."

While the 360 to 40 vote in the House forecasts an administration victory in the Senate, there should be on the Senate floor a wide and thorough discussion of a proposal which goes beyond the emergency measures of the Roosevelt recovery program and into a permanent financial policy, as yet untried, centralizing tremendous power in the Secretary of the Treasury.

The Nation realizes as well as Congress that the President should have strong support in his emergency measures to rout the forces of depression. But on questions of permanent monetary policy, bearing tremendous possibilities for the country's financial future, there should be a stop, look, consider warning posted in the Senate.

Among the things which the House did in its turbulent conduct was to defeat an amendment which would have made section 10 legislation to meet an emergency instead of permanent legislation. In doing so there was taken away from Congress and placed in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury permanent control over money. The House did this notwithstanding the fact that the Constitution vests in the Congress and the Congress alone the power to control and regulate the value of money. When the House did this it had fair warning of what it was doing. I offered an amendment which would have made this power temporary instead of permanent. Also by this amendment during this temporary period the power would have been vested in a board of five composed of the President, the Sectary of the Treasury, the Governor of the Federal Reserve Board, and two other members to be appointed by the President. I tried as best I could to give the House fair warning as to what it was doing by passing this bill with section 10 as it was in the bill without any amendment. In column 1, page 979, in discussing this subject, I said:

This bill seeks to turn over the full control of the power of money into the hands of one man, the Secretary of the Treasury, not only this Secretary of the Treasury but all Secretaries of the Treasury which may come after him. The framers of the Constitution in their wisdom placed, not in the President of the United States, but in the Congress the power to coin money and regulate the value thereof. When we provide a $2,000,000,000 fund for the Secretary of the Treasury to use to beat up or down American money, to beat up or down the currency of every other country, we have placed in the hands of one man the economic destiny of 126,000,000 American people. In doing so we have betrayed our constitutional obligation to retain in the hands of Congress the power to control money.

The House not only had these statements from me but it also had the following statement from an outstanding authority, the Committee for the Nation, before it on two different occasions, once in column 1, page 968, of the RECORD of January 20, and another time in column 1, page 1004. I quote from the Committee for the Nation:

Regulating the purchasing power of our United States money imposed as a duty by the Constitution upon the Congress is the highest act of sovereignty. Permanent relinquishment of this function by Congress to one Cabinet member is so momentous a step that it should have full discussion before being taken.

However, the House was in no frame of mind to pay any regard to its constitutional obligations. The crowd was in action. The merciless power of organization votes was controlling the proceedings of the day.

The conduct of the House in giving over this control of money to the Secretary of the Treasury and deserting its own constitutional obligations has brought upon it the unanimous criticism of the leaders of all shades of monetary reform. Among those who have insisted that the wrong done by the House must be corrected by the Senate are Frank Vanderlip, Committee for the Nation, Owen D. Young, Walter Lippmann, Rev. Charles Coughlin, Dr. Edwin W. Kemmerer, Dr. H. Parker Willis, and James P. Warburg.

In fact, there seems to be few if any who favor this surrender of Congress of its constitutional obligation except him, whoever he may be, who prepared the original draft of this bill, and the majority Membership which drove it through the House with section 10 in its original form. Even those who drove it through the House do not defend this surrender of Congress of its constitutional obligation over the control of money on any ground of righteousness or wisdom. The defense offered by the majority in the House for its conduct in this matter is party loyalty. Certainly this is a poor excuse for Congress to surrender its constitutional functions. Party loyalty or party cooperation is highly essential and highly desired in an emergency but I submit that it cannot justify congressional betrayal of a constitutional obligation upon Congress.

FEDERAL OLD-AGE COMPENSATION

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include a speech delivered by my colleague from Kentucky [Mr. BROWN].

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address of my colleague from Kentucky [Mr. BROWN]:

I am speaking tonight under the auspices and by the courtesy of the National Old Age Pension Association, headed by Dr. J. E. Pope, who has given much valuable time and service to this worthy cause. It is the purpose of the National Old Age Pension Association to foster legislation which will provide, in a meager way, for those persons past the age of 65, who are unable to take care of themselves, and to care for those between the ages of 40 and 65 who, by reason of physical or mental inability, cannot earn a livelihood.

In the mind of the average business man or woman, the first question asked will undoubtedly be the cost of such pension laws. May I at this time set your minds at east as to any additional cost over and above that now entailed by our present poorhouse system.

The Bureau of Labor statistics has stated that, in the poorhouses of America, the average cost of caring for an inmate is $336 per year. For approximately this same sum, we can give relief to dependent old age from the horror of being compelled to accept degrading shelter in pauper institutions. It is not necessary to argue, in this age of realization of social responsibility, that it would be better to pay a direct pension to the aged than to force them into the humiliation of accepting their livelihood in poorhouses, especially when the cost is not appreciably different.

There may be those who will argue that such laws will put a penalty on thrift and will encourage shiftlessness and lack of foresight by removing the incentive for saving. This argument has no basis of fact, especially in an age of economic maladjustment which has thrown into the breadline approximately one third of the population of this country. We have just emerged from an age of rugged individualism, an age that has accepted no responsibility for the welfare of others but has lauded and cheered those who could carve out fortunes for themselves regardless of the manner or means used in piling up their millions. The heroes of the past have been masters of finance who could reach out into the public income and grab off from the earnings of others multiplied millions for themselves. To such extremes did we go in the direction of rugged individualism that, in the year 1928, we had in this country 43,184 millionaires, and in the same year we witnessed the beginning of the greatest bread line in the history of our country, for in that year we had approximately 3,000,000 unemployed men. The bread line grew until one third of the population of our country was dependent upon charity or the Government for their livelihood. I would not want to belittle wealth or the accumulation of wealth. I am inclined to agree with the old farmer who, hearing many people speak of tainted money, remarked to his wife that "the trouble with tainted money, Martha, is 'taint ours." However, recognizing the property rights of American citizenship and their right to store up this world's goods for themselves, we must recognize another fundamental principle of government, and that is this: That a government's primary obligation is to take care of that portion of its citizenship which is unable by circumstances or surroundings to take care of itself.

I lay this down as a fundamental tenet in every form of successful government, that any government which fails to see to it that the lowliest of its citizenship has at least an opportunity for the minimum benefits of life has failed in its first and last duty as a government. You can trace the history of governments as far back as the human mind has ever recorded, and you will find no exception to this rule in the history of the lives of governments. Indeed, the first government known to the human mind was the family, and it is a poor father who would allow one of his children to starve while he heaped an excess of necessities and luxuries on the others. The next government known was a combination of families, called a tribe, and it was a poor chieftan who would allow a portion of his tribe to starve; and if he allowed this condition to exist, it did not take the tribe long to depose him. When tribes became multiplied into cities and nations, the law did not change. Whenever a government failed to take care of the minimum needs and wants of its citizenship, the government ceased to exist. What reason is there for paying tribute in taxes or in loyalty to a government which recognizes no responsibility to its citizenship in distress? Multiply the families and tribes of the past until they become 48 great States, headed by a Government at Washington, D.C., and you have not repealed the primal law that government must take care of such portions of its citizenship as are unable by circumstances or surroundings to take care of themselves.

We are emerging now from that age of rugged individualism and embarking upon an era of social responsibility and cooperation. This Nation has suffered through 12 years of governmental supervision which ignored the rights of the weak and heaped benefits into the arms of the strong. We have reached the anomalous position of a nation that has a surplus of everything imaginable and yet finds a third of its population thrown out into the cold and into the bread line by the inequalities of its economic system. We see the wisdom of Shakespeare's statement when he said, "They are as sick who surfeit with too much as they who starve with nothing." With the ability to produce in superabundance in every line of industry and in every trade or profession, we find from 12 to 15 million people in this country out of employment and most of them through no fault of their own. Thrifty people, who have spent a lifetime at their job, find themselves in the bread line and facing a bleak old age with no provision possible through their own efforts to support themselves. This is partially the result of maldistribution in our economic system and partially the result of the elimination of jobs through machine improvements. Over 900,000 positions have been eliminated in manufacturing establishments; 350,000 in railroad transportation service; and over 800,000 in agriculture, and yet, with this decreased labor force, every branch of industry and agriculture produces more than before the elimination of these workers.

Within the last 10 years, many thousand banks have failed; fortunes have been swept away on the tide of the depression on every hand, and those who now are on the verge of 60 find themselves dependents through forces over which they had no control. With more of everything than all the people can use, we still have those among our citizenship who argue that the Government owes no responsibility to see to it that the unemployed man has a job, that the sick have medical aid, that those in tender youth are protected from the greed of industry which would blight their youth, that the aged are taken from the poorhouses and the bread lines, and that, generally, we accept the social responsibility of citizenship in the sense of a community of interests where greed will not be allowed to run riot and leave in its wake as wreckage a great portion of the citizenship of our country.

The President of the United States has led the way for a school of political thought which recognizes, as a social responsibility of government, the duty to help solve these problems which now confront our Nation. He has said that the gain that this Nation will make will be made in the name of 120,000,000 people, and he did not leave out of consideration in this gain which he hoped for America a solitary portion of our citizenship. His program has taken care of the unemployed; it has offered relief to the needy; it has given a spur to industry; it has pumped life into the veins of agriculture; it has fostered labor as no administration in the history of our Nation; and I am sure that in that program there must be some place for the furrowed faces and limp hands of those who have toiled almost threescore year and ten and find themselves now, by the shortsightedness of the economic system of which we are a part, left as wreckage of a machine age, to beg on the streets or live out the few remaining years of their lives in the squalid conditions usually existing in our poorhouses. It is said that education is the debt that the present owes to the future, and certainly it may truly be said that old-age pensions constitute the debt that the present owes to the past. Old-age pensions constitute the debt that the present generations owe now and always will owe to those persons now living who have contributed to the building of this country; and the way we can best pay that debt to the builders of America is to care for them when they no longer can care for themselves.

Through our workmen's compensation laws in the various States, we recognize that each separate portion of the human body has a definite value. We say by law that when industry causes a workman to lose his hand such industry must pay a definite sum for this loss. We say that an eye is worth a definite amount, that a foot and each toe thereon has a definite separate value. It is not logical and sensible that, if we recognize the value of each separate portion of the human body, we should also recognize that when industry has used up all the energy and all the ability of the human frame and casts out the useless hull, some provision should be made to take care of the used-up human body? In other words, if each separate portion of the human body has a value set by law, should not the whole human body, when exhausted and completely demolished insofar as service and ability to work are concerned, have some definite value placed thereon, and should not some provision be made for its care when it no longer can provide for itself?

Old-age pensions are not alone sponsored and favored by those who hope personally to profit, but they have been actively supported, first, by Franklin D. Roosevelt when, as Governor of New York, he signed the State's first old-age pension law, and even now the First Lady of the land is one of the foremost advocates of an old-age pension law for the District of Columbia. Gov. James M. Cox, of Ohio; Governor Lehman, of New York; Arthur Brisbane, the famous editorial writer; and many other prominent individuals, who will not need support through this means, are fostering this legislation as a necessary step in a social program which recognizes the responsibility on the strong to provide minimum necessities for the unfortunate who can make no provision for themselves.

This is not a radical or socialistic departure from past practices of government. Indeed, Kaiser Wilhelm had old-age pension laws for Germany, and no one would accuse the Kaiser of being unduly socialistic. Forty-one foreign nations have old-age protection, in one form or another, on a national basis. In this country, we have left the matter of old-age pensions to the States, which is a very unsatisfactory way of handling a social need. Twenty-six States of the Union have old-age pension laws, but in practically all of these States, the requisites of citizenship are from 10 to 15 years' residence, and in a land of shifting population this leaves a great portion of our old people unable to qualify for State relief. It is no more expensive to collect the money on a national basis and thus relieve the States of the expense of operating separate organizations for dispensing such relief. If you ask me where we shall get the money, of course, there is provision made under the plan of the National Old Age Pension Association for a small portion of the incomes of those who earn to go to this fund to take care of it, but the answer always to all calls for social relief can be made in this manner, that wherever social needs exist, money should be collected where the money is and spent where the need exists. This is a safe principle in schools and in any other form of governmental aid to its various branches of citizenship.

May I summarize my remarks by saying that old-age pensions cost less in dollars and cents than poorhouses; that a government owes a duty to every portion of its citizenship which is unable to take care of itself, regardless of the cause of the inability; that in one way or another we shall pay this debt; that as a portion of our great program of social reform and cooperative effort in advancing the interests of our Nation as a whole, we cannot forget those who toil and labor as long as energy is left, and who find themselves without a sufficient portion of this world's goods to tide them over the span between the age of 65 and the grave. This is a responsibility which no unselfish man or woman would fail to recognize. We are meeting our obligations to other portions of our citizenship who by misfortune have been deprived of those things which contribute to the fullness of life, and, as a part of the program of the "new deal" with its motive to make life fuller for America's citizenship, is it not entirely proper that we should add a certainty of contentedness and security to the declining years of life by saying to the aged of America that "when your hands can no longer work and your mind is clouded with age, we who have grasped the torch which you have carried will see to it that you are provided in an honorable way with at least the necessities of life"?

SENATE

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 24, 1934

(Legislative day of Tuesday, Jan. 23, 1934)

The Senate met in executive session at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. FLETCHER, from the Committee on Banking and Currency, reported favorably the nomination of George M. Brennan, of Illinois, to be Intermediate Credit Commissioner in the Farm Credit Administration, which was ordered to be placed on the calendar.

Mr. HARRISON, from the Committee on Finance, reported favorably the nomination of Stephen M. Driscoll, of St. Albans, Vt., to be collector of customs for customs collection district no. 2, with headquarters at St. Albans, Vt., in place of Fred B. Thomas, which was ordered to be placed on the calendar.

Mr. ASHURST, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported favorably the nomination of Clinton R. Barry, of Arkansas, to be United States attorney, western district of Arkansas, to succeed William N. Ivie, whose term expired January 20, 1934, which was ordered to be placed on the calendar.

LEGISLATIVE SESSION

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of legislative business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed legislative session.

DISPOSITION OF USELESS PAPERS IN GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Public Printer, transmitting, pursuant to law, a list of papers on the files of the United States Government Printing Office that are not needed in the conduct of business and have no permanent value or historical interest, and also calling attention to a letter from the Public Printer of February 25, 1933, on the same subject, and asking for action looking toward the disposition of such useless papers, which was referred to a Joint Select Committee on the Disposition of Useless Papers.

The VICE PRESIDENT appointed Mr. HAYDEN and Mr. VANDENBERG the committee on the part of the Senate.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a telegram in the nature of a petition from Bernard Cash, commander Spanish War Veterans, Department of Utah, praying for the restoration of pension laws in force before the passage of the so-called "Economy Act", which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also laid before the Senate petitions of sundry citizens of the State of California, praying for the passage of legislation to restore to all veterans who were actually disabled in the military or naval service the benefits, rights, privileges, ratings, schedules, compensation, presumptions, and pensions enjoyed by them prior to the enactment of the so-called "Economy Act", which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also laid before the Senate the petition of E. B. and F. E. Willis, of Erie, Pa., favoring the passage of legislation remonetizing silver and improving the monetary system, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution of Local Union No. 8, United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners, of Philadelphia, Pa., favoring the passage of the bill (H.R. 6976) to protect the currency system of the United States, to provide for the better use of the monetary gold stock of the United States, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CAPPER presented a petition numerously signed by sundry citizens of Arkansas City, Wichita, the Veterans' Administration Home, Garden City, and Dodge City, all in the State of Kansas, praying for the abolition of the pay cut affecting Federal employees under the provisions of the so-called "Economy Act", which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas presented the following resolution of the Senate of the State of Arkansas, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations:

Senate Resolution 4 (introduced by Senator Norfleet)

Whereas there now exists a staggering indebtedness in the State of Arkansas, incurred for educational purposes of various characters, outstanding in secured and open-account form, outstanding against property of affected school districts, and taxpayers therein are required to pay same, causing an enormous drain of taxes and revenues; and

Whereas our Federal Government was organized along the lines of a free people and with the guaranty of those things dear to the hearts of freemen and necessary in the enjoyment of the privileges so extended, amongst which is the acquisition of an education provided by the State, and burdensome taxation now exists by reason thereof which, when coupled with other contemporary taxation derived from the public purse of the citizenship of the State, constitutes a measure of payment unbearable to all affected: Therefore be it hereby

Resolved by the senate in special session duly assembled in January 1934, That the Federal Government be hereby memorialized as a part of its $16,000,000,000 program of public relief to assist the State program of education as to assisting payment of said indebtedness, so that posterity may be thus served while relieving the present distress occasioned by the burdensome indebtedness existing for educational purposes of the affected children of the State; and that a copy of this resolution be forwarded by the secretary of this senate to each Arkansas Representative and Senator in the National Congress.

Mr. CAREY presented a joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Colorado, favoring the creation and establishment of an additional Federal land-bank district comprising the States of New Mexico, Colorado, and Wyoming, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

(See joint memorial printed in full when presented by Mr. ADAMS on the 23d instant, p. 1128, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.)

Mr. CAREY also presented the following joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Wyoming, which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs:

THE STATE OF WYOMING,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
State of Wyoming, ss:

I, A. M. Clark, secretary of state of the State of Wyoming, do hereby certify that the annexed is a full, true, and correct copy of Enrolled Joint Memorial No. 2, senate, of the special session of the Twenty-second Legislature of the State of Wyoming, being original Senate Joint Memorial No. 2, approved by the Governor on December 27, 1933, at 3:36 p.m. In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the great seal of the State of Wyoming.

Enrolled Joint Memorial 2, memorializing Congress to enact legislation transferring certain oil lands in Natrona County, Wyo., from the jurisdiction of the Navy Department to the jurisdiction of the Department of the Interior

Whereas on April 30, 1915, by Presidential Executive order of that date certain lands in Natrona County, Wyo., were withdrawn from entry and by departmental letter "N" of May 8, 1915, naval petroleum reserve no. 3 was created therefrom embracing approximately 9,440 acres; and

Whereas by the act of June 4, 1920, volume 41, chapter 228, pages 812–813, the Secretary of the Navy was directed to take possession of all properties within the naval petroleum reserves as are or may become subject to control and use by the United States for naval purposes under the provisions of an act of Congress approved February 25, 1920 (85 Stat.L. 437), entitled "An act to provide for the mining of coal, phosphates, oil, oil shale, gas, and sodium on the public domain", and to serve, develop, use, and operate the same in his discretion directly or by contract or otherwise; and by the act of February 25, 1928 (vol. 45, ch. 104, p. 148), jurisdiction over and the administration and enforcement of all oil and gas leases on lands in naval petroleum reserves issued pursuant to the provisions of sections 18 and 18A of the act of February 25, 1920, commonly known as the "General Leasing Act", were transferred to the Secretary of the Navy; and

Whereas section 35 of the said General Leasing Act provides that 37½ percent of all amounts derived by the Federal Government from bonuses, royalties, and rentals on leased oil or gas land or deposits within the public domain shall be paid at stated intervals by the Secretary of the Treasury to the State within the boundaries of which such leased lands or deposits are located for the use by said State or the subdivisions thereof for the construction and maintenance of public roads or for the support of public schools or other public educational institutions, and that 52½ percent of the amount derived from such bonuses, royalties, and rentals shall be paid into, reserved, and appropriated as a part of the reclamation fund created by the act of Congress known as the "Reclamation Act", approved June 17, 1902; and

Whereas, subject to section 35 of the General Leasing Act, all moneys accruing to the Federal Government from bonuses, royalties, and rentals from naval petroleum reserve land shall be deposited in the United States Treasury as miscellaneous receipts; and

Whereas neither the State of Wyoming nor the said reclamation fund receives any benefit from or part of the amount derived by the Federal Government from bonuses, royalties, or rentals on said lands within said naval petroleum reserve no 3; and

Whereas, by the enactment of the said acts of June 4, 1920, and February 25, 1928, the Navy Department of the United States is empowered to enter into the business of producing petroleum and its products from the said naval petroleum reserves; and if such operations shall be engaged in by the Navy Department, one of the results thereof will be to deprive the State of Wyoming annually of tax revenues, and this although the quality of the petroleum producible from said lands in naval petroleum reserve no. 3 is such that neither the petroleum nor the gas produced from these lands can be used by the Navy except for purposes of exchange or sale; and

Whereas naval petroleum reserve no. 3 is approximately 1,000 miles distant by air line from the western seaboard and approximately 2,000 miles by air line to the eastern seaboard, rendering it impractical for the Navy to use this petroleum as a dependable fuel supply in time of war: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of the Twenty-second Legislature of the State of Wyoming in special session assembled (the house of representatives concurring), That the Congress of the United States be, and it is hereby, petitioned and memorialized to enact legislation restoring the public lands within the external boundaries of naval petroleum reserve no. 3 to the public domain of the United States and transferring the jurisdiction over and the administration thereof, and of all leases thereof, to the Secretary of the Interior and revoking and repealing any and all Executive orders and acts of Congress creating or confirming the creation of said naval petroleum reserve no. 3; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this memorial be transmitted to the President of the United States, to the Secretary of the Navy, to the Secretary of the Interior, to the United States Bureau of Reclamation, and to each of the Members of the Wyoming delegation in Congress.

OSCAR BECK,
President of the Senate.
WM. M. JACK,
Speaker of the House.

Approved 3:36 p.m. December 27, 1933.

LESLIE A. MILLER, Governor.

Mr. CAREY also presented the following joint resolution and joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Wyoming, which were referred to the Committee on Finance:

THE STATE OF WYOMING,

Senate joint resolution memorializing Congress to provide relief for the oil industry, the farmers, the unemployed, business, and the people generally by providing an adequate tariff or tax on oil that will place the domestic-oil industry on a competitive basis with imported oil as shown by the reports of the Tariff Commission

Whereas business generally, not only in Wyoming but throughout all the oil-producing States, affecting over 22,000,000 people, has been directly depressed by the long-distressed condition of the oil industry, and which depressed condition has now become very serious; and

Whereas excessive importations of foreign oils continue to flow into our country, constantly increasing in volume until the flood has reached alarming proportions; and

Whereas in the year 1932, in Wyoming alone, the total production of crude oil was over $11,800,000 less than for the year 1929, which tremendous loss would have been saved had there been a tax or a tariff of $1.03 per barrel on crude oil, thereby placing domestic oil on a competitive basis with importations as shown by the latest report of the Tariff Commission; and

Whereas the rentals and annual royalty income have been reduced millions of dollars yearly, which increasing loss continues to add to already unbearable burdens; and

Whereas the schools of Wyoming have suffered severely in the loss of nearly $125,000 in gross oil royalty receipts in the single year of 1932, compared with the gross royalties received in 1929; and

Whereas not only have our royalty owners and the schools sustained severe losses, but also banking, transportation, manufacturing, industry, utility, and every type and character of business have been adversely affected by the distressed condition of the oil industry and by the great loss in purchasing power due to the taking of our domestic markets by the importation of cheap foreign oil; and

Whereas the general unemployment situation has been very greatly aggravated by the thousands of oil-field workers, geologists, land men, lease men, scouts, and office employees forced out of employment, and by the thousands now unemployed, but formerly employed by businesses dependent on the oil industry, the third largest industry in the Nation: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of the State of Wyoming (the house of representatives concurring therein), That the Congress of the United States be, and it is hereby, memorialized to give relief to the distressed oil industry, and thereby to the Nation generally, by immediately levying an adequate tax or tariff upon imported petroleum and its refined products that will enable our domestic-oil industry to meet importations of foreign oil and its refined products on a competitive basis as shown by the report of the Tariff Commission; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be transmitted to the President of the United States, and to the President of the Senate and to the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States, and to each of the United States Senators and Congressman representing the State of Wyoming.

President of the Senate.

Enrolled Joint Memorial 3, memorializing the United States Veterans' Administration and the Hospitalization Committee to provide facilities for the care and treatment of Wyoming veterans and others in need of hospitalization by the opening of the Veterans' Administration facility at Cheyenne, Wyo.

Whereas the Federal Government has expended $1,250,000 in the construction, erection, and furnishing of a Veterans' Administration facility for the care and treatment of the veterans of the State of Wyoming and adjacent territory; and

Whereas such institution is now completed, equipped, and ready for occupancy, and is equipped to accommodate 106 bed patients; and

Whereas large numbers of veterans in each county in the State are in need of hospital care and treatment, the exact number of which cannot be estimated at this time, as such veterans are required to apply directly to other Government hospitals for treatment, and are obliged to travel great distances to receive the same, and in many instances are obliged to wait for indefinite periods of time before accommodations are available therefor: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of the Twenty-second Legislature of the State of Wyoming in special session assembled (the house of representatives concurring). That the United States Veterans' Administration and the Veterans' Hospitalization Committee be, and they are hereby petitioned and memorialized to open the hospital situated at Cheyenne, Wyo., at the earliest possible date, so as to provide facilities for the care and treatment of the veterans of this State and surrounding territory who are in need of such hospitalization and entitled to such treatment under existing laws; be it further Resolved, That certified copies of this memorial be forwarded to the Honorable Frank T. Hines, Director of the United States Veterans' Administration and Chairman of the Veterans' Hospitalization Committee, in Washington, D.C., and to the Wyoming delegation in Congress.

FOUR-POINT PROGRAM OF AMERICAN LEGION

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I present for notation in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and appropriate reference petitions endorsing the American Legion's so-called "four-point program" regarding veterans' legislation.

My petitions are from the New Bedford Post of the Disabled American Veterans of the World War; the Adams (Mass.) Post, No. 160, American Legion Auxiliary; and the following American Legion posts, all in the State of Massachusetts: Adams Post, No. 160; Bunker Hill Post, No. 26, Charlestown; Charles C. Kennedy Post, No. 275, Chicopee Falls; Ipswich Post, No. 80; Lynn Post, No. 6; Lynnfield Center Post, No. 131; Herbert F. Akroyd Post, No. 132, Marlborough; North Attleboro Post, No. 49; Alberton W. Vinal Post, No. 313, North Chalmsford; Orleans Post, No. 308; Plymouth Post, No. 40; Reading Post, No. 62; Springfield Post, No. 21; Tenth District Council, Massachusetts, Rockland; Worcester County Council, Uxbridge; Charles H. Alward Post, No. 133, Wayland; Wellesley Post, No. 72, Wellesley; and West Springfield Post, No. 207.

In addition, I have received a number of letters from veterans themselves endorsing the program. I ask that one of the letters and a telegram may be incorporated in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the petitions will be received and referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and permission is granted to print the matter referred to in the RECORD.

The telegram and letter were referred to the Committee on Appropriations and are as follows:

[Telegram]

BOSTON, MASS., January 22, 1934.

Senator DAVID I. WALSH,
Washington, D.C.:
Please give the Legion four-point program your earnest support.
JOHN B. WARREN.

sum equal to 6 months' compensation at the rate he was receiving by law at the time of his death, said sum to be considered inclusive of funeral expenses and all other allowances.

DISCRIMINATION AGAINST MINORITY GROUPS IN GERMANY

Mr. TYDINGS submitted the following resolution (S.Res. 154), which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

Whereas the present Government of the German Reich has deprived certain groups of its citizens of many of their civil and political rights and has imposed upon them restrictions, pains, and penalties harsh and severe in nature; and

Whereas among the groups so discriminated against by said Government are approximately 600,000 Jewish citizens of the Reich and the great number of Christians of partly or wholly Jewish descent; and

Whereas it is manifest that, as regards the Jewish citizens of the Reich and such Christians of Jewish descent, the actual causes for the discriminations against them are their religious beliefs or professions and their racial origin, neither of which is a ground reasonably affecting their rights and privileges as citizens of a modern State; and

GREAT LAKES-ST. LAWRENCE DEEP WATERWAY TREATY—EDITORIAL FROM THE GAELIC AMERICAN

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD and to lie on the table an editorial appearing in the Gaelic American for January 20, 1934, entitled "Defeat St. Lawrence Seaway Treaty."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEFEAT ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY TREATY

The St. Lawrence Seaway Treaty, in spite of President Roosevelt's deserved popularity, will probably not be ratified by the United States Senate. The waterway project is, to a certain extent, in the line of progress, but it must be considered that it will be controlled by Canada where the St. Lawrence empties itself into the sea. At any moment, if any crisis should arise between the two countries, the canal could be closed to American shipping.

Under these circumstances it is no wonder that American statesmen are unwilling to expend a fabulous sum of money on a project which cannot be controlled by Uncle Sam. Besides diverting traffic from our Atlantic ports, the proposed waterway would internationalize Lake Michigan, which is wholly in United States territory.

Undoubtedly the proposed canal would boost Montreal and other Canadian cities at the expense of New York, Boston, and other Atlantic ports. New York would be the heaviest loser as the traffic of the Midwestern States would be diverted via Canada. The project would only benefit Canada primarily, and it is doubtful if it would, to any great extent, be advantageous to the farming communities of the Midwestern States. Any project that is bound to divert traffic from New York, Boston, Philadelphia, and many other Atlantic ports, is of very doubtful benefit to the American people.

If the United States and Canada were under one government, the St. Lawrence Canal would not be so objectionable. Until such time as Canada becomes an integral part of the United States the St. Lawrence waterway scheme should be postponed. There seems no sense in giving a political and trade rival advantages which exclusively belong to the United States. Undoubtedly a St. Lawrence waterway would injure many American vital interests and take away from the importance of the great city of New York. No national government should be a party to an arrangement which would enrich Canada at the expense of the United States. There are alternate routes from the Middle West to the sea, and they should be utilized in preference to a foreign-controlled canal. The route also hits railway traffic, and when it is considered that the railways are practically the blood arteries of the country, nothing should be done at the expense of the taxpayers to reduce them to a haphazard existence. When it is considered that the railways absorb tens of thousands of employees and that widows, orphans, and charitable institutions are dependent on the dividends from railway investments, nothing should be done to decrease the earning capacity of this great American institution.

The St. Lawrence Canal scheme should not be made a party question. Senators, regardless of party, should vote on the project from national, not party motives. It must not be forgotten in this connection that foreign trade is decreasing and that it is bound to decrease still further in the near future. Foreign countries, that once got large supplies of food and raw material from the United States, are now producing food enough to supply their own wants. Canada has practically a monopoly of the English market in grain and other foodstuffs. For the future the countries of the world will be more self-contained and will turn more to the cultivation of the soil and the rearing of cattle, sheep, and pigs. Exports, except certain manufactured articles, are bound to decrease more and more every year. Should the St. Lawrence Canal be dug there is more than a probability that it would turn out to be a white elephant.

The United States Senate in the past killed many treaties, which were regarded as alliances with foreign countries. Such a treaty was the League of Nations, sponsored by Woodrow Wilson, who had a strong leaning toward internationalism. The present Senate may add to its prestige by refusing to ratify a treaty which involves a fabulous sum of money which could be expended to better advantage in some all-American enterprise. The St. Lawrence Seaway Treaty is a good treaty to reject.

THE N.R.A. AND PUBLIC UTILITIES

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article appearing in today's edition of the Washington Herald, entitled "Utilities Use N.R.A. Club Over Public Plants."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Herald, Jan. 24, 1934]

UTILITIES USE N.R.A. CLUB OVER PUBLIC PLANTS—POPULAR GOVERNMENT LEAGUE SCORES INCLUSION OF CIVIC UNITS UNDER PROPOSED CODE

The Power Trust was charged yesterday with fomenting, under cover of an N.R.A. blue-eagle banner, a war of extermination against publicly owned electric plants.

The National Popular Government League, which made the charge in a bulletin to its membership, denounced the plan of N.R.A. and the Trust to make the public plants voluntary subscribers to the pending power-industry code.

WOULD END YARDSTICK

Inclusion of these plants would put them at the mercy of power-trust forces which are persistently debauching city elections on the public ownership of utilities issue, the league charged.

It would thus smash the yardsticks President Roosevelt is setting up to measure and regulate electric rates.

Reform claims of the trust, whose agents would have 9 memberships on the code-enforcement authority out of a total of 12, were ridiculed by the league. Its bulletin said:

"The National Electric Light Association changed its clothes and forgot to take a bath.

"We have reason to believe that if given the powers asked for in this code the utility executives would continue their warfare against public plants clothed with the sanction and authority of the United States Government.

"VOTES INFLUENCED

"Practically every municipal election for a public power plant over the Nation in 1933 has been debauched by the power companies exactly as under the National Electric Light Association."

Secretary of Interior Ickes, the Federal Power Commission, and some Senators are fighting the code as projected. Another opponent of the plan for inclusion of public plants likened it to "asking a lamb to join an organization of 10 wolves."

UNITED STATES MONETARY SYSTEM

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 6976.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H.R. 6976) to protect the currency system of the United States, to provide for a better use of the monetary gold stock of the United States, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Banking and Currency with amendments.

Mr. LEWIS. I suggest the absence of a quorum and ask for a roll call.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Bailey	Black	Bulkley
Ashurst	Bankhead	Bone	Bulow
Austin	Barbour	Borah	Byrd
Bachman	Barkley	Brown	Byrnes

Capper	Gibson	McAdoo	Schall
Caraway	Glass	McCarran	Sheppard
Carey	Goldsborough	McGill	Shipstead
Clark	Gore	McKellar	Smith
Connally	Hale	McNary	Steiwer
Coolidge	Harrison	Murphy	Stephens
Costigan	Hastings	Neely	Thomas, Utah
Couzens	Hatch	Norris	Thompson
Cutting	Hatfield	Nye	Townsend
Davis	Hayden	O'Mahoney	Trammell
Dickinson	Hebert	Overton	Tydings
Dieterich	Johnson	Patterson	Vandenberg
Dill	Kean	Pittman	Van Nuys
Duffy	Keyes	Pope	Walcott
Erickson	King	Reed	Walsh
Fess	La Follette	Reynolds	Wheeler
Fletcher	Lewis	Robinson, Ark.	White
Frazier	Logan	Robinson, Ind.
George	Lonergan	Russell

Mr. HEBERT. I desire to announce that my colleague the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF] and the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK] are necessarily absent from the Senate. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. LEWIS. I announce the absence of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS] because of illness. I desire also to announce that the senior Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND], the junior Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER], and the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] are necessarily detained from the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Ninety Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Florida a question?

Mr. FLETCHER. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator propose to go forward with the bill today?

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes; it is now before the Senate——

Mr. BORAH. I know it is now before the Senate.

Mr. FLETCHER. And I should like to go right on with it, if we can.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the hearings upon this bill came to the Members of the Senate late yesterday afternoon, and this morning is the first opportunity I have had to familiarize myself with the hearings. I shall not interpose an objection, but I will ask the Senator to consider the fact that we have had no opportunity whatever to consider this bill as it is now amended, and we have had no opportunity to read the hearings. If the members of the committee desire to go forward for a day or two with the bill while other Senators can familiarize themselves with it, possibly we can get along.

Mr. FLETCHER. The hearings were printed from day to day so far as we could have them printed. The bill has been under consideration in the Senate Banking and Currency Committee for over a week, and the hearings have been available day after day, but, of course, they were not completed until the last day, and were not all printed and available until late yesterday. I think we can refer to the hearings as we go along in the debate, and I think we can get along very well under conditions as they are.

Mr. BORAH. If it is the Senator's purpose to go ahead, very well.

Mr. FLETCHER. The bill, I know, proposes very important legislation, and we want to consider it thoroughly, but it is highly desirable to speed it as much as we can.

Mr. BORAH. May I ask is there a report accompanying the bill?

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes; the report accompanying the bill is on the desks of Senators.

Mr. President, I will state that the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency have had the bill under consideration and we have been holding constant hearings on it for more than a week. Those hearings are now available in printed form. Of course they have not been printed very long, because we have just concluded the hearings.

This is a very important measure and it is desirable that it be acted upon as soon as the Senate can reasonably do so. I do not mean to cut anybody off from any discussion or from offering any amendments in any way, but it is important in the public interest that we proceed with the consideration of the bill. The committee adopted certain amendments to the bill, which appear in the printed form now on the desks of Senators. Those amendments we will take up as we come to them.

Mr. President, at this juncture I ask unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill may be dispensed with, that the bill be read for amendment, and that committee amendments be first considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LOGAN in the chair). Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Florida? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. FLETCHER. The substantial amendments are indicated in the printed copy of the bill. The first amendment is found on page 2, beginning in line 15. The House provision refers to section 16 of the Federal Reserve Act, and proposes to amend it by striking out, for instance, the word "gold" where it appears in the last sentence in the first paragraph of said section and inserting in lieu thereof the words "lawful money." Then it proceeds to change some 8 or 9 or 10 paragraphs in the Federal Reserve Act in the same manner. The Senate committee, in its amendments, proposes to insert in lieu of that provision the amendment appearing on page 3, beginning in line 18, which simply expands this provision and makes clear and plain just what we are doing. Instead of saying that in certain paragraphs of the Federal Reserve Act we will strike out a certain word and insert some other word, and so on through the different paragraphs, we provide that "the third sentence of the first paragraph as amended shall read as follows", and we then set forth the phraseology covering the specific provision in extenso; that is to say, instead of amending a certain paragraph by striking out a certain word and inserting certain other words, or removing a comma, or something like that, we propose to indicate the change in the paragraph so as to have it "read as follows", so that one having the bill before him need not be under the necessity of referring to the original act while reading the bill in order to ascertain definitely what change is made.

The Senate committee amendment simply clarifies the provision in the House bill and extends it by setting forth in the bill itself the entire effect of the change which is made. There is no difference in principle between the House provision and the Senate provision. The Senate provision gives the paragraph complete as amended. I think there will be no difference of opinion about this amendment. It conforms to the House text in principle and substance, but it elaborates and clarifies and expands the House text so as to put into the bill the full effect of the desired change. I think we can all agree that that is the better method.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. In order to make it perfectly clear, I want to ask the Senator if there is any difference in meaning or in legal effect between the House bill and the Senate committee amendment in that respect?

Mr. FLETCHER. None at all. They are the same. The Senate committee amendment simply elaborates the proposal so as to show exactly what is the effect of the intended change. It sets out the language as it will read when the amendment is adopted. I think there can be no difference of opinion about agreeing to that amendment. There is no doubt that it embodies an improvement in the phraseology.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Florida if the committee were unanimous in respect to this amendment.

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes; we were.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, because of the confusion in the Chamber and the audible conversation, I have been unable to follow the Senator from Florida in his statement. I am not even sure of the amendment he is now discussing.

Mr. FLETCHER. I am inviting attention of the Senate to the amendment on page 2. The House provision refers to different paragraphs in section 16 of the Federal Reserve Act and amends those paragraphs. The Senate committee sets out the full effect of the amended provision. We provide that the paragraph as amended "shall read as follows", and then set out in extenso the paragraph as amended. I think there can be no objection to agreeing to that amendment.

Passing to the next amendment, which appears on page 14 of the bill, we find section 10 (a), which is changed by creating a board called the foreign-exchange board for the purpose of administering the stabilization fund thereinafter provided for. That board is proposed to be substituted for the Secretary of the Treasury. Under the terms of the bill as it came to the Senate, the Secretary of the Treasury was to administer the stabilization fund. The amendment would create a board of five members, and its members are named as the Secretary of the Treasury, the Governor of the Federal Reserve Board, the Comptroller of the Currency, and two others to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

There will be, of course, differences of opinion with regard to that provision. It is a very important and vital amendment. The committee, by a vote of 12 to 8, as I remember, inserted this amendment. All members of the committee reserved the right to vote on the floor of the Senate as they please and to take such position with reference to the amendment as they may determine for themselves.

The main point is whether we shall have the stabilization fund administered by the Secretary of the Treasury or whether we shall set up a board of five members to administer the fund. I need not dwell upon that at length now, because it will call for discussion later on when we reach the amendment. I may mention the views of some to the effect that it will be very difficult and confusing and unsatisfactory to have a board handle this fund. Senators know the nature of the fund. It is a confidential fund and must be handled very carefully.

There are various reasons why it should not be under the control of any group of men particularly. It is very desirable that it should be under the control and in the hands of those who know the necessity for using it. It will have to be used promptly, if at all. This proposed amendment will bring about a difference of opinion, no doubt. The provision as originally written put a large responsibility on the Secretary of the Treasury, but somebody has to be charged with that responsibility. It is important that the fund be administered by someone who will know how to handle it and be able to handle it expeditiously when it is needed to be handled. It is not desirable that it should be administered in such a way that the operations of the fund might become public or information reach outsiders.

However, I am simply stating the point that the fund is to be administered either by the Secretary of the Treasury or placed in the hands of a board of five members. There ought to be one unified source of authority, it seems to me.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, may I ask if the committee were unanimous with reference to the amendment?

Mr. FLETCHER. As I remember the vote, it was 12 to 8 in favor of the amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question? I do not know whether he would care to answer it or not. Has the Senator himself formed an opinion as to the practicability of five men, constituted as this amendment proposes the board shall be constituted, performing the functions which would devolve upon them under the statute?

Mr. FLETCHER. My own opinion about the matter is that it would be undesirable to have such a board. We have had a good many experiences with boards of 5 members or 7 members, as the case may be; and we have generally found great differences of view and conflict and delays and all that sort of thing happening when a board acts on matters where one person really ought to act. I think it is desirable that that amendment should be rejected, and that the Secretary of the Treasury should have the authority to handle this stabilization fund.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. Assuming that we should adopt that amendment, would there be any confliction then? I notice that at the bottom of page 13 there is the following proviso——

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Of which bill—the House bill?

Mr. NORRIS. The House bill. That is the only bill we have before us, I think.

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. The proviso is as follows:

> That the Secretary of the Treasury may sell the gold which is required to be maintained as a reserve or as security for currency issued by the United States, only to the extent necessary to maintain such currency at a parity with the gold dollar.

Will that provision conflict with the duty that is imposed on the board in the next section?

Mr. FLETCHER. It is very likely that there would be some conflict there. There might be.

Mr. NORRIS. If this fund is in the control of this board, I should think there would necessarily have to be a provision amending the proviso I have just read, if I understand the matter. In other words, if the board only can handle this fund, would it not conflict with the duty that would be imposed on the Secretary of the Treasury by that proviso to handle it?

Mr. FLETCHER. This particular fund is what is known as "the stabilization fund." This board, if constituted, is supposed to handle that fund alone. That would not necessarily be in conflict with the other provision, I think, respecting the amendment of section 3699 of the Revised Statutes. There is always, however, danger of some conflict between interests, especially when we have five members of a board to deal with. For instance, it was intimated in our hearings that there would be some possible conflict between the Treasury and the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Reserve banks, and that sort of thing—the whole Federal Reserve System. The governor of the Federal Reserve Board would be on this board, and it is possible that there would be conflicting interests there as to the operation of the Federal Reserve System and the operation of the Treasury. So it seems to me wiser not to incur that sort of danger.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. In a matter of this magnitude and this paramount importance, might it not occasionally be useful if there were conflict in respect to these decisions, so that we might know they were vigilantly under supervision?

Mr. FLETCHER. It might not be particularly harmful one way or the other, but that is one thing that was pointed out in our hearings. The suggestion was made by more than one person that there might possibly be some conflict between the Federal Reserve System and the Treasury growing out of this legislation.

The next amendment refers to the same question—that is, the amendment on line 13, to insert the word "sole", so that it would read:

> For the sole purpose of stabilizing the exchange value of the dollar in relation to the currencies of foreign governments, the Board * * * is authorized—

And so forth. That, of course, is in line with the preceding amendment. If this board is established, this amendment perhaps would be in order; but my own opinion is that there is no occasion for it, and that it would be inadvisable and harmful to insert the word "sole" in line 13.

Then section 10 (a) is amended in other respects so as to conform to the provision with reference to a board. Instead of saying "the Secretary of the Treasury" all the way through, as the original bill did, if a board should be established it would be necessary to change other provisions of the bill so as to provide for the board doing this, that, or the other, instead of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Those are amendments that would be in order only in case the Senate adopts the first amendment to section 10, which I submit ought not to be done.

The amendment at the top of page 16 provides that—

All the powers conferred by this section shall expire 2 years after the date of enactment of this act, unless the President shall sooner declare the existing emergency ended and the operation of the stabilization fund terminated; but the President may extend such period for not more than 1 additional year after such date by proclamation recognizing the continuance of such emergency.

That is not a vital amendment, it seems to me, and so far as I am concerned I do not make any opposition to it. I think perhaps it would be worth while to accept that amendment if it is insisted on. While perhaps it would be just as well not to amend the bill in that way, I make no great contest about that amendment. I do not consider it very vital. In other words, it limits the time of operation of this stabilization fund to 2 years unless sooner determined by the President, and then he may extend it by proclamation for another year.

The other amendment on page 16 is to the same effect, to limit the time within which the President may, if he decides to do so, to bring about the devaluation that is suggested. That amendment appears in line 22 on page 16—

Except that such powers shall expire 2 years after the date of enactment of the gold reserve act of 1934—

And so forth. Practically the same limitation is placed on this authorization as in the stabilization matter. I do not think that amendment is very vital. It is perhaps just as well not to have it, but at the same time I make no particular protest against it. I think it would not be harmful one way or the other. For that reason, as I say, if the Senate feels inclined to agree to that limitation, I shall make no objection to it.

On page 14, in line 22, there is an amendment. The Senate committee struck out the following provision in the House bill:

And a general report on the operation of the fund shall be made by the President to the Congress within the period beginning 90 days before and ending 90 days after the expiration of 3 years from the date of enactment of this act.

The Senate committee agreed to strike that provision out of the House bill; in other words, to limit the report on this stabilization fund to the President. The Secretary of the Treasury would report to the President, and would not necessarily make a general report to Congress of the operations of the fund. Of course, if Congress wants to get the report from the President, it may do so at any time. There are plenty of means whereby Congress can be informed with regard to the operation of this fund without the Secretary of the Treasury making a public report to the Congress, as required by that provision. In other words, the report will be made to the President, and we think it ought to end there.

So the committee, I think without any dissent at all, voted to strike that provision out of the House bill, and leave it to read:

An annual audit of such fund shall be made and a report thereof submitted to the President.

Those are the substantial amendments to the bill.

Referring now to the bill generally, its provisions may be summarized as follows:

It transfers to the United States the ownership and possession of all Federal Reserve bank gold, including that held by the Federal Reserve Board and Federal Reserve agents, and provides for payment therefor in gold certificates.

It authorizes the Federal Reserve banks to maintain reserves against Federal Reserve notes entirely in gold certificates.

It clarifies the Government's power to regulate the acquisition, transporting, melting or treating, import, export, or earmarking of gold.

It provides forfeiture of gold withheld, acquired, transported, melted or treated, imported, exported, or earmarked in violation of this bill or regulations of the Secretary of the Treasury, and also a penalty equal to twice the value of the gold.

The bill provides that no gold shall hereafter be coined, and that no gold coin shall hereafter be paid out or delivered by the United States, and that all gold coin of the United States shall be withdrawn from circulation and formed into bars. There is provision for releasing gold bars to pay foreign balances, and for industrial, professional and artistic uses, and for other purposes not inconsistent with this bill.

The bill provides that no currency of the United States shall be redeemed in gold except to the extent permitted in regulations issued by the Secretary of the Treasury with the approval of the President, but that gold certificates owned by Federal Reserve banks shall be redeemed at such times and in such amounts as in the judgment of the Secretary of the Treasury are necessary to maintain equal purchasing power of every kind of currency of the United States and that the reserve for United States notes and for Treasury notes of 1890 and the security for gold certificates shall be maintained in gold bullion equal to the dollar amounts required by present law.

It establishes a method of accounting for the gain or loss in value of Treasury gold occasioned by any change in the weight of the gold dollar.

It clarifies present laws which authorize the purchase and sale of gold by the Secretary of the Treasury.

It establishes a stabilization fund and appropriates $2,000,000,000 for the purpose, but only out of the profits on devaluation, which are directed to be covered into the Treasury under this bill.

It limits the President's power to fix the weight of the gold dollar to weights between 50 and 60 percent of the present weight and makes it clear that his various powers under paragraph (b) (2) of the Thomas amendment are continuing and distinct.

It approves and confirms action taken by the President and the Secretary of the Treasury under the act of March 9, 1933, and sections 43 and 45 of the act of May 12, 1933.

Those are the principal features of the measure, and referring to those, and the amendments which have been mentioned, I submit the measure to the Senate.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, from the Senator's remarks I got the idea that the amount held as security, for instance, for what are ordinarily known as "greenbacks", $150,000,000 in gold, it is to remain intact as it is now. Or will it be $150,000,000 worth of gold with the value of the dollar reduced?

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not quite understand.

Mr. NORRIS. Under the present law $150,000,000 is held in the Treasury as security for the so-called "greenbacks."

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. Will that $150,000,000 remain as it is now, with the gold content of the dollar as it is, or will it be the new gold dollar? The Senator used an expression to the effect that that would remain as it is now; and if so, I was wondering why it should remain as it is now.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I think this provision, on page 11 of the bill, covers the point which the Senator raises:

And provided further, That the reserve for United States notes and for Treasury notes of 1890, and the security for gold certificates (including the gold certificates held in the Treasury for credits payable therein) shall be maintained in gold bullion equal to the dollar amounts required by law, and the reserve for Federal Reserve notes shall be maintained in gold certificates, or in credits payable in gold certificates maintained with the Treasurer of the United States under section 16 of the Federal Reserve Act, as heretofore and by this act amended.

Mr. NORRIS. That makes it plain.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, does it exactly make it plain to the Senator from Nebraska? The $150,000,000 in the Treasury now is there not only as security for outstanding notes but the outstanding notes are redeemable in gold. Under this bill nothing is redeemable in gold.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, if I may ask the Senator from Virginia a question, does the Senator regard this measure as an inflationary measure?

Mr. GLASS. In a large sense it is an extremely inflationary measure. If the Senator will look at the hearings of the 22d, he will note that even the President's spokesman, Mr. Rogers, said that under it we might have inflation to the extent of 17½ billion dollars.

Mr. BORAH. I have just been reading in the last 10 minutes from Dr. Rogers' statement and what he says interested me.

Mr. GLASS. If the Senator will examine further, he will note that Mr. Owen D. Young, who gave, I think all members of the committee will agree, at least one of the most enlightening statements we heard, figured it out that under the bill as it is drawn the Secretary of the Treasury alone might inflate the currency to the extent of between 32 billion and 40 billion dollars.

Mr. BORAH. And the Secretary of the Treasury might not inflate it a dollar. That is the trouble.

Mr. GLASS. Yes; he may not inflate it a dollar.

Mr. BORAH. That is precisely where we left it last spring. We, as a Congress, have a responsibility in this matter and should meet it by doing our plain duty under the Constitution.

Mr. GLASS. If he should use the stabilization fund solely for foreign-exchange purposes, as the bill coming to us purported to provide, he would not inflate.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DUFFY in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I am sure the Senator from Virginia does not intend to misquote Mr. Young. I think what Mr. Young said was that there was a possibility of an expansion of reserve credit, which is quite different from an expansion of the currency, to the amount to which he referred. Nobody claims that under this bill there could be any such inflation of the currency as is suggested.

Mr. GLASS. I understood the question of the Senator from Idaho to be whether there would be inflation under the bill. There is no material difference between inflation of credit and inflation of the currency.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Kentucky this: Does the Senator from Kentucky agree with the construction of the bill placed upon it by Professor Rogers?

Mr. BARKLEY. In the main I do. What Professor Rogers was referring to was the ultimate maximum possibility of an expansion of credit facilities and reserves in the Federal Reserve banks by reason of the transactions which would be possible under the use of this stabilization fund by the Secretary of the Treasury. In other words, the economists figure out, by some rule of mathematics, that if the Government should use $2,000,000,000 in the purchase of foreign exchange, bills of acceptance or gold, to the extent permitted, and that should find its way into the Federal Reserve banks, based upon that there could be an expansion of what they call reserve credit, depending, of course, upon the rapidity with which it is turned over, and depending upon the demands of business, all of which, of course, relates itself to the velocity with which business recovery is brought about in the United States, and the velocity with which we engage in foreign transactions in an effort to stabilize the dollar in foreign exchange.

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator believe that this bill will give rise to an inflation of the currency?

Mr. BARKLEY. Not necessarily; and I do not think there is anything in the bill, of itself, which tends toward an inflation of the currency, for this reason: There is nothing in the bill which changes the functions of the Federal Reserve banks in the issue of currency. There is nothing in the bill which in any way deals with the ordinary currency of the country, except to make a change in its redeemability in gold to some extent. Under the present law the Federal Reserve banks can issue Federal Reserve notes and Federal Reserve bank notes based upon acceptable assets, for which there must be a 40 percent gold reserve, as the Senator knows. That may be in gold bullion or it may be in gold certificates. As a matter of fact, at this time the Federal Reserve banks hold about $900,000,000 of gold certificates which are used in lieu of gold as a coverage for the Federal Reserve notes and Federal Reserve bank notes which are now in circulation.

The only difference this measure makes in that is that they may issue their entire circulating medium in the form of Federal Reserve bank notes and Federal Reserve notes, based upon gold certificates in lieu of gold, after the title and possession of the gold is transferred from the banks to the Treasury; but there is not a line in the bill which authorizes the Federal Reserve banks to issue another dollar of currency which they cannot now issue.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I am sure that upon reflection the Senator from Kentucky would want to revise that statement. The Secretary of the Treasury might so operate this $2,000,000,000 stabilization fund as to vastly increase the reserves of the Federal Reserve banks, and the volume of currency issued by the Federal Reserve banks is altogether based upon the reserves held by the Federal Reserve banks.

Mr. BARKLEY. Based upon the reserve of 40 percent gold, of course, and 60 percent commercial assets, as provided for in the original Federal Reserve Act. We must distinguish here between an inflation of the currency or an expansion of the currency, and an inflation or an expansion of credit. There is a very distinct difference, and, as a matter of fact, the Federal Reserve banks might expand their credit without the enactment of this measure at all, depending entirely upon whether business recovers or not.

Mr. BORAH. An expansion of credit would give rise to an expansion of credit currency, would it not?

Mr. BARKLEY. It might possibly do so in the sense that more acceptable assets would be in the possession of the Federal Reserve banks, but that might happen under any condition, without the passage of the proposed bill, if business were to revive or recover to any extent comparable with what it was 4 or 5 years ago. I am speaking about the actual creation of more money.

Mr. BORAH. What I am seeking to ascertain is, What is the object and purpose of the bill? Is it proposed to put a larger volume of currency in circulation or is it not?

Mr. BARKLEY. There are three or four objects. The Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] I thought had explained the principal objects of the bill. One of the objects of the bill, of course, is to put the title to all of the monetary gold in the United States in the Government of the United States.

Mr. BORAH. Let us stop there. What is the object and purpose of putting the title to this gold in the Treasury of the United States?

Mr. BARKLEY. Well, that is a long story also. [Laughter.]

Mr. BORAH. But it is the key purpose of the bill, is it not?

Mr. BARKLEY. In my view, we have approached, or we are rapidly approaching, the time when the Government of the United States ought to possess the title to the gold, which ultimately is the basis for our currency, whether we are actually on a gold standard or whether we are not; and that the time is rapidly approaching, if it has not already arrived, when there is not enough gold in the world to operate as the basis for all the circulating money that the world needs in the transaction of its business.

Mr. BORAH. That time has long since arrived.

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes; I agree with that statement. Therefore, in order to conserve the gold, to impound it as the nucleus of the circulating medium that we have so long expressed in terms of the gold-standard fetish, it should be in the possession of, and the title to it should be held by the United States, which I think will tend to regularity, which I think will tend to a greater confidence, and as the ultimate endorser and guarantor of all the money that is in circulation, the United States is entitled to the possession of and to the title to this gold.

Mr. BORAH. But if, as a matter of fact, there is not sufficient gold to redeem the currency of the country, what is the difference whether it is in the hands of the Federal Government or in the hands of the Federal Reserve banks?

Mr. BARKLEY. I think one difference would be that it would be much more difficult to hoard it, to withdraw it, and to send it to foreign countries, if the Government of the United States had the title to it and the possession of it, in order to conserve it for the use of the people of this country.

Mr. BORAH. Well, yes. Mr. President, what I am seeking to ascertain is whether this is an inflationary measure or whether it is not. I can understand how it can put more money into banks, but will it put more money into circulation among the people? We have enough money in the banks now; how do you propose to get it out?

Mr. WALCOTT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. WALCOTT. As bearing on the question which the Senator from Idaho has just asked, permit me to quote exactly from the record Mr. Young's testimony, appearing on page 273 of part 3 of the hearings before the Committee on Banking and Currency of the Senate:

Mr. YOUNG. We are speaking about the expenditure of a gold profit which inevitably, when spent, increases the reserves of our banking system, unless it be spent to buy governments from the Federal Reserve bank. That is the only way this profit can be spent by the Treasury without increasing our bank reserves, namely, the purchase of governments from the Federal Reserve bank itself. Then the fund, which goes to the Federal Reserve bank, becomes inert and does not go in the credit market.

Then again:

Mr. YOUNG. If you spend $3,000,000,000—

And I am putting in the words "for instance", because that is not the exact amount, but an estimated amount—in the purchase of governments other than from the Federal Reserve bank, you have increased excess reserves of the banks by $3,000,000,000, and provided a credit basis of 8 to 10 times that amount.

And again:

Mr. YOUNG. It is not the expansion of credit that we need. It is the use of credit which we need. We now have eight or nine billions of inert potential credit in our banking system and we cannot get it used.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, let us compare that with Dr. Rogers' who speaks more authoritatively, I presume, so far as the authors of the bill are concerned.

Mr. BARKLEY. What page?

Mr. BORAH. On page 251 of the hearings before the Committee on Banking and Currency. Dr. Rogers says:

Besides increasing the world's monetary gold stock, raising the price of gold exerts two major economic influences:

The first is, it depresses the dollar on the foreign-exchange markets of the world. That is what we have had so far.

And, too, it creates a profit the utilization of which constitutes a direct inflationary influence of first magnitude.

What does Dr. Rogers mean by that?

Mr. WALCOTT. I do not know.

Mr. BORAH. Unless the Government authorities go into the open market, as they have been doing when the gold belonged to the Federal Reserve banks, I do not know how they are going to create any inflationary effect at all.

Dr. Rogers further says:

From the second of these influences—that is, this gold profit which will be created when and if we get devaluation—the utilization of the gold profit, the stimulus is still held in reserve. From it much is to be anticipated once the profit is realized through the determination of at least the minimum limit of devaluation and is used. It has to be used before you are going to get the benefit from it.

And how used? How do they propose to use this profit which they make by reason of this devaluation to effectuate inflation of which Dr. Rogers speaks? Will some member of the committee answer? I am asking these questions for the reason that, as I said this morning, I only secured the committee hearings last evening and this morning.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, of course Dr. Rogers is assuming the ultimate maximum possibility of the use of this profit which is predicated upon the devaluation of the gold dollar. If we may assume that the Government were to take over $4,000,000,000 worth of gold at present prices and devalue the dollar to the extent of 50 percent, that would, of course, create $8,000,000,000 in gold of the new value, representing a $4,000,000,000 profit.

Two billion dollars of that is set aside as the stabilization fund, and that seems to be the fund that sticks in the craws of many people. I can appreciate the fact that if the Government took that $2,000,000,000 in profit and bought $2,000,000,000 worth of its own securities held by the Federal Reserve banks, taking that much of what they call reserve credit out of the banks, and canceling it by the payment of these $2,000,000,000 in bonds, it would be a swapping of Government credit for Federal Reserve bank credit, the result being a cancelation of $2,000,000,000 worth of public debt.

According to their theory that would not only not increase the reserve credit held by the Federal Reserve banks for the transaction of their business but it might even withdraw from them at least $2,000,000,000 worth of possible reserve credit, or at least the two transactions would cancel each other and there would be no increase in what they would call Federal Reserve credit. We have to keep in mind the distinction between that and actual currency.

I can also appreciate that if the Government uses the $2,000,000,000 to buy acceptances and foreign exchange that finally finds its way into the Federal Reserve banks—which it would, of course, in the ordinary transactions of international commerce and exchange—that there would be added that much of possible reserve credit which might be drawn upon in the future, in the velocity of business, of commercial transactions so as to multiply itself in possible reserve credit to the country.

But that does not necessarily result in any increase in actual money that is in circulation; that would depend upon the demands of business and the requirements of commerce, and the application by the Federal Reserve banks, through the Federal Reserve Board, for more money based upon the needs of the district which they represented.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, in other words, it was testified that the Federal Reserve banks do not need any greater credit facilities than they have. The reserves already held would enable the Federal Reserve banks and member banks to increase credits by $9,000,000,000. What the Senator from Kentucky means is that if these reserves were increased, as he has indicated, it would not necessarily mean an expansion of the currency, but it would enable the Federal Reserve banks not only to increase their credits to $9,000,000,000, to which they are able to increase them now, but according to Professor Rogers it would enable them to increase their credits $17,000,000,000, and according to Mr. Young it would enable them to increase their credits between $30,000,000,000 and $40,000,000,000.

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator from Virginia believe that the result of the operation of the terms of this bill will give a rise to the price of commodities?

Mr. GLASS. Oh, certainly I do not. It may temporarily, just as the enactment last May of the emergency bill enabled the speculators to speculate in commodities and send the prices up, but the prices pretty soon came down.

Mr. TOWNSEND and Mr. GLASS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. BORAH. I yield first to the Senator from Delaware, and then I will be glad to yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I should like the read in this connection the following extract from the testimony of Professor Rogers:

Literally out of thin air does such a profit appear. Suddenly the Government finds itself in the possession of entirely new funds, which have come from no one and have to be returned to no one. Hence, their expenditure, just as that of newly created greenbacks, is in the first instance purely inflationary. In other words, entirely new purchasing power is added to that already in existence and is pitted against existing supplies of commodities and securities.

Mr. BORAH. Yes. I have some trouble about how to make money out of thin air. If you get this money you take it from somebody.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, of the course, if the Senator from Idaho will yield further, that is a result that cannot be avoided. If we are to devaluate the dollar, whether we devaluate it 10 percent or 6 percent, there is created out of "thin air" by legislative act or by the act of the Government additional purchasing power on the part of somebody. If the gold were left in the Federal Reserve banks and we devaluated it, and did not provide for the accrual of that profit to the Government, it would go to the Federal Reserve banks. It is bound to go to somebody; it is bound to go to anybody who has possession of the gold that we are devaluating, because if I have now a thousand dollars' worth of gold, according to its present valuation as bullion, and we devalue to the extent of 50 percent, I will have 2,000 of gold dollars that we have devaluated. Of course, that profit is going to somebody.

The Federal Reserve banks unanimously agreed that it should go to the Government; and all the testimony before the committee—and I will say that, so far as the public testimony was concerned, outside of that of Professor Rogers and Professor Warren, it was all brought to the committee largely upon the suggestion of those who either oppose the proposed legislation altogether or who desire to amend it, whereas the proponents of the bill desired to get the bill out on the floor here and did not undertake or desire to delay its consideration in the committee by bringing a lot of witnesses to Washington—but even those who opposed the bill, including Mr. Owen D. Young, for whose views I have so great respect that I sometimes think I must be wrong when I am in disagreement with him, admitted that the profit growing out of the devaluation ought not to be given to the banks; that it did not result from any activity of theirs but that it ought to go to the Government. Governor Black, of the Federal Reserve System, and all the men connected with the Federal Reserve System, and everybody else who was in a position to speak with any authority, took the position that this profit ought to go to the Government. Of course, it is created out of thin air, regardless of whether the gold is transferred to the Treasury or not. Whenever we cut the gold content of the dollar we by legislative act or by executive proclamation create a value that did not before exist in terms of the dollar.

Mr. BORAH. I do not think so; I do not think we can create values out of "thin air."

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Kentucky should have made another distinction. He ought to have said that Governor Black and all the Federal Reserve authorities and Mr. Young were opposed to devaluation in the beginning.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not understand that they ever said that they were opposed to it; they accepted devaluation as practically an accomplished fact.

Mr. FLETCHER. As something which had already been done.

Mr. BARKLEY. As something which had already been done.

Mr. GLASS. It has already been done abroad, but it has not been done here at home. The Senator from Kentucky has suggested that if a part of this gold should be given to the Government the profit would be used to purchase bonds. How could it be used to purchase bonds? How could it be used for any purpose except as a barometer of an arbitrary outstanding volume of currency? The Treasury cannot pay it out, because if it were paid out to anybody that person immediately would become a felon and would be fined or put in jail for possessing it. How would the Government use $2,000,000,000 to redeem all of its bonds or to redeem any of its currency? The fact of the business is that the bill puts this country upon an irredeemable currency basis and an irredeemable bond basis.

Mr. BORAH. I am in entire sympathy with the devaluation of the gold dollar if it will do two things: If it will increase the volume of circulating medium and raise the prices of commodities in this country. If it will not do that—and no one has appeared before the committee to say that it will do that—I want to know what it is all about.

Mr. FLETCHER. If the Senator will allow me to interrupt him, I think all the witnesses who appeared before the committee said that it would tend to raise prices.

Mr. GLASS. There were some who testified that it would not.

Mr. BORAH. I want to say that even Professor Rogers, after his remarks as to a possible inflation of $17,000,000,000, finally concludes, when asked by the Senator from Michigan a question, in this way. Senator COUZENS asked the question—

> So your conviction is that when and if we do devaluate there will be a substantial price rise domestically?
> Mr. ROGERS. I think that it will come, Senator. I do not think there is anybody in the world that can answer that dogmatically, but I should expect that if we had our money system controlled with reasonable care that rise would come certainly over a period of 6 months or probably a year. That would be my anticipation, because, as I say, a dogmatic answer is impossible.

So the most pronounced advocate of inflation before the committee, when it comes to answering the question as to what the effect of this measure will be upon the price of commodities and increasing the volume of currency, admits that it is pure speculation; he has no conviction about it that he is willing to announce as a conviction; and there has been no one before the committee, so far as I have been able to read, who is willing to state that the enactment of this measure will mean an increase in the price of commodities in the United States.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to interrupt him there?

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. Some of the witnesses who objected to devaluation objected on the ground that the bill, if enacted, will increase commodity prices, and therefore will be an injustice to men with fixed incomes and salaries. There was a lengthy discussion in the committee, engaged in, I think, by Professor Warren, and perhaps touched upon by Professor Rogers, as to whether an increase in the price of commodities should precede an increase in wages and salaries or whether an increase in wages and salaries should precede an increase in the price of commodities; but he stated that, as a rule, throughout all financial history in every country, an increase in commodities had preceded an increase in wages and salaries, and had to do it, because an increase in the price of commodities, theoretically, at least, brought greater profit to those who engaged in manufacturing.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I have had to read these hearings very hurriedly, and I take the Senator's statement, of course, as correct; but, insofar as I have read them, when it comes to the question of whether the action proposed to be taken will raise the price of commodities even those who are opposing the bill upon that theory are simply speculating upon the proposition. They entertain fears that it may raise prices, but give no basis for their fears.

Mr. GLASS and Mr. BULKLEY addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. BORAH. I yield first to the Senator from Virginia, and then I will yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. GLASS. It was simply in response to the theoretical conjecture that the bill would raise commodity prices that those of us who were opposed to it asserted—and the assertion remains uncontradicted to this moment—that should it raise commodity prices it would raise them so far ahead of the probability or even the possibility of adjusting wages and fixed salaries and other credits through the commodity prices thus theoretically raised that it would create, as it has done in every country that has ever tried it, a condition of destitution that is almost indescribable, such as that which afflicted the middle classes of Europe, among the wage earners and the salaried people in this country.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, the Senator does not contend that that result came after deflation in the countries of Europe. It came as a result of the use, the almost indefinite use, of the printing presses and the printing of money which became worthless. But after the European countries did devaluate, in those that did devaluate my understanding is no such dire results came as those described by the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. GLASS. If the Senator will simply read the review of Dr. Henry White, one of the founders of Cornell University and for years at the head of the department of economics at Cornell, who was twice Ambassador to Germany and once Ambassador to Russia, he will there find a historical recitation of the almost indescribable and entirely shocking destitution that was brought about; and if he will just read the history of France recently when it devalued the franc he will find the same thing.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, I do not intend to discuss whether an increase in prices would be a good thing or a bad thing. I think the Senator from Idaho is merely inquiring as to whether the devaluation of the dollar is likely to cause an increase in prices. I take it that he is inquiring whether there will be an increase in prices as expressed in United States currency and not in the gold price.

Professor Warren did bring some very important evidence before the committee on that point. The dollar, as will be understood, has been devalued already; the price of gold in the United States has risen between February and December 56 percent, as expressed in terms of the United States dollar. The price of gold, expressed in the terms of the pound, increased 5 percent during the same period. So that we might say the price of gold has remained practically stationary in England and has increased in this country by about one half. What effect has that had upon the price of commodities? These are the figures Professor Warren submitted to the committee, not as a conjecture as to what might happen but actual prices that have been established.

Cotton has increased in price——

Mr. BORAH. He did not give cotton as an illustration of the argument which he was making, I hope. Take out the other crops and where would cotton have been? It was a check from the Treasury that did that. The prices of farm commodities have not been increased by reason of the gold policy.

Mr. BULKLEY. I was going to read the price changes in several products he mentioned. Cotton increased in England 6 percent and in the United States 68 percent. Cottonseed oil fell in England 29 percent and advanced in the United States 26 percent. Wheat went up in England 8 percent and in the United States 51 percent. Copper went up in England 10 percent and in the United States 63 percent. Tallow declined in England 7 percent but advanced in the United States 50 percent. Silver advanced in England 11 percent and in the United States 67 percent.

Mr. BORAH. If he will go out on the American farm he will learn something that he did not learn in the books, and that is that the prices of those commodities have not risen at all except where they were aided in some way other than the money question.

Mr. GLASS. Exactly so; and it was testified that a multitude of other considerations entered in to affect prices. If we plow under all the cotton, of course cotton will go up. If we kill all the sows in the country, of course pork will go up. [Laughter.]

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. THOMAS of Utah in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. With reference to copper, of course I happen to know something. Its price has nothing to do with reducing the gold content of the dollar. As a matter of fact, just recently the price of copper has been higher in London than in the United States. The price of gold has nothing to do with the price of copper except insofar as the proportion of copper we export abroad is concerned.

It is impossible for me to see that the mere reducing of the gold content of the dollar is going to raise the price of commodities in this country unless we are going to issue currency upon it. Unless we are going to issue more currency and put more credit in circulation then there will be no rise in commodity prices if the gold is just taken care of.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. KEAN. I would like to say to the Senator that on the gold basis a large number of American products are lower than they were a year ago.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I shall make this suggestion, and then I shall not detain the Senate further at this time. The country is interested in this measure not so much because it transfers the gold from the Federal Reserve System to the Treasury. I doubt its wisdom, but it is not a controlling fact with me. The people of the country may take either side of that question. The country is interested to know whether or not it is going to increase the volume of circulating medium and whether or not there is reason to believe that it is going to increase the price of commodities. Let those who are in position to explain the bill, those who heard the witnesses, those who studied the measure, give us some assurance upon these questions before we are asked to vote. That is my supreme interest in the bill, and I must say I can find little assurance.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. I am not a member of the committee; but, like the Senator from Idaho, I am seeking information. If the gold content of the dollar is cut to 60 percent, there will be 40 percent of the gold stock free in the form of profits.

Mr. BORAH. In the form of what?

Mr. CONNALLY. In the form of so-called "profits".

Mr. BORAH. Yes; so-called "profits."

Mr. CONNALLY. What is to hinder that gold being utilized to increase the volume of money by the issuance of gold certificates or gold currency?

Mr. BORAH. Has the Senator any assurance or is there anything in the bill to give me any assurance that that is going to be done?

Mr. CONNALLY. I do not say there is going to be any such assurance, but what is to prevent that thing being done?

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho let me answer that question? The act of May 12 affirming the proclamation of the President is to prevent it, because if we issue any gold certificates and anybody is caught with them, he will be put in jail and fined. [Laughter.]

Mr. BORAH. The question is, What is there in the bill that gives us any assurance that the currency is going to be issued based on the surplus amount of gold? I should really like to know what this bill promises, or at least proposes in the way of raising the price of commodities. What is there in the bill which gives relief to those who must have better prices or suffer complete economic ruin.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I suggest to the Senator that we could be here for 6 months listening to the views and theories of experts, college professors, economists, financiers, and all that sort of thing. These expert financiers and bankers have brought upon Europe and the United States the holy mess in which we find ourselves now. I do not pay much attention to the theories and expressions of opinion from alleged experts. One has to base his conclusions upon his own thought, his own mind, his own conscience. That is my opinion about it. We could be here for 6 months listening to different views and expressions of opinion, and we would find them all crossing each other.

Mr. BORAH. I want to know from those who have studied the bill, if we can ascertain it, what they believe the bill will do. Do not forget that last spring we were asked to delegate certain powers for the purpose of increasing the volume of the circulating medium, thereby raising the prices of commodities. We know what has happened. I want to know whether we are again going to do that same thing. In the first place, Congress should perform its duty under the Constitution to coin money and regulate the value thereof; but if it is determined to delegate power, let us know what power we are delegating.

Mr. FLETCHER. I will say to the Senator that it is vitally important not only to the United States but to the world that there should be reached a point of stabilization of currency, stabilization of exchange. This bill leads to that point. The President said on July 3 to the Economic Conference in England, and he said on October 22 in his address to the people here, that he is going to raise the price level, and that the thing needed for that purpose is to accomplish a stabilization basis.

This will be one result absolutely arising under the bill. We have in this country today over $4,000,000,000 of gold. That is the total amount—nearly 40 percent of all the gold in the world. The monopolistic theory, which is the system under which we are operating now, based on history and based on experience, is that we can issue two and one half times, in dollars or currency, the amount of basic money. Therefore we have the possibility of issuing in currency two and one half times the amount of basic gold. We can base upon that also 12 times that amount in credit in dollars—12 times the basic dollar in credit. That is safe. That has been the practice. It has been proven to be safe.

Mr. BORAH. No; it is not safe and has not been proven to be safe. One of the things that brought us to our present difficulty is the fact that we assumed—the world assumed—we could issue a vast amount of currency upon a very small amount of gold. When the first economic or financial cloud appears in the sky everybody hunts for gold and the crisis comes. When the demand for gold came the world had about $11,000,000,000 to meet four hunderd billion demand.

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes; there is something in that, I grant, but the formula under which we have been operating is that $2.50 in currency may be issued for $1 of basic metal, and 12 times that amount may be issued in credit.

Now we are going to decrease the gold content of the dollar. We are going to stabilize it at some figure—either 50 or 60 percent of its former value, or something of that sort. We are going to have $2,000,000,000 of profit here, apparently. That is the estimate that everybody is making about it. Of course that can form the basis of additional currency. There is no doubt about that. There can be expansion under that; but the thing we are driving at is to raise the price level, which the President says he will do; and we can depend on that, I think. When we get to the point of stabilizing the currency we shall have laid the foundation for that, and that is all that is needed to be done; and that is one thing that is accomplished here.

Mr. GLASS and Mr. SHIPSTEAD addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho has the floor. Does he yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, may I remark that an examination of the hearings will show that perhaps the greatest exchange expert in the world, who has an international reputation, Mr. Stewart, testified before the committee that so far from bringing about stabilization of the currency this bill would do just the reverse, and create friction and retaliation throughout the world.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, in that connection, his suggestion was that if we did what England is now doing it might create friction. The truth is that England now has a stabilization fund of about $1,750,000,000 which is being used for so-called "stabilization purposes." Although they have denied the statement in the press, it has been frequently stated that they are using, or have used, some of that fund for the purpose of buying American dollars so as to offset our campaign to reduce the value of the American dollar in European exchange.

Whether that is true or not is not material; but it was in that connection that Mr. Stewart did say that for us to attempt to do the same thing that England is now trying to do might create some friction.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, anybody who will read the hearings will see that Mr. Stewart textually and specifically said that this bill would not bring about stabilization.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator wish to take the floor?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I do not wish to take it away from the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I am through. I yield the floor.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I should like to ask some member of the committee what is the gold coverage of our currency today in percentage.

Mr. BARKLEY. The minimum coverage is 40 percent, but as a matter of fact, it is about 80 percent.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. That is what I wanted to know. If we devalue the dollar by 50 percent, then we will have 160 percent coverage. Is that right?

If we now have 80 percent of coverage for our currency and we devalue the dollar by 50 percent—if it were done today we would have 160-percent coverage, as I understand. Is that correct?

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes; that is correct, I think.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I am asking for information. I hope the members of the committee will not blame those of us who have not sat in the hearings for asking some questions. We desire information earnestly.

Mr. BARKLEY. If the Senator will yield, in that connection, of course, the Senator must keep in his mind the fact that this bill does not change in any way the functions of the Federal Reserve System, which at present is issuing a large proportion of the currency in circulation in this country. The bill provides that this gold shall be turned over to the Treasury and title vested in the Treasury and that gold certificates shall be issued to the Federal Reserve banks dollar for dollar—not the new dollar but dollar for dollar—according to the gold content of the dollar at this time, so that the Federal Reserve banks will get back no more gold certificates in return for the gold than the present value of the gold based upon our statutes, which is $20.67 an ounce. They will get gold certificates that will not represent any devaluation at all, and their status will be no different after devaluation than it is now. They could go ahead and issue currency just as they do now upon gold certificates. They are not required to issue it upon actual bullion. They can issue it upon bullion or upon gold certificates representing bullion.

As I said awhile ago, the Federal Reserve banks now have over $900,000,000 of these gold certificates as a part of the basis for the Federal Reserve currency that is now in circulation. While theoretically devaluation to the extent of 50 percent would create more gold dollars upon which currency might be issued by authority of Congress by the Secretary of the Treasury or the Federal Reserve Board, as a matter of fact they will have no more of a basis for the issuance of currency after devaluation than they have now, because the gold certificates they will obtain will represent the present value of the gold and not the future value of the devaluated dollar.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, the Senator from Kentucky has just made a speech in favor of contraction rather than expansion. He is for the transfer of the gold from the Federal Reserve banks to the Treasury, there apparently to remain dormant except as to this stabilization fund derived from the so-called "profits."

Let me call the attention of the Senator from Minnesota to this aspect of the case:

Suppose that gold were left with the Federal Reserve banks. After devaluation it would immensely increase the reserves of the Federal Reserve banks; and if on a 50-percent basis, it would supply the Federal Reserve banks with the actual facilities for increasing their currency issues and their credit accounts just 100 percent. If, however, it is transferred to the Treasury, nobody knows what will happen. We will simply have to conjecture as to what will happen.

While I am on my feet and talking about gold certificates, let me say that the gold certificates proposed to be given to the Federal Reserve banks are fraudulent. They are not gold certificates.

What is a gold certificate? What is it worth except as a barometer of outstanding issues? What is it worth if it cannot be used to redeem outstanding notes and to give the people of America who carry their currency in their pockets, and in the banks, and in their savings accounts, confidence in the worth of their currency?

In short, the gold certificates as we now understand gold certificates, as the statutes describe gold certificates and authorize their use, are to be taken away from the Federal Reserve banks. They are not to be left there. All of their gold and all of their real gold certificates—warehouse receipts for gold—are to be taken away from them, and they are to be handed back so-called "gold certificates" that will not be gold certificates at all.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I thank the Senator.

I should like to ask the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] a question. How much gold, approximately, is in the Federal Reserve banks now?

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, there has been no exact statement, but in the neighborhood of four billions; I think $4,300,000,000. It is in that neighborhood.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. We will call it, in round numbers, $4,000,000,000. That is taken out of the Federal Reserve banks and delivered to the Treasury; and, as I understand, the Treasury then will issue so-called "gold certificates" in the same amount and deposit them back in the banks and pay them for the gold.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is right.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Those gold certificates will not be redeemable in gold, as I understand.

Mr. KING. Theoretically, in bullion.

Mr. BARKLEY. Theoretically, they will be redeemable in bullion, but as a matter of fact, they will not be. Of course, there would be nothing to be gained by the Treasury Department taking possession of the gold and issuing gold certificates for it if the next day the banks could come back and get the gold.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I do not want to argue with the Senator. I am just trying to get some information.

As I understand, the Federal Reserve banks can issue currency against these so-called "gold certificates" in order to put money in circulation and expand the currency.

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes; that is right.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. What I cannot understand is this: At the present time we have 80 percent of gold coverage in the Federal Reserve banks. There is a margin of 40 percent upon which additional currency can be issued. The amount of currency in circulation can be doubled. If it is possible to put money in circulation in that way, why is it not done?

Mr. BARKLEY. I think the answer to that question is that as a matter of fact, even in the days of our greatest so-called "prosperity", the Federal Reserve banks never did exhaust their power to issue currency. I have forgotten the exact figures, but I think that at the peak of our circulating currency we had something like $7,000,000,000 in circulation. We now have about $5,800,000,000 in circulation. Even when we had the largest amount of actual money in circulation in this country, however, the Federal Reserve System had not yet exhausted its power to issue currency, because the amount of money issued by the Federal Reserve banks depends upon the demands of business in the districts where these Federal Reserve banks are located.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Certainly.

Mr. BARKLEY. And, of course, the original theory of the Federal Reserve System was that we were creating a flexible monetary system which would respond to the demands of business. When there was a great demand for an expansion of the currency there would be a method by which it could be issued and circulated, and when there was no demand for it the currency would automatically retire from circulation.

It is true, as I have said heretofore and as I understand this bill, that no specific expansion in the circulation of money is provided for in the bill, because the Federal Reserve banks get back dollar for dollar in certificates. Whatever may be said about the certificates, they are certificates, and the banks can issue money upon them. They get back dollar for dollar which would represent their present gold holdings, and therefore they could issue up to an amount that would be equal to a 40-percent coverage upon the entire amount of gold they hold. If they now have $4,000,000,000 in gold, they could issue $10,000,000,000 in circulating money in this country; but they have never done so. They might do so if business required it.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. They can do it now if business requires it.

Mr. BARKLEY. They can do it now if business requires it, and they can do it under this bill; and they can do no more under this bill in the way of issuing currency than they can do now with actual gold in their vaults.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, how is the currency under this bill outside the Federal Reserve System to be issued, and to whom, and for what purposes?

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not recall any provisions of this bill that changes the present law with respect to ordinary Treasury notes and silver certificates. We do not deal with that subject at all. It goes on just as it has been going.

Mr. GLASS. The Senator from Idaho a while ago wanted to know definitely where there was any specific authority in the bill to increase the outstanding currency issues.

Mr. BARKLEY. There is none, as I interpret the bill, for an increase in actual circulating paper; but there is no need for it. On the theory that the Federal Reserve System is an adequate system of currency flexibility, there would be no need of it until the powers of the Federal Reserve System for the issue of currency and the circulation of money throughout the United States had been exhausted.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator from Kentucky permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. BARKLEY. Certainly.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I beg the Senator to believe that I am not asking these questions to be obstructive.

Mr. BARKLEY. I regret that on a subject like this nobody has the last word. I inquired a few days ago of a very distinguished witness how many schools of economics there were in this country, and his reply was, "Just as many as there are economists", and I think that is almost true. I regret, of course, that men here, even those who have studied the subject all their lives, disagree as to theory and as to practice. All I can do is to answer as best I can, but I cannot guarantee to the Senator that my answers will be exact or absolutely correct.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I do not ask that of the Senator. I ask the Senator to give me what information he has, because I need it.

As I understand it, there is hope that there will be expansion of the currency when this bill is enacted, because the supply of gold will be doubled, and currency will be issued through the Federal Reserve banks to people who come to the banks to borrow.

As I understand it, there is twice as much gold now, before the dollar is devalued, as is necessary to cover the currency; so if it is to be possible, under the system that is to be in effect when this bill is enacted, to get some currency in circulation, we can do that now, because it is based upon borrowing from banks. Is there anything to lead the Senator to believe that people will go to the banks and borrow money after this bill shall be enacted, when they will not borrow now, so as to put money into circulation?

Mr. BARKLEY. That, of course, involves some conjecture. It would not happen unless business should improve, and I hope it will improve. My theory is, and my belief is, that the devaluation of the gold dollar, and the stabilization of the gold dollar, at whatever it may be devalued, whether at 50, 55, or 60 percent, will bring about, not overnight, of course, not in a week, but gradually, over a reasonable period of time, an increase in the prices of commodities. That increase in the prices of commodities will justify manufacturers in employing more men, and in increasing wages ultimately, not overnight, however. You cannot go up hill as fast as you go down. I have never seen or heard of any vehicle in the world which will go up hill as fast as it can go down. One of the troubles with our people is that we are all impatient; we want to recover overnight. We want to recover in a week what we lost in 4 years, and we cannot do it. But if we stabilize the dollar at a figure somewhere in the neighborhood of its present international exchange value, which is about 62 cents, if we stabilize at 60, or even at 50, I believe that ultimately there will be inaugurated a process by which there will be an increase in the velocity of business, an increase in the purchasing power of the American people, an increase in their ability to live according to the standards which we have set for American citizenship; and that increase in velocity, and that stimulation in business, will stimulate borrowing power and lending inclination on the part of business and on the part of banks, and, in return, it will reflect itself in a demand by the member banks for more money from the Federal Reserve banks, and by the Federal Reserve banks for more money from the Federal Reserve Board, which of itself automatically will increase the amount of money in circulation in this country.

I realize that if we devaluated the dollar, and left the gold in the possession of Federal Reserve banks, their coverage would be increased by 100 percent, and they theoretically could issue more money; instead of $10,000,000,000, they could issue $20,000,000,000, upon the amount of gold they have now. But even though they had the power to issue a hundred billion dollars, they would not do it, as I conceive it to be their duty and their function, unless the demands of business were such as to make it advisable or necessary for them to increase the amount of circulating money, dependent upon the demands of business in the United States.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, if, for instance, our coverage now had dwindled down to 20 percent of the coverage required by law; if we had only 20 percent of gold to cover our currency——

Mr. BARKLEY. That would be an impossibility, because the law requires a minimum of 40 percent. They cannot have any less than 40 percent.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I believe it did drop to 37 at one time.

Mr. BARKLEY. It did not stay at that figure long.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Let me put it in another way. Suppose we had issued enough currency to absorb all of our gold down to 40 percent, and there still was a great demand for money, borrowings from the banks, and, in order to keep within the law and extend these borrowings by banks, an issuance of currency on the basis of 40 percent, we come and say that we must devalue the dollar by 50 percent in order that we can issue the currency to meet the demands of business. I should understand that, because the demand for currency would be there.

As I understand it, we now have twice as much gold as we need upon which to issue currency and meet the demand, if it were here. So far as I can see, these banks get back the same amount of dollars in gold certificates that they turn over in gold, and they have the same amount of basis of currency, and how can they issue any more than they can now?

Mr. BARKLEY. They cannot; that is, they cannot issue any more than they could issue now.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. How can they put more money into circulation than they can now? As I understand it, it is hoped that this bill will in some way result in more money being put into circulation—result in expansion of currency.

Mr. BARKLEY. As a purely mechanical process of actually printing it and putting it into circulation, of course they could not, and they cannot. One of the troubles of the country now is shortage of credit. We know that many banks have become mere depositories, they are not functioning any longer as banks, and it is for that reason that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation has been compelled to lend over three and a half billion dollars to American business. It is for that reason that we have extended their time for another year, because so far banks have not resumed their functions as banks and have not resumed the extension of credit necessary to the revival of American business. Whether it is due to any fault of their own, or because they have been burned and are afraid of the fire, or whether they are waiting for business itself to recover sufficiently to guarantee that any business that borrows money can repay it, I am not in a position to say; but we do know that that is the situation.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Is it not a fact that our banking system is not functioning because we have two kinds of money, one based upon coin and the other based upon confidence? The greatest volume of our money has been that based upon confidence, controlled by our credit system, in the form of credit money, in the form of bank checks.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is quite true. It has come in modern times to be true that bank deposits represent really a form of circulating medium as completely as a $20 bill, and a decline in bank deposits, of course, results in a decline of the potential amount of circulating money which is used in the payment of debts and in the transaction of business. But that is a thing which cannot be controlled by legislation, except insofar as legislation may unchoke the channels of commerce, and free the situation to the extent that business will of itself move on and thereby create greater circulating medium in the form of bank checks and bank deposits.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Minnesota permit me to ask a question?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. In just a moment. The credit system has not functioned since 1929.

Mr. BARKLEY. I would not say that it has not functioned; it has not functioned completely. It has functioned in part.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. People will not borrow, and banks cannot lend if people will not borrow, so our credit system has been in a comatose condition. The foundation of it is confidence, confidence in the future, certainty, and we have been trying for 4 years to get the credit system to operating, so that we could inflate credit. Those who are opposed to inflation of the currency by what they call fiat money have never had any fear of inflation of the credit system, and they have made heroic efforts to inflate that system, and have been about as successful as a man would be in inflating a rubber tire with a hole in it, or in reviving life in a corpse.

Mr. BARKLEY. As a matter of fact, many of those who oppose monetary inflation have not only favored credit inflation, but have brought it about, in large measure, especially up to 1929.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Up until that time.

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. But since 1929 there has been no ability to extend any credit except the credit of the Government of the United States.

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course it is a difficult thing to drive a peg at any point and say that all on this side is expansion and all on the other side is inflation. It is difficult to draw a hard and fast line so as to say where expansion ends and where inflation begins, either as to money, or as to credit.

Mr. FESS. Will the Senator from Minnesota permit me to ask the Senator from Kentucky a question?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. FESS. I should like to ask the Senator from Kentucky a question with respect to the amount of currency. I note we have in circulation $1,157,000,000 plus in gold and certificates issued on gold coin or gold bullion. What will become of those certificates?

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course, about $900,000,000, or nearly $1,000,000,000, of that is now held by the Federal Reserve banks as a basis for currency. There is nothing in this section of the bill taking over this gold that refers to gold certificates. There is no change in the status of the gold certificates in that section of the bill which requires the transfer of gold bullion or monetary gold from the Federal Reserve banks to the Treasury.

Mr. FESS. In other words the circulation will not be reduced by the amount of the outstanding gold certificates?

Mr. BARKLEY. No, sir.

Mr. FESS. Secondly, will there be any authority to issue currency outside of the Federal Reserve Board?

Mr. BARKLEY. The same that is now in existence.

Mr. FESS. Just the same?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Only that it will be based upon the certificate?

Mr. BARKLEY. Based upon the certificate instead of the metal.

Mr. FESS. I have this question to ask: The report of the Committee on Banking and Currency of today, accompanying the bill, says that the Federal Reserve notes in circulation amount to $3,344,000,000 plus. Forty percent of that, which is the gold reserve necessary, would only be $1,340,000,000. That means that the Federal Reserve System have issued notes only upon about one third of their holdings. In other words, they could issue three times the amount of note circulation that now exists.

The question I wish to ask is: If inflation is the point we are getting at, where do we have any suggestion that there will be any increase of currency by this proposed act, when the Federal Reserve Board has the authority to issue three times what it already has issued, and the only basis for increasing the circulation is in the Federal Reserve Board?

Mr. BARKLEY. I made the statement a while ago that, as a matter of fact, the Federal Reserve System had never at any time since its establishment exhausted its powers to issue money, and that the exercise of that power provides a flexible situation, depending upon the demands of business, and I roughly estimated their coverage at this time at something more than 80 percent. I think it is certainly nearer to 95 percent. It is about 3 for 1, rather than 2 for 1; and they could issue anywhere from 2½ to 3 times as much currency as is now in circulation in Federal Reserve notes or in Federal Reserve bank notes if the requirements of business made it wise or desirable.

Mr. FESS. I agree exactly with the Senator from Kentucky that circulation responds to the demands of business; and that if more money were to be pumped into circulation and there were no demand for it, it would not have any particular effect. What I wanted to refer to was brought up in the colloquy between the Senator from Iowa and the Senator from Kentucky as to increasing the currency. In the first place I want it understood that I do not believe that the mere issuing of currency is going to create anything like prosperity. I never have been a believer in that theory. But at the same time I believe those who think the passage of this measure means a large increase of currency in circulation have no basis for that belief.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not think the pending bill is specifically an inflationary measure so far as increase in the volume of actual money in circulation is concerned.

Mr. FESS. But it will result in inflation of credit.

Mr. BARKLEY. It does contain the possibilities of an expansion of credit, and I do not look upon that with any alarm at all. I do not share the fears of those who think that a credit system and a banking system which has never yet exhausted its powers, even in the most prosperous times, if we refer even to 1928 or 1929, is going to run wild in its operations under the provisions of this bill or of any other bill that Congress might pass, or of any recovery program that might be inaugurated.

Mr. FESS. I agree with the Senator. The point I tried to make yesterday is that the expansion is in credit and not in currency.

Mr. BARKLEY. Whether anybody looks upon an actual increase in circulating money with assurance or with dread is due to the viewpoint of the particular person who believes in it and wants it, or who does not believe in it and does not want it. But, as I have heretofore said, the bill proposes to make no change whatever in the ordinary functions of either the Treasury or the Federal Reserve System in the issue of circulating money.

Mr. FESS. I do not agree with the Senator from Kentucky that there is not danger in the expansion of credit. I think there is.

Mr. BARKLEY. I said that I did not believe there was any danger in the expansion of credit that will come about under the terms of the pending bill. I believe there is a species of credit expansion which is dangerous.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Will the Senator permit another question?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I believe the Senator said there was a possibility of having a greater expansion of currency after this bill shall have been passed than there is now.

Mr. BARKLEY. No; I said there was not.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I beg the Senator's pardon. I did not understand him, then.

Mr. BARKLEY. I said there was a possibility of a further expansion of credit; but, as a matter of fact, any revival of business, any increase in our foreign trade that will result in greater activity in foreign exchange, will in itself increase credit and credit reserves.

Those who have opposed this bill and the use of the proposed stabilization fund on the ground that it will expand credit overlook the fact that if we in this country were to return to normal conditions—I do not mean the conditions of 1929, but any average of prosperity and business activity—that of itself would increase the credit reserves in all the banks of the country, because they would have greater deposits, they would have possession of more bills of exchange and acceptances, and all forms of paper that represent commercial and industrial transactions. It seems to me it would be entirely beside the question to say that the only thing that offers any opportunity for an expansion in credit is the use of the proposed stabilization fund in the purchase of foreign exchange in order to keep our dollar on a stable basis.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I am not quarreling with what the Senator has to say, and I am not opposing the bill. I am asking for some information.

Mr. BARKLEY. I understand that.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I believe so long as we take gold from private citizens we ought to take it from the banks. There is no reason why it should be taken from private citizens and the banks be allowed to keep it.

I have no quarrel with the committee on the question of the stabilization fund, because I think we are 3 years late in establishing such a fund. The British Government has used its stabilization fund with which to lower the exchange value of the pound, in my opinion, to our detriment; and we should have met that attack upon our own exchange value and our own money 3 years ago, at the time the British started it.

Mr. BARKLEY. We did not then know as much as we know now, I suppose; at least as much as I hope we know now.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I should like to ask the Senator another question. When the British devalued the pound from $4.86 to $3.22, and held it there for quite a long time, the records affecting the British economic system show that the action thus taken did not change the domestic purchasing power of the pound. The devaluation only affected it in respect to foreign exchange. The British stopped the deflation. The pound bought in the British domestic market what it bought before it was devalued. I do not know what the exact ratio between the pound and the dollar is today. The pound today equals $5, as I understand.

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes. It went up to $5.25, I believe, or it went down to $5.25, whichever it is.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Our action with respect to our money, of course, has affected the dollar in foreign exchange. I fail to see how it has affected the domestic purchasing power of the dollar here, any more than the lowering of the pound in foreign exchange affected the purchasing power of the pound in Great Britain. I cannot see where it has had any effect upon the purchasing power of the American dollar. With all due respect to the witnesses who testified before the committee about the rise in certain commodities, I think they have overestimated the influence of the foreign-exchange devaluation of the dollar. I think it has had a very beneficial effect, and I think it is shown that our exports have been increasing since we devalued the dollar in foreign exchange. On the question as to whether it has had any effect on the domestic purchasing power of the dollar I should like to have some further enlightenment.

If we are going to have a devalued dollar, is there any assurance that the domestic purchasing power of the dollar will be decreased so we will have a cheaper dollar here—something on a parity with what the dollar is in foreign exchange? If we can do that, I think we would have a rise in the price level, and if we have a rise in the price level, then our credit system will begin to function, and banks will loan money, because people will want to borrow; the credit system will be revived, and we will have a revival of buying and selling, and of commerce. But I should like to have some more information as to how this is going to restore that confidence which it is hoped will be the basis on which the credit system is going to be revived.

If the Government takes $4,000,000,000 in gold from the Federal Reserve banks and pays them back $2,000,000,000 for that gold, and if the Government then has $2,000,000,000 in gold and it were to issue against that gold a certain amount of currency in the form of Treasury notes, making them legal tender for the payment of Government contracts or the payment of Government salaries, I can see how, instead of borrowing, the Government will put more money in circulation. But if we are going to depend on the banking system to put money in circulation and expand the currency, I do not see how that is going to be done unless people will borrow from the banks, and with the uncertainty of economic conditions in this country very few people can borrow from the banks or will borrow from the banks unless they have Government contracts. If there is anything being bought in connection with the purchase of which large credit is needed that is not for Government contracts that is directly or indirectly for Government contracts under the credit expansion of Federal credit that we are now experiencing, I should like to know what it is.

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course, the Senator's question, if it is a question, covers a very large and varied field. But getting back to the British situation, of course, we all recognize that when England went off the gold standard the pound was worth about $4.86, which is the normal value of the pound in terms of the American dollar. Immediately the value of the pound went down until $3.25 would buy a pound. At the same time, while there was no very great reflection on domestic prices in the British Isles as a result of that devaluation, England began not only to benefit from the standpoint of her trade with the United States but she was enabled to invade markets all over the world that we could not invade in competition with her because they could manufacture at a lesser price in terms of foreign exchange. We have to consider all our foreign commerce in terms of foreign exchange; we cannot consider it in terms of domestic value or the purchasing power of the dollar or of the pound. So Great Britain, when her pound went down to $3.25, was enabled to invade the markets of the world in competition with us and to undersell us. Of course, that was a great benefit to the English people, and it probably had some effect in maintaining prices at the approximate level where they were prior to the devaluation of the pound or prior to the time when England went off the gold standard.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I agree absolutely with the Senator on that point. Now, I should like to ask the Senator another question. Is it the Senator's opinion, and is it the opinion of the committee and of the Treasury, that the benefit to come through this bill will come from the fact that if we devaluate the dollar in terms of foreign exchange it will so stimulate our foreign business as to help a revival of business here and cause people to come to the banks to borrow money and so bring about an expansion of the currency?

Mr. BARKLEY. In part that is true, and, as a matter of fact, as proof——

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. The Senator does not have to prove it; I believe, to some extent, that is true.

Mr. BARKLEY. As a matter of fact, we know that the very day when the dollar began to go down in value as compared to the English pound and to the franc and to the lira and the currencies of other European countries, our exports began to increase. Some may say they would have increased anyway. I cannot prove that they would not have increased anyway, but neither can others prove that they would have increased without regard to the reduction in the value of the American dollar. We do know that, coincident with the reduction of the value of the American dollar in international exchange, our exports increased, and they have increased every month for the last 4 months, not only over the previous month but over the same month of 1932. So, I say, it is a fair deduction that it has been and will be of continued benefit in that respect, and, inasmuch as in normal times foreign trade represents about 10 percent of our entire trade and fixes the value of our domestic consumption, I think that that fact is one that is to be very seriously considered in appraising the total benefits that are calculated to come from the enactment of this proposed legislation. I do not claim that that is the only benefit, but it is one.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I agree with the Senator. I have no doubt we have benefited in foreign trade from the devaluation of the dollar, and we are going to continue to benefit. The Senator says he does not think that is the only benefit we are going to have. I should like, without taking up too much time, to have someone explain how we are going to get any other benefit. I should like to know as much about this measure as I can.

Mr. BARKLEY. I would not undertake to catalog all the possible benefits, but I think one of the benefits that will come as the result of this proposed legislation is that the American people will know that their gold, which is the basis of their circulating medium, is in the possession and the control of the Government of the United States. Why was it necessary for the President to issue a proclamation forbidding the exportation of gold from the United States, including gold in the Federal Reserve banks as well as gold in my pocket or in yours, Mr. President, or anywhere else in the country? It was because of the fear that there might be such a depletion of the gold supply of the United States that it would not operate as a sufficient basis for the circulating money of the United States.

I think from a practical standpoint, from the standpoint of psychological effect, and from the standpoint of ultimate responsibility—for, after all, the Government of the United States is behind every dollar that is in circulation, whether it be issued by the Federal Reserve System or not—that it will tend to promote a greater confidence among the people of this country that the thing upon which, at least theoretically, our currency is based, in addition to their confidence in the Government, is in a place where it may be preserved by the Government of the United States, which is responsible ultimately for every dollar that is in circulation.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I thank the Senator for that suggestion, and I see his point. However, is it thought necessary under this bill for the Treasury to take over the gold because the embargo on gold has not been effective?

Mr. BARKLEY. No; I do not say that; I would not say it has been ineffective. I think in the main it has been effective; but if the gold ought not to be in such hands as without any corruption or any collusion or any unpatriotic motive on the part of anybody it can slip out of our country, then the title and possession of it ought to be at a place where that cannot happen, because I believe—and there are many people who disagree with me and I do not claim to be an expert especially with respect to money—that we have reached a time in the history of the world where there is not enough gold in the world to do the business of the world. There is only about $11,000,000,000 worth of gold in the entire world and France and the United States own and possess today over $8,000,000,000 of it. We have over $4,000,000,000 of gold and France has over $4,000,000,000. There is probably a maldistribution of the monetary gold of the world. I do not know just how that maldistribution can be corrected, but I believe that when we consider the increase in population throughout the world the increase in business in the world, the increase in international transactions, which represent international trade and commerce, which in turn represent prosperity in every country that is an exporting nation, there is not enough gold in existence to afford a sufficient basis under present conditions for the circulating money of the world.

Therefore, whatever gold there is ought to be preserved. If we are to continue to remain a worshipper of the golden fetish as the foundation of our money, then we ought to possess it and control it and determine who shall have it and under what circumstances. So I think that from the psychological standpoint, in addition to the practical benefits, that it will be greatly beneficial to the people of the United States in increasing their permanent confidence in the stability of our currency and in the ability of the Government to control it. I do not know whether or not that answers the Senator's question.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I have been enlightened, and I am very grateful to the Senator from Kentucky. As I understand him, then, Mr. President, there are several benefits to come from the enactment of this bill. One is that we are going to have a stabilization fund so that we can counteract attacks by foreign governments and foreign banks upon our currency through the medium of foreign exchange. Then we are going to take out of the banks the gold and put it in the Treasury, because the Senator thinks that will have a good psychological effect and help to restore confidence. If the committee and the Senator are correct in that view, then I would be inclined to believe that it will have some effect upon the business of the country because our business is based upon credit, and the foundation of credit is confidence, and if we can restore confidence, I am inclined to believe our credit system will begin to function. Now is there any other benefit to be derived from the passage of this bill?

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator, in other words, is seeking a bill of particulars. I appreciate the Senator's sincerity in seeking information and enlightenment, and I am sorry that I am such a poor reed upon which he may rely.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I think the Senator is doing very well.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not know that if I were required to prove it I could do so——

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I do not ask the Senator to prove it.

Mr. BARKLEY. Any more than I can prove why I believe in the Christian religion, but I do believe in it; it is just one of those intangible things that we cannot prove by any experience or knowledge of our own; but I do believe, as I said awhile ago, that over a period of time, affording opportunity for the alchemy to begin to work, there will be a gradual increase in the price of commodities. There has been an increase in the price of commodities as a whole in the United States domestically since the dollar began to decline in exchange value.

I do not think there is any doubt about that, although it has not declined in exchange value to the extent to which it may be possible to devaluate under this bill. Without any such devaluation it has now gone down in foreign-exchange value, which measures, of course, its value in international transactions which have a profound effect upon domestic prices, such as the price of cotton and wheat and many other commodities that sell upon the world market; and there has been a gradual increase in the price of domestic products in this country since the dollar began to decline, and that increase in price has gone on and probably been accelerated to some extent since October, when the gold-purchasing operation was begun.

I realize how difficult it is for the average man to understand the economics of the gold-purchasing program which has been carried on by the Government since October. A man met me on the street one day and said, "How do you decrease the value of the American dollar if you pay for the gold that goes into it?" It is perfectly easy to understand how a man would get confused about that matter, but, of course, he overlooked the fact that the gold in the dollar is valued at $20.60 an ounce in the United States, and that the higher the price of the raw gold in the American dollar, the lower by comparison becomes the value of the dollar as a medium of exchange—not necessarily the physical gold in the dollar, but the gold as a symbol, which, after all, is what it is. It is the medium by which I sell my horse. Instead of taking my horse to the Senator from Minnesota and swapping it for his cow, I sell my horse for dollars and take them to the Senator from Minnesota and buy his cow with them.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Kentucky a question?

Mr. BARKLEY. Certainly.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator spoke of the value of the dollar in foreign exchange. As to exportable crops or any exportable surplus here, does not the international dollar immediately fix the value of those commodities?

Mr. BARKLEY. Absolutely.

Mr. CONNALLY. As to the domestic trade there is always a lag; that is, it takes the domestic dollar some time to catch up with the foreign-exchange dollar?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes; but the foreign-exchange dollar is up at once as soon as there is an international transaction.

Mr. CONNALLY. Certainly, and that is why I say, as to any export commodity that we ship abroad that the international dollar immediately lifts the domestic dollar to its level as to those commodities.

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes; because as to all commodities where we have an exportable surplus, the price is fixed for the domestic product according to the world price and then automatically the domestic dollar goes up with the international dollar.

Mr. CONNALLY. In other words, unless the domestic price goes up to the foreign price, the goods would stay here instead of being exported?

Mr. BARKLEY. Certainly.

Mr. CONNALLY. The export market being higher and worth more in our money, the domestic market has to come up to its level or force us to keep the product here?

Mr. BARKLEY. That is true.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I merely want to remind the Senator from Kentucky that farm commodities which have increased in price are commodities which have a Government subsidy in one form or another. Hogs, cattle, and dairy products which have not had the benefit of a Government subsidy are lower or were a few weeks ago than they have been for more than 40 years. What puzzles me is how devaluing the dollar would raise prices domestically in the United States. Those prices should have gone up, but instead of that they have constantly gone down.

Mr. BARKLEY. I think the Senator and all of us have to keep in mind that the artificial methods, by which the prices of certain basic crops that were carried in our Agricultural Adjustment Act have been stimulated, were not intended as a permanent remedy for agriculture. They were intended as an emergency measure to peg, at least in some degree, the price, not only of the basic crops which were covered in that act, but to increase them pending the arrival of the time when the normal processes of consumption and trade and demand throughout the world, including the United States, would come in and substitute themselves for the artificial respiration which has been injected into the lungs of agriculture by those processes.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Kentucky a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. BARKLEY. I shall be glad to answer the Senator's question if I can.

Mr. DILL. What changes does the bill make in the security that is behind the paper money that will be issued in the future?

Mr. BARKLEY. It makes no change at all so far as ordinary currency is concerned outside of Federal Reserve notes and Federal Reserve bank notes. We did not touch that subject. It makes a change in the security of Federal Reserve notes or Federal Reserve currency. The Senator probably was not in the Chamber when I undertook to explain it a while ago. At the present time the Federal Reserve banks may issue Federal Reserve currency based upon a minimum of 40-percent gold coverage and 60 percent of acceptable collateral. That 40 percent of gold coverage may be represented by gold or gold certificates. Nine hundred million dollars of that gold coverage today is represented by gold certificates that have been issued by the Treasury and are held by the Federal Reserve banks. The gold certificates are based upon gold bullion in the Treasury, like the silver certificates are based upon silver bullion in the Treasury.

The only difference is that the Federal Reserve banks can issue all their currency based upon gold certificates, which they could do even now, but which they never have done. There is no other difference at all.

Mr. DILL. The gold certificate is backed by gold?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes; the gold certificate is backed by gold in the Treasury, and that backs the certificate issued by the Federal Reserve banks.

Mr. DILL. There is nothing in the bill authorizing a greater degree of printing-press money?

Mr. BARKLEY. Absolutely not.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from Kentucky a question. The Senator has stated several times in the debate that the Federal Reserve banks issue Federal Reserve notes and Federal Reserve bank notes; that they are backed by 40 percent deposit of gold and the balance is backed by other securities. As I remember the act, the Senator is mistaken in his statement of that fact. I should like to find out whether he is right or whether I am right. The Federal Reserve banks, as I understand, issue two kinds of currency—Federal Reserve notes and Federal Reserve bank notes. Only one of those is backed by a deposit of gold. The other is backed by United States bonds.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is true. Let me read section 16 of the Federal Reserve Act, which I think might well be put in the RECORD at this point. Section 16 of the Federal Reserve Act reads as follows:

> Federal Reserve notes, to be issued at the discretion of the Federal Reserve Board for the purpose of making advances to Federal Reserve banks through the Federal Reserve agents as hereinafter set forth and for no other purpose, are hereby authorized.

Mr. NORRIS. There is no gold there?

Mr. BARKLEY. No. I continue reading:

> The said notes shall be obligations of the United States and shall be receivable by all national and member banks and Federal Reserve banks and for all taxes, customs, and other public dues. They shall be redeemed in gold on demand at the Treasury Department of the United States in the city of Washington, D.C., or in gold or lawful money at any Federal Reserve bank.

Mr. NORRIS. That does not change the fact that there is no gold deposit for their security.

Mr. GLASS. Oh, yes; that is repealed by this bill.

Mr. BARKLEY. It is repealed to the extent that they are not redeemable by gold in the Treasury.

Mr. NORRIS. That is not the point I am making. The Senator stated several times that the issues of currency by the Federal Reserve bank have as security for that money a 40-percent deposit of gold. That does not apply to all the issues of the Federal Reserve banks.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Federal Reserve notes are the notes that are based upon the 40-percent coverage of gold.

Mr. NORRIS. Then the Federal Reserve bank notes have no gold behind them.

Mr. BARKLEY. They are based upon Government obligations, somewhat after the fashion of the old national-bank currency.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. CAREY. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Kentucky how he accounts for the fact that the value of agricultural commodities, with the exception of tobacco, has gradually decreased since July, if devaluation of the dollar would increase the price of commodities.

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course, I do not concede that all agricultural commodities, with the exception of cotton, have gradually decreased in value. I do think that immediately upon the inauguration of the recovery program, after the 4th of March and after the adjournment of Congress, there was an injection of probably entirely too much confidence in the minds of the American people that the depression was all over, and they went too far, not only in the immediate increase in the price of commodities but also in the increase in the price of securities, which could not have been maintained and ought not to have been brought about. In that respect I think there has been a recession, due to the overactivity of the American people, not only in commodities but securities, brought about by this rather sudden and unexpected and, at least for a number of years, unusual feeling of exhilaration and confidence on the part of the American people. I think it was a perfectly natural process which has corrected itself.

Mr. CAREY. How does the Senator account for the steady decline in the prices of hogs with the agricultural adjustment program going on and the devaluation of the dollar? The price of hogs is decreasing daily.

Mr. BARKLEY. I think the price of hogs is not controlled so much by an international situation. Pork is more of a domestic product. While I think we do export some pork and other meats, it is undoubtedly true that it is brought about by a combination of things.

For instance, corn went up while hogs were going down. That is not the natural process. Corn and hogs usually go along together; but corn went up and hogs went down, which is somewhat of a reversal of the usual economic partnership, as we might say, of hogs and corn. There also was, and still is, a shortage in the purchasing power of the people who eat corn, who consume hog products; and there is also probably a failure to eliminate the surplus entirely, even with the Agricultural Department's program of shortening the unsalable surplus of hogs.

Of course, the purchase of pigs and of hogs by the Department of Agriculture did not destroy them.

Mr. CAREY. It destroyed 6,000,000 of them.

Mr. BARKLEY. It prevented their growth into a larger supply of meats, but that food had to be consumed by somebody in this country. It had to be gotten off the market. It had to be gotten out of the smokehouses. It had to be gotten out of the refrigeration plants; and the process of consuming a surplus of hog meat, even under a program where a department of the Government is undertaking to shorten the future supply by a premature slaughter of hogs, could not be expected to take effect immediately. I think in all probability there is still an unpurchasable surplus of hog meat in the United States, to which the lessening of purchasing power as a whole, and the temporary glutting of the markets, it may be, by the hogs slaughtered by the Government, has made a decided contribution.

That is only a theory of mine. I would not offer that as an exact answer to the Senator's question, but I do think these considerations have entered into the matter.

Mr. CAREY. Then I understand the Senator to say that the purchase of gold has raised prices.

Mr. BARKLEY. On the whole, yes; I think it has.

Mr. CAREY. I think the figures show that this is not the case in agricultural commodities.

Mr. BARKLEY. Oh, in some agricultural commodities that is true. What the Senator says about hogs is true likewise about cattle. Cattle are low as compared to cotton and wheat and corn. There has been a decline in some agricultural products; but on the whole agricultural products have increased from 5 to 10 percent, as I am informed, since October, when this gold-purchasing process began.

Mr. CAREY. How much of a decrease has there been since July? Does the Senator happen to know?

Mr. BARKLEY. I think from the peak of July, which was brought about, I think, by the reasoning I indicated awhile ago, they are probably on the average between 5 and 10 percent below that.

Mr. CAREY. A little more than that, according to the figures available.

Mr. BARKLEY. I would not attempt to be exact about it; but I think we might as well in frankness admit that they are not as high as they were at the peak.

Wheat went up to a dollar and a quarter a bushel. Of course, that was at least in part an artificially stimulated increase in the price of wheat. Corn also went up. Then they fell back when, in July, it was recognized that we had gone too fast; and the reaction from that artificial stimulation or that overconfidence, whichever it may have been, or both, naturally dragged back with it not only the price of commodities but the price of securities.

Since July, however, there has been a gradual increase in the price of many of the products of agriculture, and there has been an increase in the price of securities. While I do not think that is any criterion by which to go, and I do not think that is a measure of prosperity, yet it does in some degree reflect the confidence or lack of confidence among the people. There has been a gradual increase in these prices until in some instances they have almost approximated the high prices of July.

Mr. CAREY. Does not the Senator think the prosperity of agriculture should be made a basis of prosperity?

Mr. BARKLEY. I certainly think that is true.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I am referring to the testimony of Professor Rogers on page 253. I understand that Professor Rogers is one of the sponsors of the bill.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not know that that is a correct statement. Professor Rogers stated that he did not draw the bill and that he did not participate in its drafting, but that he did sit in a conference and discuss the bill after it had been drawn, as I recall.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I did not intend to impute criminal instincts to the authorship.

Mr. BARKLEY. But in the sense that he favors the bill I suppose he might be regarded as its sponsor.

Mr. GLASS. In the sense that it reflects his theory, he is the author of the bill.

Mr. VANDENBERG. All right. I am challenged by the statement of Professor Rogers on page 253, about the middle of the page, that this operation—

> Would give * * * almost complete assurance of early uncontrollable—

That is the word I am emphasizing—> uncontrollable credit expansion.

Does the Senator agree with Professor Rogers that there is uncontrollable expansion in this bill?

Mr. BARKLEY. No; I do not, and I do not recall that the professor used the word "uncontrollable." I do not say that that is not correct; but these hearings were printed without an opportunity for any of the witnesses to revise or correct any stenographic mistakes. Whether he used the word "uncontrollable" or not I do not personally recall. I do not think this bill offers the opportunity for uncontrollable credit expansion in the sense that it never could be gotten under control or never could be limited. The witness who gave the most optimistic or pessimistic view of that, as the case may be—depending upon whether one wants it or does not want it, or believes in it or does not believe in it—only estimated that there might be a possible expansion of reserve credit to something in the neighborhood of $34,000,000,000.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Entirely aside from the mathematics, if this is not a typographical error, would the Senator from Kentucky find himself given any pause by the prophecy that uncontrollable expansion is involved in this bill?

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator from Virginia desires to answer the Senator's question.

Mr. GLASS. To be entirely fair, as I am sure the Senator from Michigan would want to be, if the Senator will pursue Professor Rogers' testimony a little further he will see there that Professor Rogers says also that the bill affords means of controlling the currency.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I do find that, Mr. President, and yet at the same time I find this unequivocal statement.

Mr. BARKLEY. On the same page again, if the Senator will read further, down near the bottom, Professor Rogers uses this language:

> Now, in just a brief summary—

Of what he had previously said—

> as an economic measure the bill before you provides, among other things—of course, this is not complete:
> First, a low gold value of the dollar, once devaluation is accomplished; second, increased definiteness as to the range of fluctuations in the gold value of the devalued dollars; third, a large gold profit with potential inflationary influence, once devaluation is accomplished; fourth, ample control over the use of this profit, so that any resulting inflation can be restricted.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Precisely. I have read that.

Mr. BARKLEY. So that leads me to the belief that the word "uncontrollable" there was either an inadvertence or a typographical error.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Then the Senator and I would agree that if "uncontrollable" is not a typographical error or an inadvertence, it raises a very severe challenge?

Mr. BARKLEY. Regardless of my respect for Professor Rogers—and I think he was one of the most intelligent and explicit witnesses before the committee—I would not agree with him that this bill offers an opportunity for uncontrollable expansion, and I do not believe he meant to say that.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Professor Rogers says, in the same quotation, that this uncontrollable phase is what the bill means to the well informed. I confess that I am not well informed, and I am assuming that the Senator from Kentucky is.

Mr. BARKLEY. I am afraid that is a rash assumption.

Mr. VANDENBERG. At least I am assuming that Professor Rogers is.

Mr. BARKLEY. I rather think he is.

Mr. VANDENBERG. And I should like very much to know whether he means what he says.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, General Johnson having pronounced all Senators who disagree with his methods of extricating the Nation from the depression to be dialecticians, I hesitate to get on my feet again simply to say that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] is a wonderful psychologist when he assumes that the American people are going to have more confidence in an irredeemable currency than they have had, or might hereafter have, in a currency that is redeemable. That, I understand, is his attitude.

There is no earthly mistake about the fact that this bill provides an irredeemable currency. The fact of the matter is that every Treasury note issued and every Federal Reserve note issued has a lie printed on its face right now—every one of them.

The bill that I have in my hand is not $20. It is a mere promise to pay $20. The fact that it is a promise to pay is conclusive evidence that it is not $20. It says, "The United States of America will pay to the bearer on demand $20", meaning, of course, $20 in gold, because that was the standard upon which we did business. But if I were to take that note to the Treasury where it is redeemable in gold, according to its face, they would not give me any gold. Would it increase my confidence in the stability of the currency of the country to find that this bill has stated on its face a lie, that the Government will not do what the note issued says it will do? I should think that that would decrease, that that would impair, if eventually it would not destroy, the confidence of the plain people, who do not understand all of these statistics, and all of this diversity of technical view. It did do so right after the Civil War. I would not tell how old I am if others had not already told it. I do not put it in the congressional biography any more, but I am old enough to know when the currency of the United States was worth 34 cents on the dollar, and that was all it was worth. We did not call it a dollar; we called the money "shin plasters", and it is my considered judgment that if we proceed with many more of these vagaries and these experiments, the money in the pockets of the American people, their currency, will be worth about what the currency was worth in the post Civil War period, when the Government was issuing currency.

Either later in the day, if I am physically able, or, if the matter goes over until tomorrow and I am physically able, at that time, I want to address myself, as briefly as possible, without incurring the characterization of "dialectician", to those amendments of the bill which were adopted in the Committee on Banking and Currency by a vote of 12 to 8.

I shall not discuss other prearranged and predestined aspects of the case. I know that the gold dollar, by an utterly invalid and illegal process, for which no human being can find a rational excuse or legal justification, has been devalued abroad, and I know perfectly well that it is going to be devalued at home, and I am not going to waste my time and strength in protesting against it.

Nor am I going to waste any time in protesting any further against the appropriation by the Government of the United States of nearly $4,000,000,000 of gold, not $1 of which it ever lifted its little finger to honestly acquire. Every dollar of it was acquired through the banking skill and the acumen of 16,000 banks throughout this country in their daily, current transactions with their patrons, every dollar of it.

Mr. President, the stockholders of these banks, who are persons, just as much persons as you or I, took the double liability risk in the operation of these banks. The Federal Reserve banks paid to the Government an enormous franchise tax during the period in which they acquired this gold, and, as I have said and now repeat, the Government never lifted its little finger to acquire one penny of that gold, either by the exercise of the governmental mind, or by incurring any governmental risk. Nevertheless, it is going to be seized.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator suffer an interruption?

Mr. GLASS. Certainly.

Mr. KING. Is there any way of determining what part of this amount that is to be seized was contributed to the banks as deposit capital at the organization of those banks, and how much has resulted from the operation of the banks, from their earnings, profits, and so forth?

Mr. GLASS. All of it has resulted from the capital supplied by the member banks, which means capital supplied by the stockholders of the member banks.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield right there?

Mr. GLASS. If the Senator will just let me answer the question of the Senator from Utah, I will yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I thought the Senator had concluded his answer.

Mr. GLASS. The remainder was acquired through the banking activities of the Federal Reserve banks, in connection with the member banks, a large part of it by the open-market operations of the Federal Reserve banks themselves.

Now I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. I want to inquire of the Senator whether it is not true that there never has been more than $160,000,000 actually paid into the capital of the Federal Reserve banks by the member banks?

Mr. GLASS. All the capital of the Federal Reserve banks has been paid in by the member banks.

Mr. BARKLEY. The original act provided that half of it should be paid at a certain time and the other half paid upon call; and they have never called for the other half, have they?

Mr. GLASS. No; because the system was so successful that they did not need to call for the other half.

Mr. BARKLEY. As a matter of fact, the $160,000,000 represented by what they paid in represents all that they have paid in to the capital of these banks so far?

Mr. GLASS. They have paid all the capital in, and all the balance represents the accretions over a period of nearly a quarter of a century of banking activities; but the Government itself never contributed a penny toward the establishment of these banks, and has never taken any of the risks involved in the banking transactions over that period.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the Senator yield again?

Mr. GLASS. Yes; except that I am afraid my dear friend will come under General Johnson's characterization of "dialectician" if he keeps on interrupting me. [Laughter.]

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not want to interrupt the Senator if he does not desire to be interrupted.

Mr. GLASS. I do not object at all.

Mr. BARKLEY. I wanted to inquire of the Senator whether any of this accretion to which he refers grows out of the fact that Congress amended the law after the original Federal Reserve Act was passed, which provided that after a 6-percent dividend was paid to the stockholders of banks represented in the Federal Reserve System, all profits over and above that should go into the Treasury of the United States, which was subsequently amended so as to provide that only a part of the profits should go into the Treasury, and then later amended so that none of the profits of the Federal Reserve System should go into the Treasury of the United States, as was originally contemplated in the act when passed by Congress.

Mr. GLASS. That amendment was adopted about 6 months ago, and has not had any effect at all.

Mr. BARKLEY. The first amendment was not adopted 6 months ago.

Mr. GLASS. Oh, no; but what is a Federal Reserve bank? Some Senators speak of a Federal Reserve bank as if it were a money-making institution for selfish purposes. It is not that at all. A Federal Reserve bank is an institution designed to respond to the current requirements of commerce and industry and agriculture. That is all it is. If its reserve holdings today were double what they are, that condition would be of no particular advantage for selfish purposes to any group of persons in the world. It would simply mean that the Federal Reserve banks were doubly equipped to respond to the requirements of commence, industry, and agriculture, and, as a corollary of that, the member banks could more readily secure generous accommodations at the Federal Reserve banks.

That, Mr. President, is one reason why Owen D. Young and every other experienced banker and highly reputable political economist who appeared before the committee insisted upon leaving the gold with the Federal Reserve banks.

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] asked a pertinent question, and one which, if not designed to enlighten the plain people of the country, should certainly serve to inform them. They are thinking that this bill, if enacted into law, will necessarily increase the volume of currency outstanding. It will not necessarily increase it to the extent of a single dollar.

I want the miscalled "profit", as well as the gold principal, in the hands of the Federal Reserve banks. Why? Because, if we are going into this devaluation business it would twice over enable the Federal Reserve banks more readily and at a lower interest charge to respond to the requirements of business.

Is any of this gold profit to be used by the Treasury to start its printing presses? It is not needed for that purpose. If we are going to start a printing press, why not just start it by itself? What is the use of having any gold behind the currency just issued when the currency is irredeemable in gold, and when, if anyone is found with a gold certificate on his person, he will be sent to jail?

We are told it is not designed that the Secretary of the Treasury shall issue any currency against this gold; but if we leave it in the Federal Reserve banks where it now properly belongs, because by them it was earned, and then devalue it, we simply increase twofold, as I have said, their ability to respond to the requirements of commerce, industry, and agriculture.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GLASS. I will yield in a second.

The Federal Reserve banks are not to be regarded as institutions with hoofs and horns. I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that over the period of more than 20 years of their existence the discount rate in this country has materially been reduced, and sometimes the prevalent discount rate has been so low as to be absolutely ridiculous. For a period of time after the frightful crash in 1929 the discount rate at the New York bank went down to 1 percent; and many practical bankers and experienced economists contend to this day that it was largely because of the low rediscount rate tendered by these banks to the business of the country that excessive speculation was brought about and the crash was caused.

I now yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator whether this measure will not increase the circulating medium, or increase the opportunities for expanded credit; and if we have sufficient gold now upon which to base a larger quantity of circulating medium, is there any other reason for this measure than to take away from the Federal Reserve the gold which they have earned and transfer it to the Government?

Mr. GLASS. And realize a profit by devaluation?

Mr. KING. What is the advantage of devaluation?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Senator from Virginia said that this bill would not necessarily increase the volume of currency; but under the terms of the bill the authorities could increase the volume of business; could they not?

Mr. GLASS. The Secretary of the Treasury could; yes. Oh, yes; he could.

Mr. BORAH. In other words, we leave it purely discretionary with the Department, as we did last spring?

Mr. GLASS. Oh, absolutely discretionary with the Department, regardless of what may be the business demands of the country.

The Senator from Utah asked me my opinion as to devaluation. I am such a temperate person that I cannot adequately express my opinion of devaluation or of the seizure of the gold; and while it might please me to say, and might please or amuse some Senators to have me say, what I think of it, I should rather refrain from saying more than I have said as to what I think of it.

While I am talking I suppose I might as well keep on to a conclusion and go to bed.

Mr. President, your Committee on Banking and Currency, after hearing all the witnesses who appeared before it, made certain amendments to the bill. There is one outstanding, significant fact in connection with the hearings, which is that with the exception of only two witnesses, besides one individual whose name I have forgotten, and who read a little essay 2 or 3 minutes long—the Senator from Kentucky remembers his name; I do not care to put it in the RECORD—with the exception of the two gentlemen whose theory is responsible for the bill, every witness we had, banker, Federal Reserve official, or political economist, found fault with this bill as drawn.

When I ventured to remark upon that singular circumstance, it was replied that it depended upon who summoned the witnesses. Well, I do not know who summoned the witnesses. I know it was within the right and province of any member of the committee to suggest witnesses, and if the proponents of this bill knew no other persons of competent authority who would testify in behalf of the bill except the two who did testify, Professor Warren and Professor Rogers, certainly that fault could not be imputed to those who disagreed with the bill.

As to the amendments, one of them places a time limit within which the President may proceed to devalue the dollar. The other, of a kindred nature, places a time limit on the use of the $2,000,000,000 so-called "stabilization fund." I have been told—I do not venture to assert it of my own knowledge—that the administration has no particular objection to those two extremely important modifications of the bill, as I think. The import of them readily appears from a mere statement of their nature.

The other amendment is as to the use of the stabilization fund; whether it shall be administered by the Secretary of the Treasury alone and arbitrarily or whether it shall be administered by a board composed of the Secretary of the Treasury, the Governor of the Federal Reserve bank, the Comptroller of the Currency and two members to be appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

The distinguished Chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee, I guess, for I could not hear him, rather opposed that amendment in his presentation of the case to the Senate. It is said it is very essential for the authority to be vested alone in the Secretary of the Treasury so that he may act quickly, expeditiously, as the requirements of the case may be. I call attention to the fact that the equalization fund of Great Britain is administered by a board of 3 experienced persons; 3 persons who are career men; 3 persons who intimately know foreign exchange in all its aspects; and nobody ever ventured to suggest that that board of 3 persons might be called a town meeting.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Virginia yield there?

Mr. GLASS. I will.

Mr. BARKLEY. Those three persons, however, are members of the Treasury Department of Great Britain. There is no person upon that board from the outside.

Mr. GLASS. Those persons, as I have stated, are career men, tested and experienced in foreign-exchange transactions, in intimate intercourse with the Bank of England, and are men who have knowledge of what they are doing.

Our Secretary of the Treasury is a most estimable young gentleman, worthy, patient, amiable, lovable, without a day's experience as a banker, and, so far as I have been able to ascertain, without any knowledge of foreign exchange. To put activities of this tremendous importance exclusively in the hands of one man, I think, is a mistake, and the committee thought it was a mistake.

Moreover, it was said officially in the House of Commons that the stabilization fund of Great Britain was not used for the purpose of degrading the English pound, was not used for the purpose for which avowedly the stabilization fund which we are establishing is proposed to be used. As to that I do not know; I do not think any of us know.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. GLASS. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. What are the purposes for which the alleged large stabilization fund in Great Britain is used?

Mr. GLASS. I am told it is used to prevent a too wide fluctuation of the pound in domestic transactions.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. What, then, is the necessity for the equivalent of $1,800,000,000 in that fund if its use is limited to the purposes just stated?

Mr. GLASS. Well, that question may be answered in the House of Commons. I do not pretend to know. I simply know that it was definitely and specifically denied in the House of Commons that it was used for the purposes for which it is proposed to use this fund.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I have absolute confidence, of course, in the integrity of any statement the Senator from Virginia makes as to a fact; and if he says he knows the fact, I think his statement is entirely credible.

Mr. GLASS. On the contrary, I have said I did not know the fact.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. That was the purpose of my inquiry, to show that the Senator did not know for what purpose the English fund is used.

Mr. GLASS. Had the Senator done me the honor to have listened to me he would have known that I so stated.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. O Mr. President, the Senator cannot put me in that light. I think I did do the Senator the honor—I did myself the honor—to listen to what the Senator was saying; and the sole significance of the remarks of the Senator, the implication of his remarks, is that we are creating an equalization fund which will be used in a different manner from the large fund that is in the hands of British authorities for some purpose the Senator admits he cannot define for us.

Mr. GLASS. We are setting up a stabilization fund, as I infer from the whole proceedings of our committee, for the purpose of compelling foreign nations to join with us in the stabilization of foreign exchange, and the testimony before us by foreign-exchange experts of international reputation was that it would not do that but, quite the contrary, that it would create friction and defer the stabilization of foreign exchange.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield there?

Mr. GLASS. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator a moment ago said that the object of the British stabilization fund was to stabilize the value of the pound in domestic transactions.

Mr. GLASS. No; I did not state that. I said that that was stated in the British House of Commons.

Mr. BARKLEY. As evidence that that could not be accurate, I point to the fact that the $1,800,000,000 British stabilization fund is required to be in gold, which would not be necessary if it only applied to domestic consumption.

Mr. GLASS. Whatever may be the purpose of the stabilization fund, the point I am now discussing is the decision of the Banking and Currency Committee, by a vote of 12 to 8, that these activities should not be confided to a single person, to wit, to the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. GLASS. Yes.

Mr. FLETCHER. The fact is, however, that the absolute control of the British equalization fund is vested solely in the British treasury. Is not that true?

Mr. GLASS. It is vested in a board of three exchange experts.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, in that connection, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. GLASS. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Does the Senator know or can it be stated who constitutes the board to which he refers?

Mr. GLASS. No; I do not know the names of the persons who constitute the board.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Does the Senator know the official positions they hold in the Government?

Mr. GLASS. No; I have just been told, and I state upon what I consider trustworthy authority that they are three persons of long experience tested in the activities of exchange.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, before the Senator leaves the point he has just been discussing I should like to ask him if the purpose of our Government has not been for some time to beat down—and I use the expression so often seen in the newspapers—the value of the American dollar in foreign exchange? I am asking for information. I ask whether anything was elicited in the hearings or anything is indicated to be the purpose of the bill to continue the policy, if that is behind the policy, of beating down the value of the American dollar in the markets of the world?

Mr. GLASS. I can only assume that that is the purpose of the bill, though one of the witnesses, a man of great ability, stated to the committee that he believes the primary purpose of the bill is to seize the profits of devaluation for the Treasury.

Mr. KING. May I ask the Senator one more question?

Mr. GLASS. Yes.

Mr. KING. Was there anything to indicate during the testimony, or is there anything in the bill to indicate that the $2,000,000,000 so-called "stabilization fund" will not be used in whole or in part for the purpose of beating down the American dollar in the markets of the world?

Mr. GLASS. I would say the purpose of it, as viewed and as might readily be assumed, is to beat down the American dollar, if the Secretary of the Treasury, in his judgment, should think that the American dollar ought to be beaten down. I cannot imagine what else it may be for unless Mr. Stewart, the foreign-exchange expert, may be right in his assumption that the primary purpose of the bill is to take over all the gold and get the profits for the Treasury.

But, after all, it is not a question of what Great Britain is doing or what any other nation is doing. As a matter of fact, no other civilized nation on the face of the globe has ever seized the gold of its central bank. Great Britain has never taken a dollar of the gold of the Bank of England. France has never taken a dollar of the gold of the Bank of France. Germany has never taken a dollar of gold of the Reichsbank. So far as I know, and I asked the question of the experts before the committee, no nation on earth has ever seized the gold of its central bank. But it is not a question so much of what other nations have done unless we propose to profit by their experience.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

Mr. GORE. Whatever be the purpose of the English stabilization fund—I understand it is to stabilize foreign exchanges in terms of the pound—I think the Senator from Kentucky is mistaken when he says the stabilization fund is made up of gold, because that contemplates, as I understand, about $1,800,000,000. England never had that much gold within her borders during her history. I think the high watermark, according to the last report I saw, was about $800,000,000. I do not know what it is at present.

Mr. GLASS. If we are going to take the example of other nations, Great Britain did not go off the gold standard until she was depleted of all her gold. She had not $20,000,000 of gold when she felt forced to go off the gold standard in a sense, though not in the sense that we are off the gold standard. We had 43 percent of the gold of the world when we went off the gold standard. Except the two Government experts, no man appeared before our committee who would venture to express the opinion that we should have gone off the gold standard, or at least that there was any necessity of our going off the gold standard.

But, as I have said, I am not going into these matters. I am not going into the matter of devaluation. I am not going into the matter of the seizure of the gold. I think those are practically accomplished facts, or will be pretty soon. I merely want, if I possibly can, to remedy some of the defects of the bill. One of them, I think and the committee thought, is the provision that gives the Secretary of the Treasury sole authority to handle the $2,000,000,000 stabilization fund. We thought it would be better committed to a board, assuming that there would be on the board somebody who understands foreign-exchange transactions.

There is one other amendment to the bill to which I might invite the attention of Senators. I do not know whether or not the chairman of the committee signified any opposition to that amendment, because I could not hear him well.

The bill purports to authorize the use of the $2,000,000,000 fund for the purpose of stabilizing the currency. It was suggested by several of the competent witnesses before the committee that the Secretary of the Treasury might use this fund for domestic transactions upon the mistaken belief that he was using it for the stabilization of foreign exchange.

Some substantial ground for that assumption was supplied by the fact that when the bill first came to us it provided that the Secretary of the Treasury might rediscount notes, buy bills of exchange, domestic or otherwise; he might do almost anything that even a member bank of the Federal Reserve System might do; and therefore the committee reported an amendment to that provision of the bill which says "for the sole purpose" of equalizing exchange.

Whether that amendment shall remain in or go out of the bill the Senate must decide; but before it reaches a decision I desire to call attention to the fact that unless that amendment shall remain in the bill we will be setting up the Secretary of the Treasury as a great central banker, with authority to go into the open market in competition with the open-market committee of the Federal Reserve banks and engage in all kinds of open-market transactions. Mr. Owen D. Young particularly emphasized that danger, saying that the open-market committee of the Federal Reserve banks might find itself in reverse activity to the activities of the Secretary of the Treasury. The Secretary of the Treasury might take the view that it was desirable to contract the currency. At the same time the open-market committee of the Federal Reserve banks might think there was necessity for an expansion of the currency; and there we would have a conflict between this one-man central banker and the Federal Reserve open-market committee.

Therefore I think it extremely important, and I may say authoritatively that the Federal Reserve bank officials think it extremely important, to preserve that amendment to the bill, so that the activities of the Secretary of the Treasury with this enormous sum of $2,000,000,000, or, rather, what used to be the enormous sum of $2,000,000,000—may be directed solely and only to stabilization of foreign exchange and not, upon the mere judgment of one man, be used for all kinds of banking activities.

I regret very much, Mr. President, that my physical condition is such that I do not feel that I could or should undertake a detailed discussion of the bill. I rose simply to comment upon the alterations made in the bill by the Banking and Currency Committee.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question before he takes his seat?

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Even if the final amendment to which the Senator adverts does remain in the bill, and the stabilization operations are thus confined to external activities, are there not still numerous activities which ought to call for liaison between the Federal Reserve System and the administration of this bill?

I am thinking of the advisability of this group administration of the fund. Are there not other situations in which liaison between the Federal Reserve System and the administrators of this fund is highly desirable and essential?

Mr. GLASS. To be fair, I should assume that there would be consultation and conference between the Treasury and the Federal Reserve authorities. Unhappily for the country, I think, the Federal Reserve System for 13 years has been made subject to the Treasury. That was very far from the intention of the proponents of the system. It was intended to be a commercial banking system, responsive to the requirements of business, commerce, industry, and agriculture, with agriculture preferred all the way through it. That is what it was intended to be; but for the last 13 years the system has been used as a football for the Treasury.

Every single, solitary issuance of Treasury securities or Federal bonds has not only been made through the mechanism of the Federal Reserve banks without any compensation whatsoever, but the Federal Reserve banks, shall I say have been compelled, or shall I say have been persuaded, not only to take a large part of these bond and security issues themselves, but to apportion practically all of it to the member banks under a system of coercion—nothing short of that—that compelled the member banks to take these bonds. Today nearly 50 percent of the outstanding bonds of the Government choke up the portfolios of the Federal Reserve banks themselves, or of the member banks of the Federal Reserve System, rendering them in that measure practically incapable of readily responding to the requirements of business.

That was never intended by the Congress, but it has been done; and I assume, in response to the question of the Senator from Michigan, that the Secretary of the Treasury in the administration of this fund will consult with the Federal Reserve authorities, or in any event will require the Federal Reserve authorities to consult with him.

I have no reason to think that the fund will be administered in any sort of sinister way. I think the Secretary of the Treasury—both the present Secretary of the Treasury any anybody who may become Secretary of the Treasury—if not possessing the business foresight to be effective, will at least want to be and endeavor to be; but it is my considered judgment that the administration of this fund should be confided to a board rather than to any one man. I do not believe any man on earth is infallible in financial matters at least; and I think, therefore, we ought to take the precaution to confide this authority to a board.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question, if I may.

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

Mr. KEAN. The Senator having been a distinguished Secretary of the Treasury, I should like to ask him whether, when he was in the Treasury, there were many experts on foreign exchange in the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. GLASS. I accept the Senator's characterization of me, with the omission of the "distinguished" part of it. We had a man in the Treasury who was said to be an expert on foreign exchange and said not to be. Some competent persons appraised him as a fairly good expert, and I have heard other exceedingly competent bankers say that he did not know anything about the subject.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. GLASS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. At the time referred to by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN] were there difficult or acute problems before the Treasury Department pertaining to foreign exchange?

Mr. GLASS. I do not recall that there were.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Of course, the present condition and the prospective condition would prompt anyone charged with the responsibility of administering this stabilization fund to get the best advice obtainable from whatever source, and I apprehend that on the board which some are so urgently insisting upon there is no expert of exceptional qualifications relating to foreign exchange. I do not know that the Comptroller of the Currency, or, for that matter, the Governor of the Federal Reserve Board, has any very great knowledge of this subject; but the point is that whoever discharges the function will necessarily get the best information and advice that is obtainable, and, in my judgment, it would not come from this board of five or any other board. May I add that the Senator's reference to a town meeting was probably prompted by what I myself said yesterday.

Mr. GLASS. Oh, no.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I merely wish to reinforce the statement that a board consisting of five members, constituted as this board is proposed to be, might be compared to a town meeting.

Mr. GLASS. Of course, the Senator and I are in disagreement about that. I do not even think that the Federal Reserve Board, composed of eight members, might accurately be characterized as a town meeting. I want to say, however, that I think the Senator from Arkansas is mistaken in rather—well, I will not say disparaging the capabilities of the Governor of the Federal Reserve Board——

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Will the Senator permit me right there?

Mr. GLASS. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. In saying that neither the Governor of the Federal Reserve Board nor the Comptroller of the Currency is an expert on foreign exchange, I no more disparage them than the Senator from Virgina has himself disparaged the Secretary of the Treasury by making the same characterization of his ability in reference to exchange.

Mr. GLASS. The Governor of the Federal Reserve Board is an experienced banker, and has developed into one of the best Governors the Federal Reserve Board has ever had.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me further?

Mr. GLASS. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. While I do not mean to disparage the Governor of the Federal Reserve Board, I have never understood that he is, or that he is claimed to be, an expert in the matter of foreign exchange.

Mr. GLASS. I would not class him as an expert in foreign exchange along with men like Stewart and others, but he is a very level-headed man.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I might add a comment in reference to the purpose of the committee. The very things which have been suggested by the Senator from Arkansas were in the minds of the committee, that there was no expert in foreign exchange at the head of any of these boards, and therefore the committee was providing for two additional men, who should be appointed, with the idea that the President of the United States should appoint them, and that he was the very best qualified to pick them. Their appointments were made subject to confirmation by the Senate of the United States, which the committee thought might tend to insure obtaining experts upon that very subject.

Mr. GLASS. And we hoped and assumed that the President would pick experts in foreign exchange.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, will the Senator from Virginia yield to me for a question?

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

Mr. BYRNES. The Senator from Virginia is not under the impression that the British act provides for a board of three to handle the equalization account of Great Britain, is he?

Mr. GLASS. Yes.

Mr. BYRNES. Would I divert the Senator if I read to him from a copy of the act, which I have in my hand?

Mr. GLASS. No; the Senator would not divert me, but might enlighten me.

Mr. BYRNES. I would hope to enlighten the Senator, and I trust I will not divert him.

Mr. GLASS. I have said all along that I should like to know the exact facts.

Mr. BYRNES. I read from section 1, part 4, of the act:

> There shall be established an account, to be called the "exchange equalization account", which shall be under the control of the treasury and shall be used for the purpose specified in this part of this act.

The act then sets forth the purposes, giving to the treasury absolute power to handle the fund in any way possible to this extent in section 4:

> There shall be issued to the account out of the consolidated fund, or the growing produce thereof, at such times and in such manner as the treasury may direct, such sums, not exceeding in the aggregate 150,000,000 pounds, as the treasury may determine, and all the assets of the exchange account shall be transferred to the account at such time as the treasury may direct.

I may say to the Senator that there is no provision restricting in any way the activities of the treasury, or providing for the appointment of any career men, or of any employee.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, that does not impeach in the slightest degree what I regard as my authoritative information—that that fund is administered by three tested career men in the Treasury Department of Great Britain, who know exchange matters in all of their phases. So I am glad of the diversion and regret that I did not get more information.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, in view of some of the observations made by the Senator from Virginia, I want to make brief reference to matters which he discussed, and I begin by referring to his statement that we are about to flood this country with "irredeemable currency", practically without any base or foundation or support.

I feel it worth while to call attention to the money in circulation today in the United States and its characteristics. There are gold certificates, which, until the recall of gold bullion or coin by the United States Government, were redeemable in gold by any bank in the country. The gold certificates merely represent in convenient form, dollar for dollar, the actual coin that rests in the Treasury of the United States to back them up. Approximately $232,000,000 of these gold certificates were in circulation on September 30, 1933, and represented in large part hoarded money. That is one kind of money we have in this country.

There is the silver certificate, convenience money, backed 100 percent by silver dollars in the Treasury of the United States, and redeemable in silver dollars. Approximately $385,000,000 of these certificates were in circulation on September 30, 1933.

There is the national-bank note, secured by bonds of the United States deposited with the Treasury of the United States, and redeemable in lawful money at the Treasury, or at the bank of issue. That is another kind of currency. This note is backed by United States Government bonds and not coin or bullion, and is redeemable in other notes of issue, and redeemable in any lawful money, not necessarily gold or silver. A 5-percent fund is maintained in lawful money for the redemption of notes of this character.

The national-bank note had no redemption feature from 1863 to 1879. There are over $900,000,000 worth of that type of money in circulation and $37,000,000 only of lawful money deposited for their redemption. This is sound money because of its redemption feature. That is another kind of money.

Then there is the Federal Reserve note which Senators have been discussing today. Such notes are an obligation of the Government of the United States, and a first lien on all the assets of the issuing Federal Reserve bank. They are secured, through a deposit with the Federal Reserve agent, by gold and by discounted obligations or notes, or perhaps some Government bonds. There must be a gold reserve of at least 40 percent. Nearly $3,000,000,000 of these notes were in circulation on September 30, 1933. The Government held against these notes $1,700,000,000 in gold and the banks held $800,000,000 in gold. There could have been issued $6,250,000,000 of these notes on that day under existing law.

Then there is the United States note. Approximately $280,000,000 of these are in circulation and $64,000,000 additional lie in the banks. These are the greenbacks we hear mentioned. They are secured by a gold reserve of $156,000,000 against a total issue of $350,000,000.

The next is the Treasury note of 1890. Approximately $1,000,000 of these notes are in circulation. They are secured dollar for dollar by the standard silver dollars being held in the Treasury, and these notes are being canceled and retired upon their receipt. They represent largely hoarded money.

Next come the Federal Reserve bank notes. One hundred and fifty-six million dollars of these are in circulation. They are secured by bonds of the United States or by commercial paper. These bank notes may be issued based on bonds or on eligible paper as security.

There is no question about the soundness of United States money. The fact remains, however, that the gold certificate has behind it gold to the extent of 100 percent and dollar for dollar in value. It represents less than 5 percent of our currency volume, and has been recalled.

Under the act of 1933 we made all currency of the United States legal tender, so that for all purposes of currency all the money we have in circulation is absolutely sound and can be used for all purposes for which any money can be used.

The Treasury notes of 1890, backed by silver dollars, pass concurrently and at par with the gold certificate. They represent but a fraction of 1 percent of the volume of our currency.

The silver certificates are secured 100 percent by silver dollars and are redeemable in silver dollars. Though that silver is demonetized the silver dollar and the silver certificate pass at full face value always, because of the redemption feature and the faith and credit of the Government which issues the money. These silver certificates represent less than 8 percent of the money in circulation.

The United States notes, secured by 45 percent only of gold, pass equally with the gold certificates or silver certificates, because they have the redemption feature distinguishing them from the German printing-press paper money or assignats. These United States notes represent about 7 percent of our currency.

The Federal Reserve notes or the Federal Reserve bank notes, necessarily backed by but 40 percent of gold and by commercial paper or Government bonds, likewise pass at par always with gold itself. They today represent about 60 percent of our currency.

The national bank notes secured by Government bonds meet with no resistance nor are they ever discounted, for they have behind them a prior lien on the assets of the bank issuing them and likewise on the Government bonds. Yet they are actually backed by approximately only a 4-percent redemption fund and constitute about 16 percent of our currency volume.

The Federal Reserve bank notes do not necessarily have one dollar in gold behind them. United States bonds and commercial paper suffice to keep at par $156,000,000 of these notes.

No two of the moneys enumerated have the identical security behind them. All pass at par to the point that not one man in a thousand distinguishes the varying forms of currency. All represent sound money.

In the reform of our monetary system the base money can be gold or silver bullion, against which two and one-half times its volume may be safely issued in sound money to provide an adequate currency.

So much for the currency as it exists. The gold certificates that are proposed to be issued under the terms of the bill are founded upon gold bullion dollar for dollar.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GEORGE in the chair). Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. KEAN. We repudiate the gold certificates that are outstanding at the present time, do we not?

Mr. FLETCHER. They are now payable in lawful money. They have gold back of them.

Mr. KEAN. If the value of an ounce of silver should go above par, I suppose we would repudiate the silver certificates also, would we not?

Mr. FLETCHER. The silver certificates have dollar for dollar in silver behind them.

Mr. KEAN. Perhaps.

Mr. FLETCHER. They have now.

Mr. KEAN. But if silver should go up, we probably would repudiate the silver dollars also?

Mr. FLETCHER. We are not repudiating anything. I am amazed to hear the Senator from New Jersey or any other Senator say that the gold certificates are a lie, and that there is nothing solid behind them at all. They are absolutely based upon gold bullion. Does the Senator wish to go around with his pockets full of gold bullion? No one uses gold bullion. If money can be used which has behind it gold value, dollar for dollar, that is the kind of money the people ought to have, and that is the kind the people get.

Mr. KEAN. Can I get the gold if I present a gold certificate?

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator can get lawful money of the United States, which is based upon that gold.

Mr. KEAN. But if I want the gold, can I get it?

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator cannot get it if he wants it.

Mr. FLETCHER. What better money can the Senator get? The Senator ought to be willing to pay a premium to get paper money, instead of being obliged to be burdened by carrying the actual gold.

The Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] alluded to the Federal Reserve System being interfered with by this measure. He spoke of the Federal Reserve banks having rendered such great and altruistic public service to the country, and that all they have done has been done through their own skill and their own genius and their own wisdom; that the Federal Reserve banks built up this great system; that the Government never did anything for them; that the Government never contributed in any degree whatever to the success of the Federal Reserve System.

Do they owe nothing at all to the Government? Mr. President, the Senator from Virginia overlooks the outstanding fact that the Government created the System and the Government gave these banks the power and the authority to issue currency. I am not throwing any stones at the Federal Reserve System. I have been a friend of the System; but how would they ever have succeeded in doing the work they have done if it were not for the Government? They owe to the Government of the United States not only their existence but the basis of all the profit and wealth they have ever accumulated, because the Government gave them the power to issue money.

Would anyone want anything more than that? Would anyone want anything more than authority granted by the Government to issue currency? That is what these banks have. It is because of that authority, because of that power, because of what the Government has done for them, that they have been able to accumulate gold and other profits. I do not blame them. I praise them for what they have accomplished; but it is inconceivable to me how anyone can say that they have done it on their own initiative, and by reason of their own ability, and by reason of their own money, without any help whatever from the Federal Government, and that the Government has been simply using them as a "football."

The Federal Reserve banks owe their power, they owe their strength, they owe their wealth, they owe everything to what the Government gave them in the beginning. As I said before, I do not criticize the Federal Reserve banks or the Federal Reserve System. I have always been a friend of theirs; but they are not the sole strength and salvation of this country or of our currency.

The proposed bill deprives the banks of nothing. The gold they have in their possession as reserve is taken into the Treasury; and instead of the gold, and for all the uses to which the gold can be put, they hold the Treasury's gold certificates. They ought not to be allowed to make the profit, if there is a profit made by devaluation, because that profit arises by reason of the act of Congress, by reason of the act of the Government; not by reason of anything that the Federal Reserve System has ever done or accomplished.

I desire to say just a word or two in connection with the Federal Reserve System. That System is the system upon which the credit of the country is based. The Federal Reserve System, operating through the Federal Reserve banks and member banks, controls the credit of the country. It claims to do that, and it does that. The Federal Reserve banks constitute the great power of expansion and of contraction of credit, which means so much to the people of this country.

What did they do in 1929? Did they exercise that power, or did they exercise any judgment if, in exercising the power, they brought about the tremendous expansion and collapse of 1929? Why did they not see what was happening to this country when in October, 1929, in one day securities on the Stock Exchange of New York depreciated $29,000,000,000, and the year after, in October 1930, those securities depreciated $20,000,000,000 more? There was $49,000,000,000 of depreciation happening in New York alone at that time, when the Federal Reserve System had control of the credits of this country. Could they not have interfered to prevent that sort of expansion, that sort of final collapse and terrible disaster, that fell upon the country? They did not do it. I will give them credit for all the power and strength they have. There has been a time in the history of this country, however, when they did not measure up fully to the expectations or demands of the country.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I should like to have the judgment of the distinguished Chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency on the same question I submitted to the Senator from Kentucky, because I think it is rather important. At which place on page 253 of the committee hearings does he agree with Professor Rogers, where Professor Rogers says, upon the one hand, that under this new system "inflation can be restricted", or where Professor Rogers says, at another place on the same page that the system produces "complete assurance of early uncontrollable credit expansion"?

It cannot produce both. Which one is it that is going to be produced?

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not think there is any doubt but that it will be controlled; that is the main purpose of this proposed legislation—the control of the currency, the control of expansion, and the control of contraction. I do not think there is anything that will be achieved by this bill that will bring about what is called uncontrolled expansion or uncontrolled inflation.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Then the Senator disagrees with Professor Rogers at the top of the page and agrees with him at the bottom of the page?

Mr. FLETCHER. If that is the order in which the statements occur, I accept the Senator's version of it; I do not remember as to that; but I do remember Professor Rogers' statement on the stand, and I have no impression that he ever claimed that this measure would be disastrous in any of its possibilities in any future transactions or developments. He was supporting the bill, as I understood him; he is in favor of the bill.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I understood he partially wrote it, but would not the Senator himself find a challenge in the bill if it did contemplate—

Early uncontrollable credit expansion?

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes, I would; I do not believe in inflation; I never have believed in what is called "inflation"; reflation is a different thing. I believe in sufficient expansion; I believe in a sound money adequate to serve the purposes of the country.

Mr. VANDENBERG. What does the Senator say about this language which I find in the hearings?—

Early uncontrollable credit expansion.

Mr. FLETCHER. I should think that would be inflation.

Mr. VANDENBERG. That would be such inflation as the Senator would be opposed to, would it not?

Mr. FLETCHER. Certainly.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Yet that is the description ascribed to this bill by one of its authors.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think it is necessary to read the whole statement in order to understand fully what was meant by the witness.

Mr. VANDENBERG. After I read the whole statement I cannot understand any of it. [Laughter.]

Mr. McADOO. That may be the Senator's fault.

Mr. BARKLEY. That may not be the fault of Professor Rogers.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I submit it is when he disputes himself on the same page.

Mr. FLETCHER. Much is said about this measure involving uncontrollable inflation and of currency under it being worthless, representing promises that are never to be redeemed and as being of no value. I will ask the Senate to look at the bill at section 6, where it is expressly provided—

That gold certificates owned by the Federal Reserve banks shall be redeemed at such times and in such amounts as, in the judgment of the Secretary of the Treasury, are necessary to maintain the equal purchasing power of every kind of currency of the United States: And provided further, That the reserve for United States notes and for Treasury notes of 1890, and the security for gold certificates (including the gold certificates held in the Treasury for credits payable therein) shall be maintained in gold bullion equal to the dollar amounts required by law, and the reserve for Federal Reserve notes shall be maintained in gold certificates, or in credits payable in gold certificates maintained with the Treasurer of the United States under section 16 of the Federal Reserve Act, as heretofore and by this act amended.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Does the Senator, the chairman of the committee, believe with the Senator from Kentucky that the only way money can be put into circulation is through the Federal Reserve banks as it has been put in circulation in the past?

Mr. FLETCHER. No; I am claiming something different from that. I like the Federal Reserve banks but I do not think they are the only source of strength and power.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I did not make the statement the Senator from Minnesota ascribes to me. I said, so far as this bill is concerned, there is no change made in the method of issuing money.

Mr. FLETCHER. I agree to that.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. That is what I understood.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Federal Reserve banks will still have the power to issue currency on the same terms as they now issue it, based on gold. We will have gold certificates, however, which will take the place of the gold.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Can the Senator tell me whether there is any avenue or any way in this bill by which the currency can be inflated beyond control any more than under our present system under the Federal Reserve banks?

Mr. FLETCHER. No; I do not think this bill adds to the possibility of that sort of use of the powers of government.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. If there is any uncontrolled inflation here, I should like to know what it is, because I have not found it.

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not think there is any uncontrolled inflation in the bill. That is what I have said; I do not think the bill can be construed in that way.

Mr. President, I do not care to take up the time of the Senate further. I should like to get on with the bill and to have the first amendment of the committee acted on, if I may.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

ALCOHOLIC-BEVERAGE REGULATION IN THE DISTRICT (H.DOC. NO. 225)

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GEORGE in the chair) laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which was read, as follows:

To the Congress:

I have approved H.R. 6181, an act to control the manufacture, transportation, possession, and sale of alcoholic beverages in the District of Columbia.

Before approving this act of the Congress, I gave it careful personal study and referred it to the Attorney General of the United States and to the Federal Alcohol Control Director.

The Attorney General and the Director, in written reports given me on January 22, which I hereby transmit to the Congress, suggest the necessity of amendatory legislation. I respectfully request the Congress to give its consideration to the suggestions contained in their reports.

I prefer to approve the act now, in its present form, and to ask the Congress for amendatory legislation rather than delay putting it into effect by returning it to the Congress for amendment, meanwhile postponing approval.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 24, 1934.

[NOTE.—Reports accompanied similar message to the House of Representatives.]

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I ask that the message, with the accompanying papers, be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the message will be so referred.

UNITED STATES MONETARY SYSTEM

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 6976) to protect the currency system of the United States, to provide for the better use of the monetary gold stock of the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. CONNALLY obtained the floor.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. HASTINGS. I desire to announce that, as soon tomorrow as I can secure recognition, I shall desire to discuss the pending bill at some length.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Let me inquire if the Senator is ready to proceed now? I thought perhaps he would like to discuss the measure before we vote on the amendments.

Mr. HASTINGS. No; I am not ready to proceed now, and besides the Senator from Texas has the floor.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I am heartily supporting the pending measure. I expect to follow the discussion of it by both its proponents and those who are opposed to it with a great deal of interest. It may be of interest to the Senate to have recalled that today 1 year ago, the 24th of January 1933, the junior Senator from Texas, who is now undertaking to address the Senate, made the first speech which was made in this body advocating cutting the gold content of the dollar or devaluating the gold dollar. The reasons which I urged at that time were that I was convinced that some form of inflation was necessary in order to restore the price level of commodities and to permit debtors to discharge obligations which they had contracted at a time when commodities were high and money was cheap. I do not believe in the issuance of unlimited volumes of paper money. I do not believe that it is sound to issue a great lot of Treasury notes without sufficient metallic reserves in the Treasury to protect them.

When I made the remarks to which I have referred, Senators on both sides of the house challenged the constitutionality of the proposal. The Senator from Arkansas, the Democratic leader, however, was good enough to come to my rescue in that regard and to indicate his view that the Congress, under its constitutional power to regulate the value of money, had the power to revalue the gold dollar. The Senator from Arkansas is now in the Chamber, and he may correct me if I am not stating correctly his attitude at that time.

Other Senators took the position that it was repudiation, and insisted that we could not pay debts with a new gold dollar when those debts had been contracted on the basis of a dollar of a greater gold content. Other Senators took the position that in bonds and notes and other obligations exclusive gold clauses requiring the payment of such obligations in dollars of the present standard of weight and fineness in gold could not be abrogated.

Senators, within a year you have seen those imaginary objections swept aside. You have seen the Congress, by its own act, abrogate exclusive gold clauses in bonds and other obligations requiring the payment of gold of a certain standard of weight and fineness. Since that time you have seen the United States go off the gold standard; and you have witnessed operations by the President in the gold market by which the value of the amount of gold in a $20 gold piece has risen to about $34.

Mr. President, you have further witnessed the clear establishment in the minds of practically all people in the United States the conviction that Congress, under its power to coin money and to regulate the value thereof, has the undoubted authority to say when and how much gold shall be contained in a dollar and to declare that all obligations may be paid in such new dollars. Ever since the Legal Tender cases, in which it was held that the Government could force creditors to accept paper dollars worth only 35 cents in gold in payment of obligations, that power of Congress seems to have been well established.

Mr. President, on the 24th of January 1933 I made that proposal here on the floor of the Senate. On the following day I made another address proposing the cutting of the gold content of the dollar by one third. On the 3d of April 1933 I introduced in the Senate a bill to provide that the gold content of the dollar should be cut one third; that all monetary gold in the country should be called into the Treasury and should remain in the Treasury in the form of bullion, and that no other gold coin should be minted.

On the 18th of April 1933 the junior Senator from Texas again addressed the Senate, at which time he discussed the bill which he had introduced and urged its passage by the Senate.

Again, when the inflation amendment was pending—I believe it was on April 24, 1933—I undertook at some length on the floor of the Senate to establish not only the power of the Congress to revalue the dollar by cutting its gold content, but also advocated what was known as "the commodity dollar" after revaluation had taken place, and the calling into the Treasury of all monetary gold and retaining it there as a permanent gold reserve without the coinage of gold.

Mr. President, according to my view, the so-called "gold profits", of course, belong to the Government. We have called upon individuals to surrender their gold coin to the Treasury or to the Federal Reserve banks. They have done so. It would be unjust and inequitable should we permit the Federal Reserve banks to retain any portion of the so-called "gold profits" brought about by revaluation. I do not understand that the Federal Reserve banks are making any such contention. I am firmly convinced that all the gold ought to be deposited in the Treasury and to remain there in the form of gold bullion. The Federal Reserve banks will receive, in return for the gold surrendered, gold certificates in an equal amount based upon revalued dollars, and those gold certificates in the hands of the Federal Reserve banks afford just as good a reserve for the issuance of their currency as though they had the gold in their vaults because gold certificates are warehouse receipts; they are muniments of title showing that the Federal Reserve bank has the right to that much gold bullion in the Treasury.

There are those who have contended that revaluation under this bill does not mean any increase in the volume of money. There is no command in the bill that the volume shall increase, but it seems to me there is no question whatever that it is possible under the terms of the bill to increase vastly the volume of actual money in circulation. The Government will receive a profit in gold of something like $2,600,000,000. If $2,000,000,000 of that be employed for the stabilization fund, then over and beyond that we would have $600,000,000 of free gold. Gold certificates could be issued against that and employed by the Government to pay the operating expenses of the Government if desired. It would thus be forced into circulation. I can see no reason why gold currency should not be issued against the revolving fund of $2,000,000,000 itself, or a considerable portion of it, because it is not contemplated that we are going to squander the $2,000,000,000 in the revolving fund. Some days the fund will make money on exchange and other days it may lose money, but if it is properly handled the losses and gains will probably offset each other. Eventually all the gold profit will be at the disposal of the Government and will increase the volume of money.

At any rate there is a possibility of an immediate extension of the volume of currency.

After all credit is the life of business. No matter how much money we have in existence, unless those who want to borrow it for their necessities can get it it does nobody good except those who have it in their vaults. Therefore the credit features of this measure ought to make possible the increase of the facilities of the Federal Reserve banks. It will strengthen the Treasury because of the gold profit in the Treasury. It will be recalled that the day the President announced this proposal stocks and bonds went up. Government securities enhanced. Why? Because the Government had $2,600,000,000 more assets back of its bonds. Cotton advanced $2.50 a bale and other commodities rose in price.

The revaluation of the gold dollar is so fundamental, so sweeping, that I regard it as the greatest measure proposed by President Roosevelt in the program for recovery. It touches every business. It touches finance. It touches every business transaction. It reaches into every area and every nook and cranny of the Republic, because the revaluation of the dollar will affect every man, woman, and child in the country. It will aid and stimulate other recovery measures. According to my view, it is the outstanding financial accomplishment of the Congress during the past year. I hope the Congress enacts the bill into law in substantial form as it was drafted.

I shall not undertake to anticipate the discussion of the amendments. I hope to listen to the discussion and get the benefit of the knowledge of members of the committee who have listened to the testimony in the hearings; but in broad outline, in broad principle, I am firmly of the view that the soundest method of inflation, the soundest process to lift commodity prices, the soundest method of enabling debtors to pay their debts on somewhere near the same level of values as those debts were contracted, lies in the revaluation or devaluation of the gold dollar. So believing, believing that it is sound, believing that it is just, believing that the Congress, in the exercise of its high functions under the Constitution, has the power to revalue the dollar at a level which its wisdom and its patriotism approve, I am firmly and earnestly standing in support of the measure.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, may I submit an inquiry to the Senator from Texas, who is a sound constitutional lawyer as well as a prophet, as I judge from his speech?

Mr. CONNALLY. Oh, no.

Mr. ADAMS. Upon what portion of the Federal Constitution can we base the operations of the United States Government in indulging in the buying and selling of foreign exchange?

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator does me too much honor, though facetiously, I am sure.

Mr. ADAMS. Not at all. I am very much in earnest.

Mr. CONNALLY. He refers to my constitutional discussions and my ideas of prophecy. I very earnestly deny the soft implications.

The Senator from Colorado is on the Banking and Currency Committee and the junior Senator from Texas is not. The Senator from Colorado has been listening for a long while to the evidence submitted to that committee and the Senator from Texas has not had an opportunity to do so because of the pressure of other business. The Senator from Colorado is a banker, and the Senator from Texas is not and hopes he never will be. [Laughter.]

The Secretary of the Treasury who preceded the present Secretary was before the Finance Committee at this session of the Congress and he then took the position that he had the power under existing law to deal in foreign exchange. The possibility was then discussed of his setting aside, without any further congressional warrant, $100,000,000 in order to offset the efforts of the British and other foreign governments who were trying to depreciate their currencies below ours.

I saw yesterday a statement in the paper from Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, Prime Minister of Great Britain. He was complaining that other governments do not stabilize their currency. Great Britain was one of the first to go off the gold standard. She depreciated her pound by so doing to about $3.20 in United States money. It little befits Mr. Ramsay MacDonald to criticize other governments for not stabilizing their currency when England and other governments have undertaken to take away our export trade by devaluing their money.

If there is no law on the statute books, if there is no other authority in the Constitution than the right of self-defense, that right alone gives the Government of the United States the power to buy and sell foreign exchange in order to protect the dollar and in order to protect the interests of American citizens.

Mr. ADAMS. While I am still in some doubt, I am in less doubt than when I left the Committee on Banking and Currency. The Senator from Texas has made a better explanation than I heard in the committee.

Mr. CONNALLY. I thank the Senator. I am under renewed obligations to the Senator from Colorado. If I ever undertake to borrow any money, I am sure I shall approach the Senator from Colorado. [Laughter.] He has shown more consideration than any other banker.

Mr. ADAMS. I only wish I were a banker. Unfortunately, like the junior Senator from Texas, I happen to be a lawyer.

Mr. CONNALLY. I knew the Senator to be a lawyer, and I thought he also owned a bank.

Mr. President, I have not studied the banking laws as the Committee on Banking and Currency have studied them. I do not know—and I say this in answer to the Senator from Colorado—just exactly what are the powers of the Secretary of the Treasury with relation to buying and selling foreign exchange; but I do know that the Constitution of the United States gives the Congress and the officers of the Government to whom the Congress delegates it the authority to deal with money, to regulate its value and to control the currency and the money of the people of the United States. If in exercising the power to regulate the value of our money it becomes necessary to deal and operate in foreign exchange, why does not that come within the power to regulate our own money?

If foreign governments by their manipulation of foreign exchange, if Great Britain by the employment of her equalization fund, either put the dollar up or put the dollar down, why has not the Government of the United States, under this power to regulate the value of the American dollar, got the right to do the same thing, to deal in foreign exchange, if that action is necessary, to protect the interests of the people of the United States?

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator for just 1 second?

Mr. BONE. Mr. President——

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield to the Senator from Colorado. Then I shall yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. ADAMS. The suggestion of the Senator from Texas raises an additional inquiry. The Senator says that the Congress of the United States has the power to do these things—to deal in foreign exchange under the power to coin money and to regulate the value thereof. If Congress has the power to do those things, may Congress delegate to the Secretary of the Treasury those legislative functions? May it delegate the legislative function, if we have such a function, to deal in foreign exchange and the legislative function, which we unquestionably have, but a constitutional function, to coin and regulate the value of money?

As I understand, we have already passed a bill attempting to delegate that authority, and this bill is in confirmation of it.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, there is no more confusion about any legal question that I know anything about than the question of delegating legislative power. Let us see if the Senator is correct.

He says that Congress has the right, under the power to regulate money, to deal in foreign exchange. How in the world could Congress itself perform that function? It is necessary to buy and sell exchange probably every day; and while the exchange market was running away, the Senate and the House would be debating the question. [Laughter.]

Here is what Congress has the right to do, and it is a broad proposition:

Congress, under the Constitution, in the exercise of any of the powers given to it, has the right to define policies and determine upon a course of action; and then it has the power to delegate the execution of those powers and the execution of those policies to any branch of the Government or any other agency that it may see fit.

How can Congress run the details of these things? If Congress is to do it, why have a Treasury Department? Why have a Secretary of the Treasury? Let some little committee of Congress, some committee on contingent expenses, run the finances of the world. We must have these executive departments and administrative bureaus. But when Congress lays down the policy, when Congress announces its course, when Congress says what they shall not do and what they shall do, then it devolves upon the Executive, in the discharge of that degree of delegation, to carry out the orders and the policies and the course of action sanctioned by the Congress.

I submit that that is the true rule as to delegation of authority and as to delegation of legislative power.

We cannot authorize anybody to make laws for the Congress. We must make the laws ourselves. That is legislative authority; but after the laws are made we must depend upon somebody else to enforce or execute those laws, and that is not a delegation of legislative power. That is simply an instruction to our instrumentalities and to our agencies to do what Congress has told them to do.

I admit that there is a zone of uncertainty, there is a certain twilight zone, that no man can put his finger on and say, "Here it stops and there it begins"; but in the main, in the general outline, I shall say to the Senator from Colorado, those are my conceptions of what the rule is with regard to the delegation of legislative power.

Now I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, I think perhaps the Senator, especially in his colloquy with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS], has answered the question I was going to ask.

The Constitution provides:

> The Congress shall have power * * * to coin money, regulate the value thereof—

And so forth. Manifestly those words either mean what they say or they are meaningless. If Congress is going to regulate the value of money, we cannot scrutinize too closely the methods and the mechanism we create to regulate it.

I just want to make the suggestion in the way of a question to the Senator: Is it not a fact that the entire system of regulation that has been built in this country over the past 25 years rests solely upon the power of a legislative body to delegate that function to a regulatory body which is its own creature?

Mr. CONNALLY. Why, to be sure. Let me say to the Senator from Washington that Congress has the power to control interstate-commerce rates and interstate commerce between the States; but we do not go down and say what any particular freight rate shall be. We commit that administrative function to the Interstate Commerce Commission. We have the power, under our power to regulate interstate commerce, to control radio. Does that mean that Congress has to bring a radio up here in the Chamber and sit here with our fingers on the dial and monkey with the radio all day? We delegate that power to the Radio Commission. We have power to do a great many things that we do not undertake to do ourselves. Under the strict construction laid down by the Senator from Colorado, when he says Congress has the power to coin money and regulate the value thereof, we would have to set up a mint here in the Senate Chamber and actually turn out the money, because Congress and nobody else can coin money.

Mr. SMITH. I wish we would. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator from South Carolina is the very man to make that suggestion, because if we did the Senator from South Carolina would probably get more of the results of the coinage than any other man in the Senate in the form of appropriations to relieve the stricken and the downcast in certain areas. [Laughter.]

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. ADAMS. I think the Senator from Texas has rather stretched my inquiry into an opinion, but I think this will be conceded by the Senator from Texas:

He refers to the Interstate Commerce Commission having power to regulate rates. That is true. It is granted; but always Congress has specified the rule and the principle to be applied.

That is the difficulty in this particular proceeding. We are saying to the President of the United States, "You may devalue the gold dollar." We have not laid down any rule or principle which he may apply. That is the weakness of the situation, as I see it. That is, we have a perfect right to select the agencies to apply the rule, but we must first establish the rule.

It seems to me there is that weakness in our devaluation statute.

Mr. CONNALLY. If there is any weakness in the bill, it is the fault of the Senator's own committee and not mine. He is a member of the Committee on Banking and Currency; and if he cannot get that committee to see his view—able men that they are, familiar with finance, sounding all the depths of international exchange—he ought not to appeal to a country lawyer to solve his problem for him. [Laughter.]

Mr. ADAMS. That is the reason why we are propounding these questions—to get help.

Mr. CONNALLY. I want to say to the Senator, in view of his interruptions and his kind personal references a little while ago, that any replies I make are certainly not in anywise intended to distort his questions or to indicate any displeasure on the part of the Senator from Texas for his interruptions; and I hope they may be more frequent.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield now to the Senator from Oklahoma, who desired to ask me a question.

Mr. GORE. The questions propounded by the Senator from Colorado and the Senator from Washington have partly elicited the information that I was attempting to seek at the Senator's hands. I want to suggest what has been already cited, that Congress has power to coin money and to regulate the value thereof. That is a distinct and explicit grant of power to the Congress. Congress cannot delegate to anybody its power to legislate under any circumstances. Congress can prescribe a rule or a formula and then create or empower agencies to carry out that rule.

That is the law with reference to the Interstate Commerce Commission. We have not delegated unlimited power or legislative power to the Interstate Commerce Commission to fix rates or to regulate rates. Congress has enacted that freight rates shall be just and reasonable. That is an exercise of legislative power. We have created an administrative agency and given it the power to ascertain what are just and reasonable rates.

On one occasion Congress authorized the President of the United States, by proclamation, to change certain tariff rates; but he could only exercise that power upon the ascertainment of a fact or set of facts.

The point to which I desire to direct the Senator's attention is this:

A year ago we authorized the President to devaluate the gold dollar, but one devaluation was fixed and final. The pending bill authorizes the President to devaluate from time to time and revise his valuation. I wanted to take the Senator's sense on that particular point.

Mr. CONNALLY. I shall try to answer the Senator. It is very difficult to answer the Senator from Oklahoma. He has a very keen blade, and a very piercing perceptive faculty.

The Senator from Oklahoma, however, says that we cannot delegate legislative power. That is true; but what is legislative power? Legislative power and administrative power are two different things. For instance, in this case, what is the legislative power? The Congress decides, first, whether we are going to enter the foreign-exchange market. Congress says whether we shall buy foreign exchange or whether we shall sell foreign exchange. That is a question of legislative power. That is for the Congress to settle; but when the Congress decides to enter the market on foreign exchange, Congress cannot physically do it. Congress cannot mechanically be on the stock exchange each day, buying and selling exchange. It has to place that mechanics of operation in somebody's hands, and we place it in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

Mr. CONNALLY. Let me answer the Senator first.

Mr. GORE. That was not my question.

Mr. CONNALLY. I know; but the Senator started out with that.

Mr. GORE. No; not at all. That was not my point at all, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator meant it, I thought, as a point.

Mr. GORE. Oh, not at all.

Mr. CONNALLY. I do not admit that there is any point to it, but I thought the Senator meant it as such.

Mr. GORE. I have no reference to foreign exchange. I did not have that in my mind, and I did not intend to trouble the Senator upon that point.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator does not trouble the Senator from Texas.

Mr. GORE. My question was this:

This bill authorizes the President to change the gold content of the dollar from time to time.

Mr. CONNALLY. Yes. I was coming to that.

The Senator from Oklahoma is also a member of the Banking and Currency Committee. With all of his eloquence and all of his ability, he was not able to induce the Committee on Banking and Currency to do what he wanted them to do and say that the gold content of the dollar should be fixed at one time. Now, let me say this: "Regulate", as used in the Constitution, does not mean "fix." When Congress is given the power to regulate the value of money, it does not mean that we can go up there and fix it once and go off and leave it forever. It means that Congress has the power to change the value of the dollar whenever Congress gets ready to do it.

In the exercise of that legislative power Congress can say, "We are not going to fix it at any particular point. We are going to say that it shall be between 50 cents and 60 cents." That is what we did about railroad rates; that is what we did about the tariff bill, which the Senator from Oklahoma discussed. He said that we gave the power to the President to vary tariff rates, but we fixed a minimum and maximum; and we are fixing a limit in this measure. We are saying that he shall not go below 50 cents and shall not go above 60 cents, but in the operation of that fund we give the power to the President and to the Secretary of the Treasury to carry out the actual deals in foreign exchange according to commodity prices and according to variations or fluctuations in foreign exchange.

I do not profess to be a constitutional lawyer. I am just a plain country lawyer. I am not posing as an expert on finance. But there are other people in the United States who must be legislated for besides constitutional lawyers and economists and financiers, and I am trying to speak for some of them. They need and want a cheaper dollar, and the only way we are going to get a cheaper dollar is to cut off some of the present dollar, to make it cheaper by making it smaller; and this measure would do that.

This bill, I believe, will be of untold advantage to the people of the United States. It ought to help the business man, because it will give him more stability as to the value of the dollar than there is under present circumstances. It will help people who produce commodities with their hands. It will help farmers to get more value for their money. It will help the mortgage-ridden farmer out in Oklahoma who owes taxes and has a mortgage on his property. It will help him to pay the mortgage on his homestead, and I am not going to quibble between tweedledum and tweedledee, whether the dot of the "i" or the cross of the "t" was on the wrong letter.

I believe that this measure will be effective. I do not want any argument with the Senator from Oklahoma—because he is a great lawyer—about just where we have to stop with regard to changing the value from day to day.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, the President was given the power to change tariff rates upon the ascertainment of certain facts. He could then issue a proclamation based upon that fact. I do not have any doubt that we could define in this bill a state of facts upon which the President could be authorized to vary the gold content of the dollar. This measure has not done what the Tariff Act did and what the Interstate Commerce Act did. It does not define the state of facts upon the ascertainment of which the President can make the change in the content of the gold dollar. It was that point I wanted to bring to the Senator's attention, and to find out whether or not he thought it ought to be more definitely defined. I do not doubt that it can be done.

Mr. CONNALLY. I was hoping that the Senator and his committee would do that if it ought to be done. I am not prepared to say just what facts the President ought to find. I am not an expert on foreign exchange. I do not know that when the thermometer of international exchange or finance gets up to a certain point something ought to be done, or when it gets down to a little lower standard something else ought to be done. That is a detail, however, and I suggested to the Senator from Oklahoma and other Senators that there is a twilighe zone as to the question of delegating legislative power and administrative power. I do not pretend to speak with finality as to those matters, but I do believe that when we are trying to do something, when we are trying to get results, the way to accomplish it is to go on and do it, and not spend all the time finding imaginary trouble, finding bugaboos, running around with Mother Goose stories about what may happen and what may not happen.

We know that if this power is given to the President of the United States he is going to exercise it according to his best judgment and wisdom. We know that he will not arbitrarily do anything through pique, or through malice, or through passion, but that when he goes on a foreign exchange to buy or sell money, or when he undertakes to change the value of the dollar to between 50 cents and 60 cents, he is going to try to do that thing which is for the best interests of the people of the United States, and the people of the United States, who have witnessed the performances of President Roosevelt since the 4th of March, have confidence in his integrity, in his patriotism, and in his courage. They trust him, and I believe that Senators are going to trust him. There are many Senators who 12 months ago ridiculed the contention of the Senator from Texas that the gold dollar ought to be cut who now are supporting that suggestion, and have supported it in the past, because they have confidence in the President of the United States and in his policy.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I desire to call attention to the fact that the so-called "Thomas amendment", which we adopted at the last session of the Congress, in one of its provisions authorized the President to devalue the gold dollar to the extent of 50 percent, and in the preamble and basis for that authority we fixed a yardstick, which is still in existence. The pending bill does not repeal the Thomas amendment.

Mr. CONNALLY. It does not. It modifies it in one respect.

Mr. BARKLEY. But it does not take away the yardstick which the Congress fixed, and I should like to put that in the RECORD here.

Mr. CONNALLY. I shall be happy to have the Senator put it in the RECORD.

Mr. BARKLEY. It reads:

Whenever the President finds, upon investigation, that (1) the foreign commerce of the United States is adversely affected by reason of the depreciation in the value of the currency of any other government or governments in relation to the present standard value of gold, or (2) action under this section is necessary in order to regulate and maintain the parity of currency issues of the United States, or (3) an economic emergency requires an expansion of credit, or (4) an expansion of credit is necessary to secure by international agreement a stabilization at proper levels of the currencies of various governments, the President is authorized, in his discretion—

To do certain things, among them being the power to change the content of the gold dollar, by proclamation.

In that amendment the President was authorized to go the whole distance of 50 percent, but after he has by proclamation stabilized the dollar at 60, or whatever it may be, we will assume 60, then he has only a 10 percent leeway between 50 and 60, based upon the same predicate that is outlined in the beginning of the Thomas amendment as a basis for his action originally.

Mr. CONNALLY. I thank the Senator from Kentucky for his splendid answer from the record to the interrogatory propounded by the Senator from Oklahoma. It is already the law, voted by the Congress at the last session, that the President shall have power to do this very thing of changing and regulating the content of the gold dollar and setting up a standard of measurement, a rule of action, and that law is still upon the statute books, unrepealed. This legislation would be supplementary to that. It would fortify that legislation. It would give more stability than we have under the present law, because the range of variation would be narrowed down to between 50 and 60 percent of the old content of the dollar.

Mr. President, I hope that the Congress may speedily enact this measure substantially in its present form, because I believe it will vitally affect all the people of the United States and will mean much toward recovery and toward our regaining the place in the economic life of the world, toward which we are so earnestly and, I believe, so courageously striving.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a copy of the act of Parliament of Great Britain creating the English exchange equalization account.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PART IV

EXCHANGE EQUALIZATION ACCOUNT

24. (1) There shall be established an account, to be called "the exchange equalization account", which shall be under the control of the treasury and shall be used for the purposes specified in this part of this act.

(2) The treasury may, if at any time they think it expedient so to do, cause the exchange equalization account (in this part of this act referred to as "the account") to be wound up forthwith, and the account shall in any event be wound up not later than 6 months after the date on which the Commons House of Parliament resolve that the account is no longer required for the purpose for which it was established.

(3) The treasury may cause any funds in the account to be invested in securities or in the purchase of gold in such manner as they think best adapted for checking undue fluctuations in the exchange value of sterling.

(4) There shall be issued to the account out of the consolidated fund, or the growing produce thereof, at such times and in such manner as the treasury may direct, such sums, not exceeding in the aggregate £150,000,000, as the treasury may determine, and all the assets of the exchange account shall be transferred to the account at such time as the treasury may direct.

(5) For the purpose of providing for the issue of sums out of the consolidated fund under the last preceding subsection or for the repayment to that fund of all or any part of any sums so issued, the treasury may raise money in any manner in which they are authorized to raise money under and for the purposes of subsection (1) of section 1 of the War Loan Act, 1919, and any securities created and issued to raise money under this subsection shall for all purposes be deemed to have been created and issued under the said subsection (1).

(6) The Bank of England may advance to the treasury any sums which the treasury have under this section power to raise.

(7) The account shall in every year until it is wound up be examined by the comptroller and auditor-general in such manner as he, in his discretion, thinks proper with a view to ascertaining whether the operations on and the transactions in connection with the account have been in accordance with the provisions of this part of this act, and he shall certify to the Commons House of Parliament whether in his opinion, having regard to the result of the examination, the operations on and the transactions in connection with the account have or have not been in accordance with the provisions of this part of this act.

25. (1) There shall be paid to the issue department of the Bank of England out of the account such sum, not exceeding £8,000,000, as is, in the opinion of the treasury, equal to the amount of the net loss which by reason of variations in rates of exchange has been sustained in connection with the credits obtained by the Bank of England from the Bank of France and the Federal Reserve Bank of New York on the 1st day of August 1931.

(2) For the purpose of any valuation of the assets held in the issue department of the Bank of England, being a valuation made before the winding up of the account—

(a) Gold held in the department shall be taken to be of the value of £3 17s. 10½d. for every ounce troy of the standard fineness specified in the first schedule to the Coinage Act, 1870 (hereafter referred to as "the fixed value"); and

(b) Assets in currencies other than sterling held in the department shall be valued at the rate of exchange prevailing at the date of each valuation.

(3) Whenever any gold is purchased or sold on account of the issue department during the existence of the account, the amount by which the price of the gold exceeds the fixed value thereof shall, in the case of a purchase, be made good to the issue department from the account, and, in the case of a sale, be made good to the account from the issue department.

(4) Immediately before the account is wound up the amount by which the market value (as agreed between the bank and the treasury) of the gold then held in the issue department exceeds its fixed value shall be made good by the department to the account.

(5) If on any sale of assets in currencies other than sterling held in the issue department (whether the sale occurred before the establishment of the account or occurs at any time during the existence of the account), or on any valuation during the existence of the account of any such assets, it appears that by reason of variations in rates of exchange occurring at any time after the 21st day of September 1931, there has been any depreciation or loss in connection with those assets, the amount of the depreciation or loss shall be made good to the issue department from the account; and if on any such sale or valuation as aforesaid it appears that by reason as aforesaid any appreciation or gain has arisen in connection with any of the said assets, the amount of the appreciation or gain shall be made good from the issue department to the account.

(6) Where under this section any amount is to be made good from or to the account, there may, in lieu of a payment in cash, be transferred from or to the account securities equivalent in value, in the opinion of the treasury, to that amount.

(7) It is hereby declared that in subsection (3) of the last preceding section of this act and in section 3 of the Currency and Bank Notes Act, 1928 (which relates to the securities to be held in the issue department), the expression "securities" includes securities and assets in currency of any country and in whatever form held.

26. On the winding up of the account the assets thereof shall be applied in such manner as the treasury may direct for the redemption of debt, and the treasury shall thereupon cause to be laid before Parliament a statement of the sum so applied, and of the sums issued out of the consolidated fund to the account, together with a report by the comptroller and auditor general with respect to such matters in relation to the account as he thinks fit.

Mr. WALCOTT obtained the floor.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Connecticut yield to me?

Mr. WALCOTT. I yield.

Mr. FESS. Earlier in the day the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] referred to a contribution by Dr. Andrew D. White on the question of sound money. That contribution was in the form of an address delivered to the students of Cornell University in a series on the French Revolution. Later the address was repeated in Washington at the request of several Representatives and Senators. In 1912, when Dr. White was 80 years of age, he revised the address. I hold a copy of the revised address in my hand, and ask unanimous consent that it be printed as a public document.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, that address has been in pamphlet form and has been very widely distributed and printed and circulated over all the country. I do not see why we should make it a public document. It is a perfectly sound statement, I have no doubt, but does not apply to our condition at this time, and I think is a species of propaganda. I do not see any use in making it a public document.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I make an inquiry of the Senator from Ohio? I was interrupted while he was speaking. Did he ask that this article be printed as a public document?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. I wonder if the Senator would not be willing to have it printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD?

Mr. FESS. I should be glad to have it printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. NORRIS. I desire to say to the Senator from Ohio that I have read the article in question. I agree with the Senator from Florida. It has been circulated very widely. I should dislike to agree to make that kind of an article, which I think is propaganda, a Senate document; but I certainly shall have no objection if the Senator from Ohio desires to have it printed in the RECORD for the use of Senators.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I do not desire to take time from the Senator from Connecticut, but I do wish to make a statement.

Andrew D. White was the founder of Cornell University and the first president thereof. He was minister and ambassador to various foreign countries, being sent as such to at least three different posts. He was adviser to the Government along many different lines. He was our representative at the Hague Conference when the first conference was held there. I know of no authority of higher rank, and I am somewhat surprised that anyone should refuse to have printed as a public document a contribution so generally appreciated as a great treatise on a disputed question.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I am going to withdraw my request, but I want the public to know that there is an objection in the Senate to printing this document.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I have just been called back into the Chamber, having been necessarily absent for a few moments, and do not know what is the occasion of the resentment expressed by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. I requested that the address delivered by Andrew D. White, first in the form of a lecture, on the question of sound money, in which he discussed fiat money in France, which lecture was repeated here in Washington in 1876 at the request of Members of Congress, both Senate and House, and which was revised in 1912, be printed as a Senate document.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I am familiar with the pamphlet to which the Senator refers. There can be no objection, if he submits his request, to its going to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. FESS. I should be very glad to do that.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. If the Senator offers the document, I suggest that it go to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. FESS. What I wanted to have done was to have it printed as a public document. I have never known such a request to be refused here.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I can recall a great many occasions, and the Senator from Ohio will also, if he will refresh his memory, when objections have been made to printing matter in the RECORD and printing it as a public document. That has happened here very frequently.

Mr. FESS. For that reason I did not ask to have it printed in the RECORD and as a public document.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The request of the Senator from Ohio has been withdrawn; and the Chair recognizes the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. WALCOTT].

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. WALCOTT. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I desire to make a suggestion to the Senator from Arkansas.

Prior to the Senator's coming into the Chamber, the Senator from Ohio was requested by myself to withdraw his request to have the pamphlet printed as a public document and ask that it be printed in the RECORD, to which I have no objection. After reading the pamphlet myself, however, I do not believe that we ought to stamp it as a Senate document. I may be wrong about that. I have sometimes tried and failed to get something printed as a Senate document when objection was made, and I did just what I have suggested to the Senator from Ohio he should do.

While the document in question is ably written and its author was an able man during his life, and I think it is a commendable document, I do not believe it applies to the financial situation of America at the present time. I think it has no application. I am perfectly willing that those who disagree with this view should do so and should have all the opportunity to give their disagreement publicity as far as the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is concerned.

Mr. FESS. The Senator is in error if he thinks that I asked to have the address printed in the RECORD and as a public document. I did not.

Mr. NORRIS. No; I understood that. I have suggested to the Senator that he have it printed in the RECORD instead of printed as a Senate document.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. In any event, the request has been withdrawn, and is not now before the Senate.

Mr. FESS. I may take occasion later on to read it into the RECORD.

Mr. NORRIS. That will get it into the RECORD.

Mr. FESS. Yes; that will get it into the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut has the floor.

Mr. WALCOTT. Mr. President, I do not wish to detain the Senate more than a few moments. I am very anxious, however, to make a few comments; and I desire to preface my remarks with the statement that I am not conscious of having the slightest partisan feeling either for or against the pending bill or any part of it.

I desire also to state that in the emergency, which I am about to discuss, the situation is so grave, the ailments that exist among foreign nations with respect to their currencies are so serious, that any man in this body or in the Congress who tries to criticise the administration in a destructive fashion or to throw stones at any part of the program, unless he can make constructive suggestions, is little short of a traitor.

I desire to show the importance of some kind of legislation looking to the eventual stabilization of our monetary system, and to show something of the acute situation that exists abroad making some such step essential.

I desire to throw some high lights on the amendments proposed to the bill by the Senate committee, by quoting from expert testimony as we gather it before the Committee on Banking and Currency, analyzing it, and skipping about from place to place where I think it is relevant.

I do not intend even to attempt to add anything to the brilliant summary made by my distinguished friend and colleague the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], whose analysis of the facts seemed to me very accurate, and whose words of warning should be heeded by every person in the country.

I am gratified to hear the chairman of the committee, the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], say in commenting upon the amendments, if I recall his comments correctly, that he does not seriously object to the time limitation.

The time limitation has two parts. One restricts to 2 years the operation of the stabilization fund. It is optional with the President to make it of less duration, or, by proclamation, to extend the time from 2 years to 3 years. The other imposes a limitation in point of time on the power to devalue the dollar. It is found on page 16 of the bill, line 22.

It seems to me that those two limitations are essential, in that we announce to the world that this is emergency legislation, Congress always reserving the right to extend it indefinitely.

I believe there are principles enunciated in this bill which may prove exceedingly valuable, and I can imagine some of them being made permanent, or, at any rate, more or less permanent. I can imagine the time limits being indefinitely extended by the Congress, but I feel that it is very important to hold within the hands of Congress the power of such extension beyond the time prescribed by the bill.

I desire to confine myself chiefly to the question of a program; and while I cannot say positively what the entire program is, as proposed or as thought out by the administration, I find a suggestion in the testimony of Mr. Stewart which seems to me to answer the purpose very well and to indicate, probably, approximately the program.

First, that we have an artificial depreciation of the dollar in foreign exchange; second, that we have a devaluation of the dollar; third, that we go through a reflation of the domestic price level; fourth, that we eventually come to stabilization.

Mr. Stewart says that the first phase of this program is practically finished. He says:

> The artificial depreciation of the dollar in the foreign exchanges, initiated by the fact that the country went off the gold standard, precipitated by the flight from the dollar, and encouraged by the gold purchases, has brought the dollar in the foreign exchanges to a 60-cent level.

Mr. Stewart then said:

> The devaluation which is suggested here, though not final and definitive, is established under this act within limits, and now we are looking forward to the reflation steps.
> That sequence seems to me to rest on the belief that somehow at the end of this particular rainbow there will be stabilization. I think it is a most dangerous illusion. It is an illusion which is tragic in character, because there is a very wide-spread popular belief that that is what this mechanism can accomplish. There is no more assurance of stabilization at the end of this procedure than there was at the end of similar experiences abroad.
> In fact, the process of stabilization can only be significant when you already have achieved something by way of balance internationally and at home. There are undoubtedly limits within which monetary changes can contribute to a business recovery, but that at the end of that recovery human nature will have changed or the economic forces which are controlling the position would have altered and led to some quite stabilized level within which the margin between 50 and 60 will be a controlling element, is an entirely unjustified hope.

With reference to an international agreement being arrived at for stabilization he was asked:

> Might this not lead to some international agreement toward stabilization?
>
> Mr. STEWART. It could, conceivably. It could conceivably, on the other hand, lead to such embitterment that international understanding would become still more difficult. The temper of people in different countries is usually to ascribe to a foreign country the embarrassment that they are faced with, if it is only of an economic character.
> If, as I believe, this bill undervalues the dollar, and we find that our stabilization fund must be used to depress the dollar in the foreign exchanges, I think that the press and the commentators will make us believe that we are in competition with the British equalization fund, and that in consequence of that we will make an atmosphere for agreement almost impossible.

I am firmly convinced, Mr. President, that it is of vital consequence to the effectiveness of the stabilization fund, first, that it be limited as to time, with reasonable limitations; second, that it be controlled by a small joint committee or board representing two branches of our banking system, one the Treasury Department, which is not today a central bank, but which by this bill would be made practically a central bank such as we have never dreamed of before, and the other the Federal Reserve System, which has the power of issuing currency. Such a board as is suggested by one of the amendments seems to me to be a well-balanced board, consisting of the Governor of the Federal Reserve Board, the Comptroller of the Currency, the Secretary of the Treasury, and two men to be appointed by the President. That leaves a chance to have serving on the board as members one or two men of expert knowledge on this most difficult subject.

I believe it is wholly unsound in principle and exceedingly dangerous—perhaps not during the immediate emergency but for a longer period of time during which this measure may easily operate—to have the power of regulating the currency and the currency issue lodged in the same hands that borrow and spend or lend money from the Treasury. It seems to me exceedingly unwise, exceedingly dangerous, altogether an unjust placing of tremendous power, particularly in that the forces that are contending against either one side or the other are always at work and that political pressure may be brought to bear with enormous power against that man, whoever he may be. Every man in a great office of that kind is subject to the temptations of human nature, I do not care how honest he is. I believe in the absolute integrity of the man who is now Secretary of the Treasury; but there is no question that there will be forces at work which would almost crush him if he did not yield in some way to their pressure. It seems to me the most unwise thing that could be thought of.

I can see many advantages in the bill if we amend it carefully. I believe, inasmuch as it is perhaps the most important piece of legislation certainly since the passage of the Federal Reserve Act and possibly since the Civil War, that we should take ample time to discuss it. We have had expert advice, plenty of it, and it has assured us and reassured us along these lines. I think we should take the time to debate it fully here, so the country may be fully acquainted with that particular problem.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. WALCOTT. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Before the Senator leaves the question of concentrated power in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury alone, may I interpolate that even the President's great radio protagonist, who is probably the greatest evangelist for this particular legislation now talking to the country, except the President himself—even this great protagonist, according to the address which was left upon the desks of Senators upon yesterday, said as follows:

> And America is in no mood to transfer its control of the dollar to a one-man dictator not elected by the people, over whom the people have little or no control.

Mr. WALCOTT. I thank the Senator for that contribution.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield there?

Mr. WALCOTT. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. In that connection, I do not know that there is any virtue in the suggestion that we should be guided by the example of any other country, although I think that in governmental matters we may learn much from other countries of the world; but it so happens that the act of the British Parliament creating their fund puts it exclusively within the control of the treasury. The terminology which is used in the British act means, of course, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who, as I understand, is the head of the treasury department. No board is created. There is no reference to any board. The fund is put purely in the control of the treasury, which is controlled by one man, who is not even elected by the people.

Within the treasury they have a board of three, whose names are more or less unidentified, who may be changed from time to time in order that they may not be spotted by the public or by those who may have a desire to find who they are or what their actions may be. Their deliberations are entirely secret; and the success of the use of any fund on the part of any nation depends very largely upon the secrecy and the swiftness with which action is taken.

So I think it is hardly a fair analogy to draw any deductions from the fact that this amendment creates a board of five, representing two different departments at least, if not three, within the Government, and then two on the outside, who represent no department of the Government but who might be said to represent the public. I do not know whom they might represent; but it is a fact, and it ought to be stated in that connection, as shown by the act of Parliament, which was put in the RECORD by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES], that the sole control of the equalization fund in Great Britain is in the British treasury.

Mr. WALCOTT. I realize that fact, Mr. President; but I am still of the opinion that this proposal at this time, unless the power is entrusted to a committee instead of to one man, is very dangerous.

With reference to the gold now residing within the Federal Reserve and belonging to the Federal Reserve, let us assume that the proposed devaluation of the dollar, or the practical devaluation of the dollar, taking it today at approximately 40-percent shrinkage, represents that proportion of the gold which might be freed from the Federal Reserve without doing any injury to the gold base of the certificates of the Federal Reserve. That, I believe, is a true statement. I see no harm in the Federal Government laying its hands upon that gold and giving some quid pro quo.

The gold certificates which the Federal Reserve is to receive for its gold, or part of its gold, are to be regulated solely by the edict of the Secretary of the Treasury. It may be a safe edict, or it may be an edict that will, perhaps, destroy the Federal Reserve. Either one is conceivable. I do not wish to raise a bugaboo. I do not wish to raise suspicions. I have no question at all with reference to the present administration or the Secretary of the Treasury. He is not, in my opinion, going to do the Federal Reserve System harm by nullifying those gold certificates, but I am looking into the future when the Secretary of the Treasury might be a wild man; and to put such absolute power in his hands to enable him to say, because of some whim, perhaps, whether those gold certificates shall be either redeemable or transferable or negotiable, is to my mind a dangerous thing, and should not be contemplated.

Let us say that the amount of that gold is somewhere between three and a half and four billion dollars. In the testimony before the committee it was estimated at $4,000,000,000; and if the estimate is correct that a dollar in the Treasury represents a credit of eight to ten dollars, we have available additional credit on the part of the Federal Government which would be the equivalent of between thirty and forty billions of dollars, ample for all possible needs, of course.

In addition to that, the Federal Government by a bookkeeping entry can credit itself with this so-called "profit gold". It is not really profit gold. There is no more gold than there was before, but the Federal Government is taking it. It is divided with the Federal Reserve because the Government has taken a certain amount of gold out of the dollar, leaving the Federal Reserve with as much gold back of its issues as it had before, and that presumably gives the Federal Government the right to take the gold away.

Very well. It leaves only half as much gold, or approximately half as much gold, in the Federal Reserve as it had before; but if the dollar after devaluation contains only half as much gold, the same number of dollars would have the same protection or metallic base that they had before, whether it be 40, 45, or 50 percent. It is over 50 percent today.

Then, let us say that that credit is available. By a bookkeeping entry the Federal Government can deduct from its deficit this year, as a credit, whatever that amount might be. So that if our deficit this year should prove to be $10,000,000,000, the Federal Government could automatically on receipt of that gold stock, credit the gold against the deficit and thus reduce the deficit from ten billions to, let us say, six billions of dollars. Those are only approximate figures; but that would be a very salutary procedure for the Federal Government. That will approach a balance of the Budget by $4,000,000,000.

I cannot think of the Federal Government laying its hands upon all the gold of the Federal Reserve. I do not believe it is necessary. I do not believe it will serve any good purpose. While it is conceivable that practically the Federal Reserve System might not suffer, depending on the attitude of the Secretary of the Treasury toward the gold certificates, and that is embodied in the bill, I believe that the sentimental effect, the public effect, the psychology of the public toward the Federal Reserve notes, the member banks' feeling toward that act, will be very disastrous and that we should not contemplate it. I hope, therefore, that the amendment to let the Government take over only such gold as is covered by the devaluation of the dollar may be offered and that it may prevail.

With those changes in the bill, Mr. President, I personally could support the bill enthusiastically, and I believe that it would be entirely sound and perhaps a very, very valuable piece of legislation for us to enact at this time.

I shall take only about 3 minutes more, but I desire to conclude with a reference to the world currency situation. It is a big subject, but I can review it very briefly.

It seems to me that we are contemplating perhaps the most important legislation in the last three or four generation in this country at the most critical time, monetarily speaking, the world has ever known.

Europe today is seething with war rumors. Hungary wants a revision of the Versailles Treaty, and to extend her boundaries. Austria is being squeezed out. Italy is afraid of the peace of Europe if France is in any way enfeebled.

France has three fears now instead of one.

One is taxes. She is unable to collect the tremendous taxes that she is now forced to levy upon her people in order to come anywhere near balancing her budget.

Second. She is desperately afraid that by our acts and by our competition with England in world trade, exports, and currency revision she is faced with a possible devaluation for a second time of her franc. She devalued the franc by 80 percent only a few years ago. She is faced today with consideration of another devaluation of the franc, which now, in our terms of gold, is worth approximately 4 cents, against 20 cents a few years ago.

Third. She has still the fear, ingrained in her for generations since 1870, and more acute today than it ever was before, in my opinion, of an armed Germany. I am told on pretty good authority that Germany today has her third quota of trained troops. Under the Versailles Treaty she is allowed a hundred thousand men as a police force. There are three rounds, or 300,000 trained and fully armed troops in Germany today, I am told, while France has possibly 500,000 or 550,000 as an effective army. In addition to that, Germany is training and drilling men in every town and every hamlet all over the country, so that it is estimated that today 3,000,000 men in Germany are drilling.

Germany has her back against the wall. Hungary wants to be a strong power again, a political entity, and does not want to be part of Germany. Austria does not want to be squeezed out. France has an alliance with Poland with respect to the Polish Corridor. A decision as to that corridor may be put off for a long time.

What is to restrain Germany, what is to stabilize Europe? There is one thing that would be a greater deterrent to war than anything else of which I can think, and that is a combination between England and France and the United States, which, of course, would include Canada and Australia, to bring about stabilized currencies. They could then state positively whether those countries which are bordering on war today, which are snarling at each other's throats, should have the credits necessary to enable them to go on. Without those credits—and they are absolutely vital to the prosecution of any war—peace would be assured.

We stand today as a neutral nation, and by the force of circumstances are almost completely isolated. Those circumstances are largely the result of Uncle Sam being the most generous lender in the world and the poorest collector in the world, as evidenced by the billions of dollars which are owed to us. We are forced by the circumstances of a situation, which is more acute than any ever known in the world's history, to follow a policy of more or less complete economic isolation.

The result of the reduction in the exchange value of our dollar has, in my opinion, very materially helped us in our exports, and while we have not yet felt fully the effect of that reduction, the curve which represents our exports is on the upgrade, and I think will continue on the upgrade with the passage of this bill, if the bill can be amended so that it will be safe.

I am inclined to think that if this bill can be amended so as to include these three important safeguards, which would keep our Federal Reserve System alive and in full credit before the people of the country, and place an emergency limit on the time, we will see a very marked revival of business, a reasonable expansion of our credit adapted to the growing needs of business, and, as a result, a considerable rise in commodity prices.

Mr. President, this is a very brief statement of a very big subject, but the hour is late and I will conclude with this one sentence. I hope this body, without prejudice, without the slightest partisan feeling, without an atom of political bias, will see fit to make this measure safe in the opinion of the experts we have been hearing for the last week, adopt these amendments, and pass the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the first amendment of the committee.

The first amendment of the committee was, on page 2, to strike out beginning in line 15 through line 17 on page 3, as follows:

(b) Section 16 of the Federal Reserve Act, as amended, is further amended by striking out the word "gold", where it first appears in the last sentence of the first paragraph (U.S.C., title 12, sec. 411) of said section 16, and inserting in lieu thereof the words "lawful money"; and by striking out the phrase "in gold or lawful money", where it appears in said sentence; by striking out the word "gold" and the ensuing comma, and the words "gold or" wherever in section 16 they are immediately followed by the words "gold certificates"; by striking out the word "gold" in the first sentence of the third paragraph (U.S.C., title 12, sec. 413) of said section 16 where it follows the words "shall be counted as part of the", by inserting after the word "gold" the word "certificates" wherever it now appears in said section 16, not immediately followed by the word "certificates", except in the sixteenth paragraph (U.S.C., title 12, sec. 467) of said section 16, and except where the same is stricken out by this section; by striking out the word "coin" where it appears after the phrase "deposits of gold" in the first sentence of the sixteenth paragraph; by striking out the words "gold coin or" where they appear after the words "shall be payable in" in the third sentence of the sixteenth paragraph; and by striking out all of the third sentence of the sixteenth paragraph after the words "such Federal Reserve agent", and inserting in lieu thereof a period; and by striking out the words "gold deposits" in the eighteenth paragraph and inserting in lieu thereof the words "deposits made under this section."

And to insert in lieu thereof the following:

(b) Section 16 of the Federal Reserve Act, as amended, is further amended in the following respects:

(1) The third sentence of the first paragraph is amended to read as follows: "They shall be redeemed in lawful money on demand at the Treasury Department of the United States, in the city of Washington, District of Columbia, or at any Federal Reserve bank."

(2) So much of the third sentence of the second paragraph as precedes the proviso is amended to read as follows: "The collateral security thus offered shall be notes, drafts, bills of exchange, or acceptances acquired under the provisions of section 13 of this act, or bills of exchange endorsed by a member bank of any Federal Reserve district and purchased under the provisions of section 14 of this act, or bankers' acceptances purchased under the provisions of said section 14, or gold certificates: ".

(3) The first sentence of the third paragraph is amended to read as follows: "Every Federal Reserve bank shall maintain reserves in gold certificates or lawful money of not less than 35 percent against its deposits and reserves in gold certificates of not less than 40 percent against its Federal Reserve notes in actual circulation: Provided, however, That when the Federal Reserve agent holds gold certificates as collateral for Federal Reserve notes issued to the bank such gold certificates shall be counted as part of the reserve which such bank is required to maintain against its Federal Reserve notes in actual circulation."

(4) The fifth and sixth sentences of the third paragraph are amended to read as follows: "Notes presented for redemption at the Treasury of the United States shall be paid out of the redemption fund and returned to the Federal Reserve banks through which they were originally issued, and thereupon such Federal Reserve bank shall, upon demand of the Secretary of the Treasury, reimburse such redemption fund in lawful money or, if such Federal Reserve notes have been redeemed by the Treasurer in gold certificates, then such funds shall be reimbursed to the extent deemed necessary by the Secretary of the Treasury in gold certificates, and such Federal Reserve bank shall, so long as any of its Federal Reserve notes remain outstanding, maintain with the Treasurer in gold certificates an amount sufficient in the judgment of the Secretary to provide for all redemptions to be made by the Treasurer. Federal Reserve notes received by the Treasurer otherwise than for redemption may be exchanged for gold certificates out of the redemption fund hereinafter provided and returned to the Reserve bank through which they were originally issued, or they may be returned to such bank for the credit of the United States."

(5) The fourth, fifth, and sixth paragraphs are amended to read as follows:

"The Federal Reserve Board shall require each Federal Reserve bank to maintain on deposit in the Treasury of the United States a sum in gold certificates sufficient in the judgment of the Secretary of the Treasury for the redemption of the Federal Reserve notes issued to such bank, but in no event less than 5 percent of the total amount of notes issued less the amount of gold certificates held by the Federal Reserve agent as collateral security; but such deposit of gold certificates shall be counted and included as part of the 40 percent reserve hereinbefore required. The Board shall have the right, acting through the Federal Reserve agent, to grant in whole or in part, or to reject entirely, the application of any Federal Reserve bank for Federal Reserve notes; but to the extent that such application may be granted the Federal Reserve Board shall, through its local Federal Reserve agent, supply Federal Reserves notes to the banks so applying, and such bank shall be charged with the amount of notes issued to it and shall pay such rate of interest as may be established by the Federal Reserve Board on only that amount of such notes which equals the total amount of its outstanding Federal Reserve notes less the amount of gold certificates held by the Federal Reserve agent as collateral security. Federal Reserve notes issued to any such bank shall, upon delivery, together with such notes of such Federal Reserve bank as may be issued under section 18 of this act upon security of United States 2 percent Government bonds, become a first and paramount lien on all the assets of such bank.

"Any Federal Reserve bank may at any time reduce its liability for outstanding Federal Reserve notes by depositing with the Federal Reserve agent its Federal Reserve notes, gold certificates, or lawful money of the United States. Federal Reserve notes so deposited shall not be reissued, except upon compliance with the conditions of an original issue.

"The Federal Reserve agent shall hold such gold certificates or lawful money available exclusively for exchange for the outstanding Federal Reserve notes when offered by the Reserve bank of which he is a director. Upon the request of the Secretary of the Treasury the Federal Reserve Board shall require the Federal Reserve agent to transmit to the Treasurer of the United States so much of the gold certificates held by him as collateral security for Federal Reserve notes as may be required for the exclusive purpose of the redemption of such Federal Reserve notes, but such gold certificates when deposited with the Treasurer shall be counted and considered as if collateral security on deposit with the Federal Reserve agent."

(6) The eighth paragraph is amended to read as follows:

"All Federal Reserve notes and all gold certificates and lawful money issued to or deposited with any Federal Reserve agent under the provisions of the Federal Reserve Act shall hereafter be held for such agent, under such rules and regulations as the Federal Reserve Board may prescribe, in the joint custody of himself and the Federal Reserve bank to which he is accredited. Such agent and such Federal Reserve bank shall be jointly liable for the safekeeping of such Federal Reserve notes, gold certificates, and lawful money. Nothing herein contained, however, shall be construed to prohibit a Federal Reserve agent from depositing gold certificates with the Federal Reserve Board, to be held by such Board subject to his order, or with the Treasurer of the United States for the purposes authorized by law."

(7) The sixteenth paragraph is amended to read as follows:

"The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to receive deposits of gold or of gold certificates with the Treasurer or any Assistant Treasurer of the United States when tendered by any Federal Reserve bank or Federal Reserve agent for credit to its or his account with the Federal Reserve Board. The Secretary shall prescribe by regulation the form of receipt to be issued by the Treasurer or Assistant Treasurer to the Federal Reserve bank or Federal Reserve agent making the deposit, and a duplicate of such receipt shall be delivered to the Federal Reserve Board by the Treasurer at Washington upon proper advices from any Assistant Treasurer that such deposit has been made. Deposits so made shall be held subject to the orders of the Federal Reserve Board and shall be payable in gold certificates on the order of the Federal Reserve Board to any Federal Reserve bank or Federal Reserve agent at the Treasury or at the Subtreasury of the United States nearest the place of business of such Federal Reserve bank or such Federal Reserve agent. The order used by the Federal Reserve Board in making such payments shall be signed by the governor or vice governor, or such other officers or members as the Board may by regulation prescribe. The form of such order shall be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury."

(8) The eighteenth paragraph is amended to read as follows:

"Deposits made under this section standing to the credit of any Federal Reserve bank with the Federal Reserve Board shall, at the option of said bank, be counted as part of the lawful reserve which it is required to maintain against outstanding Federal Reserve notes, or as a part of the reserve it is required to maintain against deposits."

Mr. FESS. Mr. President——

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not think there is any objection to this amendment, and we will take a recess after it shall have been acted on.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

INVESTIGATION OF AIR MAIL AND OCEAN MAIL CONTRACTS

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate I report back favorably with amendments Senate Resolution 143, submitted on January 16, 1934, by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK], who asks for the immediate consideration of the resolution.

Mr. FESS. Let the resolution be read.

The resolution was read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 2, line 13, it is proposed to strike out " $25,000 " and to insert in lieu thereof " $20,000 ", so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved, That in addition to the authority conferred upon the special committee of the Senate to investigate air mail and ocean mail contracts, created under Senate Resolution No. 349, Seventy-second Congress, second session, agreed to February 25, 1933, and supplemented by Senate Resolution No. 94, Seventy-third Congress, first session, agreed to June 10, 1933, and for carrying out the objects of such resolutions, the committee shall have authority (1) to make full investigation of the minutes, stockholdings, and financial transactions with each other or with the Government of all individuals, associations, partnerships, or corporations engaged in the business of carrying air mail or ocean mail or the manufacture of aircraft, aircraft engines, parts, or accessories thereof, and of all associations, partnerships, or corporations associated, directly or indirectly, with any of such associations, partnerships, or corporations, by stockholdings, interlocking directorates, or contracts by, between, or through intermediate corporations or individuals, or otherwise; and (2) to investigate fully all contracts and relations with each other and with the Government officials or departments of any such individual, association, partnership, or corporation.

Resolved further, That the limit of expenditures under such resolutions is hereby increased by $20,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

RECESS

Mr. FLETCHER. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 30 minutes p.m.) the Senate took a recess until tomorrow, Thursday, January 25, 1934, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 24, 1934

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Blessed Master and Savior, with love and longing we approach Thee; so often our peace wrestles with anxiety. Our highest thoughts, our rarest tears, our holiest griefs, our divinest yearnings, and our tenderest loves are sanctified at Thy holy feet. This is the testimony which the tempted and the tried unite in giving in every age and of every creed. We come; put Thy hand upon us, O God, and mold us into the faultless embodiment of a splendid manhood. May we bend to the unfortunate and succor the weak; O let this be the liturgy of our lives and the outpouring of our hearts, and their throbs shall be a daily psalm of praise to Thy excellent name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 2. An act for the relief of C. M. Williamson; Mrs. Tura Liljenquist, administratrix of C. E. Liljenquist, deceased; Lottie Redman; and H N. Smith;

S. 170. An act for the relief of Patrick Henry Walsh;

S. 177. An act for the relief of Woodhouse Chain Works;

S. 308. An act to authorize the award of a decoration for distinguished service to Harry H. Horton;

S. 326. An act referring the claims of the Turtle Mountain Band or Bands of Chippewa Indians of North Dakota to the Court of Claims for adjudication and settlement;

S. 375. An act to reimburse the estate of Mary Agnes Roden;

S. 376. An act for the relief of Beatrice I. Manges;

S. 406. An act for the relief of Warren J. Clear;

S. 407. An act for the relief of Willie B. Cleverly;

S. 750. An act for the relief of the Lebanon Equity Exchange, of Lebanon, Nebr.;

S. 751. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States to refund to the Farmers' Grain Co., of Omaha, Nebr., income taxes illegally paid to the United States Treasurer;

S. 785. An act for the relief of Elizabeth Bolger;

S. 1069. An act authorizing adjustment of the claim of the Chicago, North Shore & Milwaukee Railroad Co.;

S. 1073. An act for the relief of E. Walter Edwards;

S. 1074. An act authorizing adjustment of the claims of John T. Lennon and George T. Flora;

S. 1079. An act authorizing adjustment of the claim of Francis B. Kennedy;

S. 1081. An act for the relief of McKimmon & McKee, Inc.;

S. 1083. An act authorizing adjustment of the claim of the Potomac Electric Power Co., of Washington, D.C.;

S. 1085. An act authorizing adjustment of the claim of Schutte & Koerting Co.;

S. 1087. An act authorizing adjustment of the claim of William T. Stiles;

S. 1089. An act for the relief of James R. Young;

S. 1115. An act to authorize the Department of Agriculture to issue a duplicate check in favor of Department of Forests and Waters, Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, the original check having been lost;

TREASURY AND POST OFFICE DEPARTMENTS APPROPRIATION BILL—FISCAL YEAR 1935

Mr. ARNOLD, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported the bill (H.R. 7295) making appropriations for the Treasury and Post Office Departments for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and for other purposes (Rept. No. 337), which was read a first and second time and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered printed.

Mr. TABER reserved all points of order.

LETTER FROM THE LEAGUE OF WISCONSIN MINICIPALITIES

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a letter received from the League of Municipalities of Wisconsin.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter expressing opinion on matters of vital importance to the cities and villages of Wisconsin:

LEAGUE OF WISCONSIN MUNICIPALITIES,
114 NORTH CARROLL STREET,
Madison, Wis., January 22, 1934.

Congressman GEORGE W. BLANCHARD,
House Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. BLANCHARD: On behalf of the 302 member municipalities, the executive committee of the League of Wisconsin Municipalities herewith transmits for your consideration an expression of opinion upon certain matters of vital importance to the cities and villages of Wisconsin. The executive committee urges that you, as a Wisconsin legislative representative at Washington, give your support in behalf of the following matters:

(1) That additional funds be appropriated by Congress to permit the continuation during the present economic emergency of the Civil Works program upon such a basis as will provide work for unemployed citizens in distress.

(2) That there be eliminated the existing discrimination against Wisconsin municipalities in that sewer and water extensions are being rejected as Civil Works projects, although they are being approved in other States. Sewer and water extensions are particularly well suited to Wisconsin's severe winter climate, since the cost of thawing the ground is largely offset by the elimination of the necessity of shoring the sides, whereas many other socially useful projects are impossible in winter weather.

(3) That additional funds be made available for the continuation of the public works program and that the terms as to collateral be liberalized so as to make clear that mortgage bonds, optional payment securities, and special assessment bonds are eligible. Many Wisconsin municipalities have submitted projects which were not approved, either because the application was not approved while funds were still available or because of technicalities.

(4) That there be created by Congress, either independent or as an adjunct of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, an agency to furnish the necessary credit to municipalities upon their securities, either tax-anticipation warrants or otherwise. The normal credit channels for municipalities have been largely frozen, despite the fact that municipal services must be continued instead of curtailed, as is possible in industry. In fact, the depression has created additional responsibilities for municipalities in the form of relief, educational and recreational facilities, etc. It appears just as important that the Federal Government aid municipalities to finance their activities as it does to aid private corporations, as has been done by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

Your attention is also called to the fact that at the last convention of the League of Wisconsin Municipalities the delegates unanimously urged the ratification of the treaty between the United States and Canada providing for the development of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence waterway, and that the delegates likewise urged the enactment of a law by Congress to authorize Postal Savings banks to accept municipal deposits and to permit checking against such accounts by municipalities.

It is hoped that you will find it possible to give your attention to the matters discussed in this communication and to aid in procuring favorable consideration thereto.

Respectfully submitted.

EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE,
LEAGUE OF WISCONSIN MUNICIPALITIES,
By FREDERICK N. MACMILLIN, Executive Secretary.

DEAF AND DUMB SHIPS

Mr. KNUTE HILL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including therein an article by Mr. Wayne Francis Palmer, a former naval officer, published in the New Outlook, edited by Alfred E. Smith.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is this writer a retired naval officer?

Mr. KNUTE HILL. He is a former naval officer. I do not know whether he is retired or not.

Mr. BLANTON. Is that an article for which he has received so much per from the New Outlook?

Mr. KNUTE HILL. I could not say, but it is printed in the New Outlook, published by Alfred E. Smith.

Mr. BLANTON. A great many retired naval officers and retired Army officers are writing articles and putting them in magazines for so much per.

Mr. KNUTE HILL. I think this is a matter of information for ourselves as well as others.

Mr. BLANTON. Is it information that is worth something to the country?

Mr. KNUTE HILL. It certainly is.

Mr. BLANTON. Is it information that is boosting this big Navy proposal to spend an additional $300,000,000 that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. VINSON] is seeking to put on the Navy bill now without any authority of law?

Mr. KNUTE HILL. No.

Mr. BLANTON. There is nothing like that advocating this extra $300,000,000 incorporated in the article?

Mr. KNUTE HILL. No.

Mr. BLANTON. Then, I shall not object. But until the President of the United States tells us that spending this additional $300,000,000 for naval construction is absolutely necessary, and until the President specially requests it as a part of his recovery plans and policies, I am for saving this $300,000,000.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

Mr. KNUTE HILL. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article on the subject of Naval Communications:

[From New Outlook of November 1933]

In the next great battle at sea it will be a toss-up as to whether the greatest danger will come from the enemy fleet, or each fleet will constitute the greatest danger to itself. It is becoming increasingly apparent that the three great naval powers have developed fleets so vast that, in the confusion of a major naval engagement, it will be highly difficult to operate them as well-directed offensive units. This condition, common to all navies, is not occasioned by any fault or omission in our own service, but rather by the failure of naval communications to keep pace with the rapid improvement in the other technical branches. Particularly have they not kept pace with other developments that tend to make the transmission of messages more difficult.

Communications are not spectacular like gunnery, the major sport of the services. Signals in a football game are not of interest to the spectators. They like to see the backs running with the ball, but it is the signals that make or break a team, and so it will be in the next great sea struggle.

It has been decided by stategists to mass together practically all of our modern sea strength in a single unit—the United States Fleet; but mass alone is not sufficient to guarantee victory. In the year 907 A.D. 10,000 Russian vessels, carrying 400,000 men, sailed down the Dneiper River, across the Black Sea to attack Constantinople. They were commanded by Igor, son of Rurik, the Swedish adventurer who became the first ruler of Russia. In desperation the Grecian Emperor attempted to buy them off, but all such overtures were rejected. Only 15 Byzantine warships were available for the defense of the capital, but these 15 ships resisted the attack of the savage hordes and sent Igor in retreat with only half a dozen vessels left in his command. The boarding tactics of the Russians were met with streams of flame and their men and ships were destroyed. The Greeks had a word for it—"Greek fire."

Mass was insufficient to bring victory to the armada of Spain; and Jellico found out at Jutland that mass can be a liability as well as an aid.

The greatest number of ships operating as a fleet, the greater the requirement of unifying factors in order that one man may direct their destinies. Homogeneity gained by years of drilling, thorough organization, and indoctrination capped by genius of command, makes a fighting force or just ships. This homogeneity in time of battle can only be maintained through the rapid, accurate intership exchange of information and instructions.

It may appear that the problem of controlling 150 ships today is simple compared with handling Igor's 10,000 vessels, or those of the Spanish armada. Today's problem is one of great spaces and distances, operations under, on, and over the sea, and a vast distribution of ships. At low visibility, for instance, with 35-knot light cruisers acting as scouts and cruising in opposite directions, the duration of the contact is a matter of seconds. In night actions, it is a brush and then away. A battle of only 5 hours' duration may actually cover as much as a thousand square miles of the sea's surface. Contrast this with the Armada making its leisurely way up the English Channel. Day by day it was attacked and gradually worn away by the sniping tactics of Britain's seamen. Not wishing to miss the fun and seeing the English successes, professional soldiers and large landholders along the Channel, unused to the sea, hired ships, manned and equipped them, and sailed forth to join the fight. The slow development of battles of the remote past offers no criterion for the future. Only the rapidity of action in the last war can be a gage as to what may be expected in the next.

Communications between ships at sea may be by means of flag hoists where each flag represents a letter of the alphabet, or a number between 1 and 10, and where, by means of a code, one hoist may change the course, speed, and disposition of the entire fleet. When a signal is hoisted on the flagship, it is immediately repeated through the entire fleet as fast as it can be read from the ships ahead. When all ships show the proper signal, the flagship jerks down its hoist as the signal of execution and all ships follow suit.

In every direction the buntings, which have given a gala appearance to the fleet, have disappeared as if by magic. The great battleships wheel slowly toward a new alignment. The speedy cruisers dash through their formations, tearing ahead as fast as express trains. A hundred destroyers scatter and charge in every direction. Order? It is wild disorder. Pandemonium seems to have broken loose. The sea is crossed and crisscrossed with the churned white wakes of a fleet gone mad. Then suddenly it all takes shape again. The big fellows steady on their new course. The cruisers have taken up their scouting positions in the van, or on the wings. Each little destroyer hugs the great ship under its charge, or away they dash to the attack looking for all the world like a flock of ducks skimming the surface of the water.

This was a perfect maneuver. The weather, however, was clear; but with low visibility, smoke screens, artificial fog or real fog, or the accumulated smoke from boilers and gunfire in an area through which the engaged fleets have fought previously—the question becomes much more serious. The exposed positions of signalmen and flag hoists make for early casualties to men and material. Flag signaling becomes impractical and undependable. This, of course, also applies to wigwagging and semaphore, both of which are harbor aids only.

One delightful spring dawn in 1918, off Bergen on the Norwegian coast, two divisions of battleships, with a force of light cruisers and destroyers, were safeguarding a great convoy of merchant ships, and at the same time were supporting the American minelaying squadron while they dropped 5,000 more "eggs" in their vast program of bottling up the North Sea. Admiral Hugh Rodman, United States Navy, in supreme command, was flying his flag from the battleship U.S.S. New York. It was a proud day for all the Americans because, while the admiral was the toughest inspection officer that ever trod the decks of a ship, he was greatly beloved by officers and men, not the least cause of which was the splendid efficiency that he demanded of the forces under his command.

The beauty of the high rugged cliffs of Norway are well known, but on that morning as the sun rose over them, blinding out all detail of the mighty rocks below, it was a sight to move the soul. A signal hoist on the New York brought the force on the bridges of the ships astern back to the task at hand. It was the breaking up of the night steaming formation with a change of course and speed. The signal was being repeated by the ships astern when suddenly the New York was enveloped by the cliffs of Norway, which actually were dense fog banks. The hoist on the flagship was suddenly lowered before all astern had caught the signal. Bedlam followed. All ships found themselves traveling at almost full speed in a fog so thick that the wheelsman could not see the officer of the deck 20 feet away. The signal on the New York was executed by some; by others it had not been acknowledged; some had not even seen it; and others recognized the signal, but did not consider that the order of execution had been given. The miracles of the Bible shrink to insignificance compared with what happened. Fifty ships dashed in every direction—blind, but tearing along at great speed; light cruisers sliding across the sterns of battleships so close that an agile jumper could have leaped from one to the other; and destroyers attempting to cling onto the quarters of the great ships they must always accompany like pilot fish hanging onto the belly of a shark.

Major disasters were averted a hundred times—not by skill, because there was no chance for skill, but because the fates who sat above the fog, in laying out the courses for those ships, had planned no tragedy to mar that beautiful spring morning. But it took 14 hours to reassemble all those ships in orderly formation again. There was, of course, no criticism of anyone. It had been merely a chance of the sea. Fortune had smiled, and there were no collisions, but best of all there had been no enemy at hand to destroy the scattered forces piecemeal.

Indifference to such a performance cannot be countenanced now, because we know that effective fog banks can and will be artificially created during the next general fleet engagement.

The interchange of signals between two ships is effectively accomplished by means of the blinker. This is a powerful searchlight with a shutter intercepting its rays and, by means of a handle, it can be opened and shut rapidly, much like a telegraph key, to send dot-and-dash signals. This method is limited to effective reception by only one ship. For general fleet signaling the blinker must be elimnated, because general signals must be instantly and simultaneously distributed throughout the entire fleet.

Obviously, radio suggests a proper solution. If the admiral in command could talk directly to all flag and commanding officers without fear of interruption, the problem would be solved. The lack of secrecy is no factor once the enemy fleet is engaged. The use of uncoded messages under this condition is standard practice in some navies. For the enemy to share in information regarding maneuvers merely permits the ear knowledge that will be gained by the eye a few seconds later.

The difficulties with the radio are just as familiar to all ashore as they are to the technicians afloat. Interference between stations ashore is too common to require explanation. Every talent of the Federal Radio Commission, the broadcasting companies, and those engaged in the manufacture of radio equipment has been directed to clarify this perplexing difficulty. The same problem exists at sea, because if the answer had been found there it would be exploited ashore.

When two great fleets next meet it will be necessary to keep open hundreds of air channels. In each fleet there will be the orders going out and information coming in among about 150 ships, and there will be several hundred airplanes sending and receiving scouting and operating information. In addition, a new duty has been imposed on radio since the last war, and that is the control of gunfire. Airplanes must talk with their mother ships and advise them as to the accuracy of their fire. Ships no longer fire individually but as a division, so that gunnery control officers must talk with their corresponding numbers on the adjoining ships. Assuming perfect conditions, it would still be a bedlam, and in battle conditions are not perfect. The giving and receiving of sustained heavy fire imposes conditions upon delicate wireless instruments that will not allow them to hold to the narrow air channels allotted to them. Direct hits at an early stage of the battle will put whole units out of communication.

The most serious difficulty that radio must face is the jamming of the air by the enemy. We know the frightful rumpus that comes over our radios when the neighbor's oil burner starts the devils to screeching just as Will Rogers gets to the point of one of his jokes, or just as Rudy Vallée swings into one of his waltzes. This is just what happens intentionally when the air is jammed, only it is done on a much larger scale.

The Russians and Germans were quite adept at this mode of interference. One night during the World War, as the Turkish-German battle cruiser Goeben lay off Constantinople, a signal came through announcing that a certain advance Turkish wireless and observation station was being attacked by a Russian landing party. The message came through clear and distinct. It was followed by a few words of a second message. Then the Goeben was unable to hear more because the air was filled with screeching and howling.

It seemed a real opportunity to cut off the attacking forces, so the Goeben raced through the Bosporus into the Black Sea. Once outside the trap was sprung and the entire Russian Black Sea Fleet passed between her and the Bosporus. They had sent the first message. The second garbled attempt, blotted out by the Russians, was a denial by the wireless station that it was being molested. The plan had been well executed, and now the Goeben's calls for help were unable to penetrate the Russian jamming. It was only by steaming to sea and by making a fast and daring end run that she ever saw port again.

It is reasonable to assume that the art of air jamming has kept pace with the splendid advancement of radio. Any military research organization when developing a new weapon or procedure must work out a method to counteract it. The fleet that goes into the next great battle at sea depending on radio as its principal method of communication risks disaster.

The Battle of Dogger Banks offered to the British an opportunity to annihilate the German battle-cruiser force in payment for their raids on undefended English coast towns. Caught red-handed by a superior force, they fled for home. The British, with greater speed and heavier guns, directed a deadly and accurate fire that soon reduced the Blucher to a wreck. The others were fairly ripe for the picking when a chance shot struck the admiral's flagship, the Lion, disabling her and forcing Admiral Beatty to turn the control over to the second in command. The wireless on the Lion was out of commission. The flag hoist was incorrectly understood, and it resulted in the abandonment of the chase by the British and the escape of the remaining German cruisers, although severely damaged. A failure in communication had denied a victory to Britain that she had well earned.

In the early stages of the Battle of Jutland Admiral Beatty had 2 divisions of battle cruisers and 1 division of the Queen Elizabeths, the fastest and most powerful battleships afloat. Upon receiving the first reports of the approach of the enemy battle cruisers he hoisted a flag signal to alter course. The battleships did not see the signal and it was not repeated by either wireless or blinker, with the result that they dropped 10 miles astern and were 30 minutes late in opening fire. When Beatty's cruisers opened fire on the German light forces a second error in communications caused a concentration of fire on certain ships and left others free to hammer the British line. Undoubtedly this accounted for the early destruction of the Indefatigable and the Queen Mary, which blew up, leaving only a column of smoke to represent all that was left of those two proud ships. These two serious errors in communication resulted in a severe initial defeat for Admiral Beatty's force of 10 capital ships by only half that number under Admiral Von Hipper.

Later in the day, after the entire British Grand Fleet had unleashed its fury against the entire German High Seas Fleet with about as devastating an effect as a good boisterous pillow fight, Jellico's forces settled down for the night between the Germans and their base. Tactically the situation was ideal. Von Scheer must take the High Seas Fleet around the British, which maneuver was most difficult, or he must cut his way through a force 50 percent superior to his own. The latter plan was unbelievable, so the forces of Britain awaited the 18 hours of June 1 daylight to wipe out every vestige of Germany's challenge to their command of the seas. They awaited only the dawn to strike the blow that would end the war in the summer of 1916.

Admiral Von Scheer decided to do the unbelievable and took his 100 ships through 150 ships of the Grand Fleet. He was fortunate in penetrating the light forces in the rear of Jellico's battle fleet, but many a terrific fight resulted. Ships loomed out of the dark at distances of only hundreds of yards, where they had fought at thousands the day before. In one case ships collided and were unable to depress their guns low enough to blast one another to atoms. Ships were destroyed, never to be heard of again; ships were blown out of the water at point-blank range.

In spite of these numerous actions and contacts between 10 at night and 2 in the morning, Jellico had no knowledge of what had transpired until the Admiralty advised him by wireless at 5 minutes of 4 that the prey had escaped his grasp. Too few signals had been sent, and even these had not been received on the flagship. A gross blunder in communications was again to be the cause of the most bitter disappointment of the war. Controversies have raged over this without abatement for 18 years, but, unfortunately, they have turned on personalities and not to the core of the trouble—failure in communications.

The question of instant identification of men-of-war is the constant dread of the commanding and watch officers of every ship at sea. If they are of the enemy, they must be destroyed; if they are friends, they must be protected and prevented from destroying you. In the World War ships were furnished with recognition signals. A battleship suddenly looms out of the mist. A combination of lights appears above her—a red, a purple, and a green. You answer with a yellow, a red, and a white. An error means that guns all ready for action will fire. A different system of identification was used for eight different classes of ships, and each system changed every 12 hours. Some changed on daylight time, others on Greenwich time, some at noon, and some at odd intervals—but the watch officer was always responsible for an error.

An example of the seriousness of the problems that were faced occurred in the early fall of 1918. It was obvious that the German nation was weakening, and the Allied control in the North Sea prepared for and expected that last-minute fanatical attempts would be made by German battle cruisers to break out into the Atlantic to pursue a course of commerce destruction and disorganization until they themselves were destroyed.

The bulk of the Grand Fleet was at anchor at Rosyth, Firth of Forth, while at the sub-Arctic base at Scapa Flow the sixth battle squadron of five United States battleships and the second battle cruiser squadron, with supporting light cruisers and destroyers—all under the command of Admiral Hugh Rodman, United States Navy—stood guard over the exits from the North Sea.

It had been just 10 years since the launching of the battle cruiser Australia, and all that time a sealed compartment filled with champagne of the same vintage as that used at the christening had awaited this day of the tenth anniversary to see the seal broken. The Royal Australian Navy was indeed a royal host until the celebration was rudely interrupted by a peremptory demand that all officers return immediately to their ships. Going down the gangway, they saw their boats almost standing on ends. The angry water snatched at them as they leaped into their careening boats. At their own ships they found hundreds of men busily engaged in taking in gangways and securing boats on deck. Up forward a light showed the chief boatswain and his crew ready to shorten up the anchor chain. The donkey engine raced and scraped as it was tested without load.

The reason—a wireless had come in from a patrol in the North Sea: "German battle cruisers steaming hard for Pentland Firth." After many tedious months of waiting, months of soul-trying preparation for the big opportunity, the time had come and they were running right into our arms. Best of all, an American fighting admiral was to lead the combined British and American squadrons into battle.

Pentland Firth, about 20 miles of the meanest salt water to be found, lies between the headlands of Scotland and the Orkney Islands, the mud flats of which enclose one of the finest harbors in the world—Scapa Flow. In a few minutes the New York led the way to sea. On a calm day Pentland Firth, with its cross currents and natural cussedness, will suddenly throw up a wave that has been known to snatch twoscore men from the forecastle of a battleship. That night it was in rare form.

The ships took up a patrol position at the western exit into the Atlantic. In order to cover a larger area the battle cruisers, with their greater speed, were sent forward; then they retraced part of their way, only to advance again—and thus they kept up this backstitching advance throughout the night.

Two more signals from patrols were received marking the progress of the Germans, but our ships were ready for them. Their only chance was to slip through in the absolute blackness of the night. All hands stood ready at battle stations—tense, ready for the kill.

Dawn came early, and in its first rays three battle cruisers were seen approaching at high speed on a parallel course but not over half a mile distant. Their guns were trained on our ships and ours on them. The first salvos could not help but blow ships out of the water. A miss was impossible. Guns were loaded and ready to fire when "the enemy", making out the distinctive basket masts of the American battleships, sent up a recognition signal and prevented a ghastly tragedy. "The enemy" was the second battle cruiser squadron and included the host of the night before.

There was no other enemy, and to this day not even Admiral Rodman can explain the origin of the patrol reports. The mystery of these messages stands at the Admiralty as well, because our ships acted under its authority. There was, apparently, a series of mistaken identities by patrols, or some wag of a German submarine commander greatly enjoyed his hoax.

A heartbreaking incident occurred off Blyth in the North Sea. A British decoy ship was cruising in a heavy mist when it sighted a large submarine close at hand. She was identified as the German U–6. The white ensign was broken out and fire opened at point-blank range. By the conning tower of the submarine stood an officer lifting a Very pistol to fire a recognition signal, but the first shot tore off his arms and killed him. A second exploded in the control room. Shot after shot went home as an officer scrambled on deck waving a white tablecloth.

Firing ceased just as a heavy fog bank enveloped both boats, then fire was reopened until the doomed submarine signalled for help. Before she went down a few men escaped and were pulled aboard the decoy. It was then they learned that they had sunk the British J–6 and not the German U–6. Some white garment had been thrown over the conning tower so as to give the "J" the appearance of a "U."

That these problems have not as yet been answered is indicated by two recent war-game incidents. Off Panama several years ago the opposing fleets were hot at it. The umpire declared that the commander in chief was eliminated, so word was sent to the vice admiral to take over the command. This word, however, did not reach him until 8 hours later, when a submarine bobbed up and apologized for repeating what they considered an old signal, but to the vice admiral it was the first news of his sudden elevation. To all practical purposes the defending fleet had been fighting a whole day without a leader.

Another war game, another mistake in naval communications. Off the California coast one of the two big aircraft carriers cruised about, hunting for the enemy. A squadron of planes took off to widen the search. This way and that, through cloud banks and over bright open sea they roared, until they saw the deck of an aircraft carrier simply inviting attack. Down they dove, assimilating the most vicious attack which ships will have to repel in the future—diving bombing—and the umpires gave them just what they were after, the complete destruction of the carrier—only it happened to be their own mother ship.

The question of naval communications is still an open one, inviting skill and invention by our best minds or, perhaps, by some lucky discoverer that may trip across the answer to this most serious of all naval problems as yet unanswered. Without it our ships face destruction by their sister ships, our aircraft threaten them from above and our submarines from below. Homogeneity of action is not assured, and as a result in times of stress the sea power of the Nation may be reduced to a group of ineffectual units.

THE NAVY AND RESTORING CONFIDENCE IN THE UNITED STATES

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the bill H.R. 7199, the Navy appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, when I was a tot, 6 years old, attending the little red schoolhouse out against the mountain side in Pennsylvania, the teacher would read the Scriptures every morning and then we would sing a song or two. I well remember how we would make the woods echo when we would come to the chorus of the song that had in it "The Army and Navy forever." The same song still lives. I am sorry to say that the public schools of our land do not sing it as much as they should, just the same as they do not sing Home, Sweet Home as much as they should.

My impression in citizenship building and nation building is that it would be far better to instill into the very souls of our boys and girls in the schools songs like the above rather than such chatter as Yes, We Have No Bananas or its current equivalent.

As long as man's inhumanity to man makes countless thousands mourn, we will have war. As long as there is selfishness and greed in the hearts of men, we will have war. We might just as well recognize it and not kid ourselves into the belief that wars are over. Why, today war is raging in a half a dozen different countries in the world. Today we know that Russia has a million men mobilized along its frontiers. Today we know that other countries in Europe and elsewhere have war facilities and war equipment in readiness, that they could hop into war within 24 hours.

This thing we call civilization is of just a very thin coat of veneer when the hungry and greedy war gods get busy. We do not have time to prepare after they show their teeth through this veneer. We must be ready for action. We need an enlarged navy. We need a navy that is second to none. We need a navy that is flexible enough to give us industrial and economic assistance in time of peace and war service in time of war.

Furthermore, unemployment is immensely helped when we build ships and warcraft of various kinds. When we build a new ship, every State furnishes some of the raw material. Eighty-five percent of the total cost of a ship goes to labor, direct or indirect. Only 40 percent of the total cost is spent in the shipyards; the other 60 percent is spent for raw materials and for labor.

So you see that money spent in building up the Navy does not go, as is often erroneously stated, into the pockets of a few shipbuilding and steel companies, but is widely distributed over the entire United States and goes back directly or indirectly to the man who furnishes the money in the first place—the taxpayer.

Since our Navy was first created by act of the Continental Congress, it has labored under one very grievous handicap. That has been the lack of having a policy for continued building. The same battle that was fought on the floor of the Continental Congress to get ships and guns and men at sea to protect our shores from the enemy has had to be fought over again after each subsequent emergency had already arisen.

Every war in which this country has participated, and particularly the last terrible World War, has found our Navy dangerously unprepared to deal effectively with our enemies. What has been the result? Economy, conservatism, science gone by the winds. Hundreds of millions poured with reckless haste into hurriedly constructed and ill-conceived ships. Incomplete plans, unskilled labor, defective materials, all at fabulous prices and those vultures, the war profiteers, gobbling up fortunes into their insatiable craws.

If only an inconsequential part of the staggering cost of the last war had been spent in the years previous in building up a balanced fleet of well-designed and carefully constructed ships, I maintain we would never have been drawn into that war.

A definite national policy of continued building is vitally important for many reasons. Naval science is continually in process of development. Improvement in design and in naval science goes step by step, not by leaps. The experience of yesterday is reflected in the construction of today and only by constant and continuous building, applying the old principle of trial and error, can we keep step with other maritime powers in the application of modern scientific developments to our national defense.

From the standpoint of those who are responsible for the readiness of the Navy to meet the demands of national defense it is extremely necessary that the future composition of the fleet be known as far in advance as possible so that personnel training and strategic and tactical plans for probable contingencies may be made on some definite basis. This we have never been able to do before, for we have never known even 1 year in advance what new ships would be provided. Lastly, but by no means least, such a building policy would permit the maximum of naval defense to be maintained with a minimum expenditure for construction and upkeep. This can hardly be overestimated, for only by orderly and well-planned building can excessive costs be avoided. Also, a steady and uniform amount of building, rather than having periods of feverish activity and others of stagnation, would revive and stabilize the shipbuilding industry both in our navy yards and in the private shipbuilding yards.

The bill introduced in the Seventy-third Congress by Representative VINSON of Georgia and by Senator TRAMMELL, of Florida, establishes a very definite building policy. It declares that it is the policy of the United States to maintain the Navy at whatever limits may be established by international agreement. It authorizes the President to construct such vessels as necessary to replace obsolete vessels in order to maintain the Navy at treaty strength. It further authorizes the President to procure the necessary naval aircraft for vessels and other naval purposes in numbers commensurate with a treaty navy. A previous act of Congress has already authorized, but not appropriated for, a total enlisted personnel of 143,119 men, which is more than sufficient to man the Navy when it reaches full treaty strength.

The importance of this legislation can hardly be exaggerated. For the first time in the history of our country we are enabled to place the construction of ships, the procurement of aircraft, and the providing of personnel, all on one and the same basis and thus evolve a logical, orderly plan for the maintenance of the Navy. These measures can give no offense and involve no threat to any foreign power and will entail the least possible burden to our taxpayers.

Now, as to carrying out the provisions of the Vinson bill. The naval disarmament treaties established the effective age or life of the various types of ships. The greatest life of any ship is 20 years. Each year certain ships pass the age limit of effective usefulness and, of course, must be replaced by new construction. At the present time the construction of 96 ships as replacements for obsolete ones is required to bring the Navy up to treaty strength.

You will understand that, with 54 ships already under construction and 4 others projected, it would not be physically possible without considerable increase in existing facilities, nor would it be desirable, to construct all these ships immediately.

In rejuvenating the Navy, the plan for replacements must embody and be based upon sound business principles and extend reasonably into the future. Thus the design of ships may proceed in a scientific and progressive manner and so that the curve of cost may be leveled off as much as practicable.

To accomplish this purpose the Navy Department has prepared a tentative replacement program projected over a period exceeding 20 years, so that, 20 years being the greatest life of any ship, a complete cycle of replacements for every ship now afloat is covered.

Under this plan the full number of ships required for treaty strength will have been laid down by 1939 and completed by about 1941. This delay in reaching full strength appears at present to be to our best interests. However, the President may at any time at his discretion speed up or retard this program should he deem it advisable.

The President's building program instituted last year under the National Industrial Recovery Act comprised the first year's quota in accordance with our plan. Appropriations for this year's building could not be included in the regular Budget because authorization was lacking, but if the Vinson bill is enacted into law a supplementary Budget for that purpose will be requested and hereafter in each succeeding year funds will be sought through the regular Budget to cover the cost not only of the ships and aircraft to be built and operated that year but also for the personnel necessary to man those ships and aircraft. Thus we hope to maintain and operate our Navy in an orderly, efficient, and businesslike manner.

In determining our personnel requirements, some yardstick must be established, for it is obvious that we cannot, nor should we, keep our Navy at full war strength in peace times. The difference between a merchant ship and a man-of-war is largely a matter of armament and crew. A man-of-war must not only have armament, she must have men to man her guns and to man all the battle stations that are required for firing the guns. She must have men to man fully the boiler rooms and the engine rooms so she may steam at full speed whenever necessary. A merchant ship can operate plowing along at moderate speed, but when the crew of a man-of-war is reduced, she becomes just that—a merchant ship, for her guns are not manned and she could not make the sustained speed that would be essential. The Navy must have sufficient men. By common accord of the commander in chief of the fleet and his type commanders, the Chief of Bureau of Navigation, and the Chief of Naval Operations, 85 percent of full complement is considered the danger point and ships that lack this personnel should not be operated.

I am speaking, of course you will understand, of personnel for the peace-time operations of the Navy. In time of war it is always necessary to commission many additional ships of various types. It is sometimes necessary to place armed guards on merchant ships. Trained men are necessary for these purposes and it is therefore necessary for the Navy to maintain a strong and well-trained Naval Reserve from which to draw in time of war. It is hoped that Congress will always provide for the maintenance of this highly valuable and necessary branch of the service.

Likewise must Congress and our people realize that a healthy and prosperous merchant marine is an essential adjunct of our armed forces. I would remind you, too, that to build and operate ships there must be shipyards with skilled and experienced artisans.

The Navy's air force has been developed to a degree of which we may feel justly proud. Naval aviation, as we have developed it, is an integral and irreplaceable part of the fleet. Its operation is intimately interwoven with every phase of the operations of the fleet. In 1926 the Navy instituted a so-called "5-year aircraft-building program", Congress having authorized the Navy's air strength at 1,000 useful planes. The goal has now been reached. Due, however, to the rapid progress in the development and use of aircraft and to new ships in the building, it is now necessary for us to revise our estimate of requirement in order that planes in numbers commensurate with a treaty navy may be ready coincident with reaching that other goal—our treaty allowance of ships.

I wish to impress upon you, that, as I have already explained, the Vinson bill is but the first step in our program. It is only the enunciation of a policy, and it must not be forgotten that each year funds must be obtained from Congress to carry our announced policy to successful fruition. But I wish again to emphasize the value of having this policy. It enables us to look ahead, and for the first time to be able to draw up complete plans of our needs covering ships, aircraft, and personnel all fitted together in one united whole. And, furthermore, it enables us to present our needs to the Congress each year in one composite picture.

And, in conclusion, I impress upon you with all the fervor at my command, the necessity for the people of this country to support this program in every possible way to insure that the appropriation bill required each year is not permitted to be deferred.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. BECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 3 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

THE N.R.A. AND THE SUPREME COURT

Mr. BECK. Mr. Speaker, I have been absent for nearly 3 weeks from the House, due to a severe attack of influenza. I want to avail myself of this occasion to say that if I had been privileged to be on the floor of the House at the time when the gold-devaluation bill was under consideration I should have voted "no." But that is not the matter for which I have asked for a few minutes to address the House.

While I was absent from the floor our colleague and my personal friend the gentleman from New York [Mr. BLACK] made a speech which was a reply to an article that I had contributed to the September issue of a magazine called "Fortune." The title of that article was "The N.R.A. and the Supreme Court."

The gentleman from New York made what, in my judgment, although it is not for me to compliment him, a very able argument in support of the constitutionality of the Industrial Recovery Act and took issue with my Fortune article. Many of my colleagues have not seen the article and copies of it are not procurable, as it is only sold by subscription. Therefore I shall ask unanimous consent to incorporate as a part of my remarks this article, and also a statement that I gave to the Associated Press when the decision in the Minnesota case was recently handed down by the Supreme Court, in which I ventured to express an opinion as to the application of that decision upon the question of the constitutionality of the N.R.A.

I had intended, when I read our colleague's able speech, to ask the indulgence of the House to reply more at length to his argument. Unfortunately, time has passed and the matter is now probably only of academic interest.

I was reminded of Mr. BLACK's argument by the statement made yesterday by my esteemed friend the Chairman of the Judiciary Committee, in which he discussed imaginary conditions under which the Constitution of the United States can be superseded by what he suggests as the instinctive common sense of the American people.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] said yesterday:

> Our people seem instinctively to sense the existence of a crisis which exceeds that capacity of their governmental system functioning in the ordinary way. In such a situation instead of permanently changing their system of government they have the genius to concentrate governmental power, give to the agency into which the concentration has gone all the power that a dictator could have, which carries with it as quick a pick-up as a dictatorial government could have, but at the same time they are able to retain the power—I am talking about power now—retain the power over the exercise of the delegated power, and retain the power to recapture and redistribute this concentrated power when the crisis shall have ended.

To me this is a novel conception of the Constitution. I can understand an amendment of the Constitution by the power given in article V of the Constitution, but I do not known of any appeal by this genius of the people which will suspend the Constitution in favor of a dictatorship, and later to recapture our suspended ofrm of government. This sounds suspiciously to me like a statement that while the Constitution is of full force and vigor in those ordinary times when it is least needed, it can at any moment be temporarily suspended by some kind of a mysterious referendum of the American people. However, I cannot discuss this grave and novel constitutional theory now, but I have so much respect for him—not only respect but affection—and so fully recognize his outstanding ability as a lawyer, that I may be tempted later to ask the indulgence of the House, when it has time to consider the permanence of our form of government, to make some kind of reply, both to what the distinguished gentleman from Texas said and also what the gentleman from New York said in reply to my Fortune article.

May I, therefore, ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, to revise and extend my remarks by including the article in Fortune and also my statement to the Associated Press?

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to follows:

THE NATIONAL RECOVERY ACT IN THE SUPREME COURT

By James M. Beck

"What is the Constitution between friends?" was the jocose question addressed by a Tammany Congressman to President Cleveland, when that sturdy Democrat and old-fashioned constitutionalist told the Congressman that his request could not be granted without violating the Constitution of the United States. This classic witticism is not so foolish as is commonly supposed, for it suggests an inquiry of profound importance and most pertinent to the present time as to the moral obligation of the Constitution when obedience to its mandates is regarded—wisely or unwisely—as obstructing some necessary social purpose.

Tradition does not record what the request was which Congressman Campbell made to the President. Possibly that representative of Tammany had been a student of Aristotle and believed, as did the great Greek philosopher, that if a constitution conflicts with the ethos of a people, the constitution must yield. More probably Mr. Campbell in making his famous epigram only meant that the solemn obligations of the Constitution should not interfere with practical politics, and in this sense it raises the question now agitating many thoughtful Americans as to whether the Constitution can be temporarily suspended to meet the exigencies, real or imaginary, of an economic emergency.

That issue will probably confront the Supreme Court of the United States in the not distant future, and upon its decision may hang the fate of our form of government; for if an emergency can justify the temporary suspension of the Constitution, we are then in fact, though not in theory, living under an unwritten form of government, and not within the wise limitations of the great compact formulated 146 years ago.

In discussing this grave question and speculating with regard to the probable attitude of the Supreme Court it is well to remember the useful distinction which Prince Bismarck, when Chancellor of the German Empire, made with reference to a critical situation. He said that while the ponderables favored one course, the imponderables dictated another, and that the latter were more important. If the economic results of the N.R.A. shall prove as valuable as its optimistic proponents believe, yet these are but the ponderables of the problem that now confronts the American people, possibly the gravest since the beginning of the Republic.

The great imponderable is whether it is necessary or even desirable to violate the fundamental law of the Nation, even though such violation may end a serious depression. In this connection it is interesting to note that, serious as the present depression is, there have been at least three economic crises of a grave character in our history, and in none of them did the American people believe that it was necessary to violate a Constitution under which they had grown from a little Nation to the most wealthy and powerful Commonwealth in the world.

That fact suggests a portentous change in the character of the American people and their attitude toward the Constitution. It was once a religion with Americans of all parties; today its solemn mandates apparently have little appeal to the imagination of the people.

It seems unnecessary to state the substance of the National Industrial Recovery Act, for possibly no law has ever had so large a measure of publicity.

The statute consists of three separate titles, of which only the first need here be considered. Title I of the Recovery Act provides a scheme for regimenting the industries of America in order to organize industry by cooperative action among trade groups and to eliminate unfair competitive practices. In this respect the statute marks not only a wide departure from former legislative policies—such as the Sherman antitrust law—but also a complete change in the social philosophy of the American people. The writer will not attempt to discuss the wisdom of this change, except to say that the theory that a mechanical civilization has made it necessary to eliminate the free play of competitive forces, while debatable, cannot be said to be unreasonable.

In order to convert the free competitive system which has hitherto prevailed into a regimented system, the President is made the economic dictator of American industry. All American industries are invited, in the first instance, to form their own codes, but these codes have no value unless approved by the President. When so approved, they have the force of law not only in respect to those who have joined in the formulation of the code but also in respect to those who refuse to join. Even when the leaders of an industry have agreed upon a code and it has been approved by the President, the President may at any time change it. In other words, he determines, in the last analysis, how Americans engaged in industries can conduct their business and his word is final, for any failure by any individual to respect the conditions of the code, whether he assented to the code or not, is made a crime subject to penalties which are potentially destructive to his business. Moreover, the President is given the power to refuse any industrialist the right to ship his products in interstate or foreign commerce unless he gets a license from the President upon such conditions as the President may prescribe. Mr. Henry Ford has refused to sign the automobile code. If the President desires to compel him to do so, he can by Executive edict provide that no automobile factory shall ship its products in interstate or foreign commerce without obtaining a license, and he can then deny Mr. Ford a license unless Mr. Ford will sign the code and comply with any other conditions that the President may prescribe. These conditions are without limit. They may refer to hours and wages of labor, minimum or maximum production, the price of the product, or any other condition.

It is this feature of the law which inevitably raises the grave question of constitutionality and naturally invites speculation as to whether the Supreme Court, if called upon to determine its validity, would hold that such a law is within any power granted to Congress by the Constitution. It is probable that such a case will reach the Supreme Court, for it seems inconceivable that the industrialists of America, who have hitherto been accustomed to economic freedom, will not some day challenge the validity of the statute; and if and when the law shall be thus challenged in the Supreme Court, the nine robed Justices will feel constrained by the solemn obligations of their oaths of office to support and defend the Constitution and to determine whether any language in the Constitution authorizes Congress to pass such a law and, incidentally, to delegate such unprecedented powers to an executive official.

The Supreme Court reconvened in the first week of October. Its calendar is no longer congested, and if a test case is brought within the near future there should be no difficulty in securing a decision upon these grave questions before the Court terminates its present session about the first of June. Cases of such gravity and general importance are generally advanced by the Supreme Court for early argument in preference to other cases on the calendar; and while the Supreme Court quite naturally never goes out of its way to meet trouble and would probably be indisposed in this matter unnecessarily to handle the business end of a red-hot poker, yet the Court, mindful of its great function as the balance wheel of the Constitution, would not shirk its duty. Undoubtedly it would follow its unbroken course of deciding nothing that the necessities of the immediate case did not imperatively require. And it is equally clear that it would approach this grave judicial inquiry with the resolute purpose of sustaining the statute, if it could in any reasonable way be reconciled with the Constitution—not only because such has been its uniform policy but because in the present matter the economic crisis which inspired this legislation would predispose the Court to sustain the declared will of Congress if it could be done without a clear violation of the Constitution. For these reasons the Court may decide that portions of the statute could be sustained and other portions adjudged to be without validity under the Constitution. But it is unlikely that any competent lawyer would bring a test case in a form which would not involve the fundamental question of governmental power.

In proceeding to judgment the Court, as a human institution, could not ignore the extraordinary circumstances which gave birth to this unprecedented legislation. While this is so, it is a great injustice to the Supreme Court—in many respects the greatest and noblest court in the world—to suggest that the Court would be influenced by popular opinion. When the insular cases were decided, under which the power of the United States to govern colonial dependencies was recognized, Mr. Dooley perpetrated his classic epigram that "the Supreme Court follows the election returns." This was amusing, but wholly without justification. The Court is little influenced by the varying winds of public opinion, but it is profoundly affected—as it must be—by the deeper currents of social change, and the Court cannot be unmindful of the fact that the American people, whose social philosophy was once purely individualistic, has now become a nation of collectivists.

While the judicial mind cannot blind itself to these considerations, the Court, unless it were false to all its traditions, will realize that it has no power to pass upon social philosophies, but that its duty is a more simple and direct one, and that is to determine whether the Constitution of the United States ever vested in Congress the power to pass this legislation. If it did not, and such a power is now desirable in view of our complex mechanical civilization, then the only lawful way to transform our dual form of government into a unitary socialistic state is to amend the Constitution in the manner provided by that instrument.

Unquestionably the Court will find itself in a position of unparalleled embarrassment when called upon to decide the validity of this statute if at the time of such decision its economic results have proved the salvation of the American people. When Phryne appeared before the court of Athens, the judges shut their eyes lest the beauty of the litigant should warp their judgment; and if the National Recovery Act appears before the Court seemingly arrayed in a resplendent gown of renewed prosperity, even though her robes are as imaginary as the silken garment of the king of whom Hans Christian Andersen wrote, the Court, to be colloquial, will find itself in a tighter place than it ever has been in all its history. Nevertheless, the Court, unless it were false to all its noble traditions—which is inconceivable—would decide the question as one of law, in the spirit of a noble and intrepid English judge (Chief Justice Coke) who, in reply to a question of a king as to what his decision would be in a pending case, replied, "When the time comes, I will do what it is fitting for a judge to do."

Assuming the probability of a test case, what will be the reaction of the Court? It will at once be suggested by those who speculate in such matters that the Court is today a house divided against itself; that the nine robed judges are divided into conservatives and liberals. In the faculties of our law schools there are many professors who, speaking ex cathedra from the platforms of their classrooms, pretend to sit in judgment not only upon the decisions of the Supreme Court but upon the relative merits of the judges. For years past we have been told that several Justices, generally but not always in the minority, are the so-called "liberals" of the bench, and that the remaining Justices, generally but not always in the majority, are old-fashioned conservatives whose usefulness in this era of social change is questionable.

This view, while shared by many eminent law professors who never argued a case in the Supreme Court, and by certain organs of independent opinion, is nevertheless very superficial. If there is any basis for such a classification of the Justices, it relates to the validity of State laws, where the ever-expanding police powers are claimed to be in conflict with the extremely vague provision of the fourteenth amendment—which guarantees that no man shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law. What is due process of law must be defined by judicial decisions, for it is an abstract conception and therefore the limit of the power of a State over an individual, in view of social changes, has given rise to a marked conflict of opinion in the Supreme Court. Some of the Justices believe, consciously or subconsciously, that the best cure for democracy is more democracy, on the theory of Dr. Franklin that "experience is a dear school, but fools will learn in no other." Other and more conservative Justices have felt that the guaranty of the individual against arbitrary government must be asserted under the due process clause against the audacious experimentation of socialistic laws.

But no such conflict between advanced sociology and conservative conceptions of government is involved in the National Recovery Act, for the legal question is not one of economics or of social philosophy but of the powers of the Federal Government as defined in the Constitution. It may be questioned whether there is in the Supreme Court any such division between the Justices where the question presented is simply whether the Constitution ever granted to Congress the power to pass a specified statute.

This involves only the interpretation of language in the Constitution—language which is extraordinarily simple and lucid. Such interpretation does not depend upon an attitude of conservatism or liberalism in sociology. In other words, a Supreme Court Justice who might be classed as a liberal in respect to State powers under the fourteenth amendment might nevertheless find it difficult, in respect to a Federal statute, to discover any authority in the Constitution for its enactment. To the Justices of the Supreme Court the only question can be, Is it so nominated in the bond, either by express language or by necessary implication?

Here it must be observed that the Supreme Court, as a coordinate branch of the Government, is peculiarly indisposed to pronounce an act of Congress void for want of power. From the beginning of the Government it has only done so in about 50 cases, while there is a much larger number of cases where the Court has held either that the Federal statute was clearly within the grant of power or that it was not so indisputably repugnant to the Constitution as to justify the Court in disregarding the legislative mandate. It must also be borne in mind that of the 50 cases referred to above, only a few involved statutes behind which were arrayed the powerful passions of the people or their economic interests. However, the Court has on more than one occasion turned a deaf ear to the public clamor by holding that a statute largely favored by the people was nevertheless not within any grant of power in the Constitution, and generally the sober second thought of the American people subsequently approved a decision which they at first condemned.

If, therefore, the National Recovery Act involved only the impairment of some minor limitation or mechanical detail of the Constitution, the Supreme Court might be astute to justify an exercise of power which seemed to be demanded by public opinion.

The National Recovery Act, however, offends both the letter and the spirit of the entire Constitution. It effectually destroys in the sphere of economics our dual form of government, for that was based upon a clear distinction between interstate and foreign commerce on the one hand, as to which the Federal Government was given plenary power, and on the other production and domestic trade within the borders of a State, as to which governmental power was reserved to the States. It creates an economic dictatorship over the business interests of the United States without respect to this territorial division of authority. It gives the National Administrator the power, through a system of codes, to regulate the minutiae of production, although the decisions of the Supreme Court from the beginning of the Government have consistently held that the production of articles of merchandise could not be regulated by Federal power. In the two child-labor cases, the Supreme Court held that the Federal Government was impotent either by its taxing or commerce powers to regulate such a condition of labor because it was wholly without power of any kind to regulate the conditions of production; and in two notable labor cases it decided with equal clearness that the Federal Government could not regulate the relations of employer and employee. To sustain the National Recovery Act it would be necessary for the Supreme Court to repudiate these decisions, and this would mean an act of unprecedented self-stultification of which the Court seems to me incapable.

It is true that the Court has on rare occasions deliberately reversed some prior decision, but if it were now to sustain the power of the Federal Government to regulate the conditions of labor and production in the factory and on the farm, it would disregard a consistent line of authority running over a century and in which all judges have concurred.

The present economic dictatorship is somewhat camouflaged by the provision that in the first instance each industry may formulate its own code. But these codes are of no validity unless the President approves them and, what is more surprising, he has the power at any time to modify the codes at will. While he has exercised this vast power with admirable restraint, the fact remains that he has the absolute power of Mr. Ford, who told his clients that they could select a car of any color, provided it was black. Similarly, the President allows the vast industries of America to select any code, provided he approves it. In the case of the soft-coal industries, when the representatives of employers and employees had agreed upon a code after 3 months of negotiations, the President, in approving the code, struck out the one provision which seemed of vital importance to the employers. Indeed, the President, by the licensing system, can permit or refuse to permit any business man to sell his goods in interstate or foreign commerce, and this in principle condemns American industry to an economic bondage. This must be so in spite of the high motives of the President, the restraint with which the power has been exercised, and the high patriotic purposes which presumably have influenced his decisions and those of his administrator.

The National Recovery Act, moreover, involves questions that are even more fundamental than the extent of the Federal power over commerce. As stated, it seeks to regulate the conditions of production in the several States in respect to wages, hours of labor, prices, and even maximum production. No such power was ever vested in any President in times either of peace or of war. No one disputed this fact in the House when the legislation was before Congress, although labored efforts were made in the Senate to defend it. Mr. POU, of North Carolina, the distinguished Chairman of the Committee on Rules and the dean of the House, with his characteristic honesty of expression, frankly said in introducing the legislation:

"This bill makes the President of the United States dictator for the time being. It is a benign dictatorship." To this remarkable admission, never before heard on the floor of Congress, I then ventured to reply:

"There is no such thing as a benign dictatorship, and I say this with due recognition of the charming personality and high motives of the President of the United States. You might as well talk of a chaste seduction, lawful robbery, or peaceful murder, as to talk of a benign dictatorship."

This raises a question which goes beyond the mere mechanics of government. The purpose of the Constitution was to limit the powers of government and to provide a dead line beyond which a government could not go. It attempted to give concrete expression to our deathless Declaration of Independence, that a man had certain inalienable rights which no government could take from him, even though he stood as Athanasius contra mundum. Our Constitution was based upon the belief that the oil of anointing, which was once supposed to sanctify the head of a monarch, had not conferred infallibility upon the multitudinous tongue of the people, and this limitation upon the power of the majority has been the most admired feature of our Constitution and has been the chief reason why a democracy so heterogeneous as ours could justify itself.

Among these inalienable rights is that of liberty of contract and the greater liberty to pursue any lawful business free from unreasonable governmental interference. The Supreme Court has said so on innumerable occasions, and if it should now sustain this departure from the basic ideals of the American Commonwealth it might as well tear up the Constitution. Thenceforth it would be little more than a scrap of paper so far as personal rights are concerned.

In my opinion, therefore, no express grant of power in the Constitution can be found to justify the Recovery Act. Its proponents, however, argue that it may be justified under the implied powers of the Constitution.

An implied power means nothing more than that, when the Constitution gives an express power to the Federal Government, it also gives by necessary implication the incidental power of passing such laws as are reasonably necessary for the exercise of the express power. While our whole constitutional history has shown that this opened the door wide to a great deal of legislation that was not in the contemplation of the framers of the Constitution, and while the liberal exercise of these implied powers has gone far to convert our Government from a limited to an unlimited government, it is, nevertheless, still true that implied powers can only be implied from some express and specific grant. One cannot conjure an implied power out of a vacuum in the Constitution as the conjurer takes a rabbit out of a hat.

As it would be extremely difficult to graft the implied power to pass the Recovery Act upon any express grant in our charter of government (especially as this law contravenes limitations of our Bill of Rights), the proponents of this legislation and that class of law-school professors who call themselves "liberals" will find justification for the implied power in that portion of the preamble to the Constitution, which declares as one of its objectives the general welfare. It must be obvious that if any Federal law can be justified merely because Congress regards it as contributing to the general welfare of the American people, then the Congress has unlimited powers.

However, the question is not even open to argument, for while the so-called "liberals" would be very happy to make the passing reference in the Constitution to "general welfare" as a distinct grant of power, the Supreme Court has repeatedly held that this statement of a mere objective was in no sense a grant of power.

Those who are privileged to argue this great case in the Supreme Court will probably hear for the thousandth time the following classic definition by Chief Justice Marshall of the doctrine of implied powers:

"Let the end be legitimate, let it be within the scope of the Constitution, and all means which are appropriate, which are plainly adapted to that end, which are not prohibited, but consistent with the letter and spirit of the Constitution, are constitutional."

It should, however, be remembered that Chief Justice Marshall in the same opinion in that leading case said:

"No political dreamer was ever wild enough to think of breaking down the lines which separate the States and of compounding the American people into one common mass."

This can leave no doubt what the great Chief Justice would think of a policy which unquestionably has broken down the lines which separated the States and, for economic purposes, has compounded the American people into one common mass.

It is true that in a scarcely less famous case, the Lottery case, decided in 1903, which I had the privilege of arguing in the Supreme Court in behalf of the Government, the Court did hold that the power to regulate interstate and foreign commerce could, under proper conditions and when necessary to such regulation, be held to include the power to prohibit; but the opinion of the Court in that case said that the power to prohibit could not be exercised in violation of any limitation of the Constitution and more especially that it could not destroy that distinction between Federal and State power which underlies our dual form of government.

In a later case in which I was also privileged to act as counsel (the Child Labor case, decided in 1918) the Court carefully limited the power of Congress over interstate commerce by saying:

"The grant of power to Congress over the subject of interstate commerce was to enable it to regulate such commerce and not to give it authority to control the States in their exercise of the police power over local trade and manufacture. * * * The grant of authority over a purely Federal matter was not intended to destroy the local power always existing and carefully preserved to the States in the tenth amendment to the Constitution."

As this legislation cannot be justified by any express grant in the Constitution or any implied power, how can it possibly be defended?

The proponents of the legislation will argue that there is now a new and more portentous implied power, which may be stated as follows:

Whenever the Congress of the United States is of the opinion that an unusual emergency has arisen which necessitates a departure from the Constitution, then there is an implied power to meet the emergency by passing any legislation which the emergency may seem to require.

Time was when this doctrine of emergency would have been recognized by the Supreme Court and by all true constitutionalists as easily the most pernicious and dangerous legal heresy that the wit of man could suggest. Nevertheless, as a legal conception it has found an uncertain place in our jurisprudence and therefore must be reckoned with.

In considering this question, a clear distinction must be made between the reserved powers of the States and the carefully delegated powers of the Federal Government. In respect to State legislation, where the States have all governing power except that which has been delegated to the Federal Government, the Supreme Court has held, during and after the World War, that to meet an emergency the States could impair contracts, despite a constitutional inhibition, by temporarily limiting the right of landlords to collect rents or evict tenants, and the same sweeping police power belongs to the Federal Government in respect to its Territories, as, for example, the District of Columbia, where the Supreme Court recognized a police power, under the Territorial clause, to pass legislation to meet an acute housing situation.

Recognizing the authority of these cases, the issue in the coming case will be more fundamental. It raises the question whether the Federal Government, in the event of an emergency, can usurp the reserved rights of the States and also abolish the distinctions between the legislative and executive branches of the Government as defined by the Constitution. The decisions of the Supreme Court can be searched in vain for any recognition of the doctrine of emergency as justifying the suspension of the Constitution, unless it is its decision in the case of Wilson against New.

That case involved the constitutionality of the Adamson wage law, which had been passed in 1916 as a temporary provision to regulate the wages of railroad labor, to prevent the calamity of a Nation-wide strike. The railway labor executives demanded of President Wilson the immediate passage of a law to raise the wages of railway labor under threat of a Nation-wide strike. A bare majority of the Supreme Court held that while the Congress had no power to regulate the wages of labor, even when engaged in interstate commerce, yet in view of its peculiar relation to, and power over, interstate carriers as instrumentalities of such commerce, it could pass a temporary measure to give sufficient time to the railway executives and the labor leaders to agree upon wages. This decision rendered in 1917 stands alone in our history, and in subsequent decisions the Court has repeatedly referred to the fact that that decision went to the extreme verge of Federal power. The Supreme Court has never formally overruled it, but, reading between the lines of subsequent decisions, its authority as a precedent is, to say the least, doubtful. However, it will certainly rise to plague the Court in the coming test case.

The older and more consistent doctrine of the Court was well stated in the great case of Ex parte Milligan, decided in 1866. That case arose during the period of the Civil War, when our Nation was fighting for its very existence. Milligan, accused of treason, was tried by a military court martial, not in the zone of military operations but in a loyal state where the civil courts were open. The Supreme Court held that the constitutional right of a citizen to a jury trial could not be thus destroyed because of the emergency of a Civil War. They sustained the great argument of Jeremiah S. Black, who, in defense of Milligan, made one of the greatest forensic arguments in the annals of the English-speaking people, and who said that it was in times of stress and violence that "we need the whole strength of an unbroken Constitution to save us from destruction."

When the doctrine of emergency is invoked in the coming test case, my belief is that the Supreme Court will sustain its decision in the Milligan case by concluding that an emergency creates the very strongest reason for supporting the Constitution in its full vigor, since in peaceful times we are hardly sensible of its great protection but in times of emergency we need it most. Otherwise Congress can at any time determine the fact of an emergency—and we are likely to have many economic crises in the years that are to come—and at the very time that property interests and individual liberties most need the protection of the Constitution it will be found that by the fiat of Congress, exercising powers never granted to it, the Constitution has become a scrap of paper.

The Congress attempted to justify the National Recovery Act by providing that it should be in force for only 2 years. History is said to repeat itself, and has certainly done so in this instance, for Gibbon in his immortal history tells us that when the Roman Senate delegated its legislative powers to Augustus, that suave and kindly ruler only consented to receive the power for 10 years, and he hoped that within that time the wounds of civil discord would be completely healed and that the Republic, restored to its pristine health and vigor, would no longer require the dangerous interposition of so extraordinary a magistrate.

It is significant that the Roman Senate never resumed its power, and Gibbon adds:

"The memory of this comedy, repeated several times during the life of Augustus, was preserved to the last ages of the Empire by the peculiar pomp with which the perpetual monarchs of Rome always solemnize the tenth year of their reign."

If the national recovery plan succeeds, there may be a similar extension from time to time, until the Constitution has become little more than a memory.

Is the spirit of the Constitution to become an extinct political religion with the American people? To them it was once as a religion, and the Civil War was fought at infinite sacrifice to maintain its integrity. If the Supreme Court shall decide that, whenever the American people are terrified by some passing emergency, their representatives in Congress may dispense with the Constitution temporarily, then it will be true, as Chief Justice Fuller said 30 years ago, the "form will have survived the substance of the faith."

I rejoice that this great case, which may prove the greatest of our time or, indeed, of our history, will be argued in the present courtroom. It is the old Senate Chamber of the United States, where Webster so nobly defended the integrity of the Constitution against the attack of Senator Hayne. For more than 70 years it has been the forum of that great Court. As the nine robed Justices sit before the ionic pillars in that simple but very beautiful temple of justice, they will feel the links of the mighty past even more strongly than they would in the new grandiose temple to which they will soon remove and whose pompous splendor ill accords with the majestic simplicity of the world's greatest Court. In its present historic chamber the nine robed Justices can calmly await the event, as did the Senators of Rome, when the populace had fled and the invaders were at the gates.

Will this be their spirit? Who can tell? When Dr. Franklin was on his deathbed and his friends besought him to send for a clergyman as an interpreter of the life to come, the wise but always jocose philosopher replied: "Why should I guess, when I shall so soon know?"

The ways of the Supreme Court are similarly mysterious and past finding out. Why should we guess, when we may so soon know?

PRESS STATEMENT BY JAMES M. BECK

WASHINGTON, January 10.—The alphabetical excrescences of our already swollen Federal bureaucracy should not take too much encouragement from the Supreme Court decision in the recent Minnesota case.

In my judgment it does not necessarily validate the more disputable features of the emergency legislation, for the Supreme Court was not considering the powers of Congress under the Constitution, but only the power of the Legislature of Minnesota. That great Court has repeatedly stated its opinions must be confined to the precise question which it was adjudicating.

QUESTION AT ISSUE

In this case the question was whether the Federal Constitution prevented the State of Minnesota, under its reserved powers, from suspending the remedial processes of its courts for a limited period in the matter of foreclosing mortgages. As a sovereign State, Minnesota has all legislative power except such as it and other States had delegated to the Federal Government under the Constitution. The United States Supreme Court has now held by a bare majority that the temporary suspension by a State of the right of foreclosure is not an impairment of a contract within the meaning of the Federal Constitution.

The constitutionality of the Federal emergency laws must depend upon the ability of the Supreme Court to find in the Constitution, either in express language or by necessary implication, a sufficient grant of power. The Supreme Court was not considering in the Minnesota case the legislative powers of Congress.

If and when the Supreme Court should be required to decide whether a man who presses pants in Tampa, Fla., can be forbidden by a Federal code to charge less than a code price a very different question will arise, and when such question arises, the following language of Chief Justice Hughes, who spoke for the majority of the Court in the Minnesota case, will necessarily have great weight. He said:

"Emergency does not create power. Emergency does not increase granted power or remove or diminish the restrictions imposed upon power granted or reserved."

This seems to negative the contention of the proponents of the emergency laws that in the event of such emergency the Federal Government has an inherent right to exercise powers which were not otherwise delegated to it. If the Federal power over interstate commerce does not include production within the States, whether of the farm or factory, then the Supreme Court cannot, under its decision in the Minnesota case, bring into existence a nonexistent power, not only because the Constitution gave to the Federal Government no power over domestic trade or manufacture but because under the tenth amendment such power was expressly reserved to the States and to the people thereof.

CANNOT CREATE POWERS

The framers of the Constitution, wisely or unwisely, drew a deadline between interstate commerce and domestic production or trade, and if any Federal power over the latter was denied by the Constitution, no emergency could create it in view of the clear language of Chief Justice Hughes. The emergency legislation contains many features which the Constitution expressly denied to the Federal Government.

To hold that the mere fact of an emergency can create powers which are otherwise nonexistent, is to make a scrap of paper of the Constitution at the very time when its protection is most needed.

If the theory that an emergency suspends the Constitution once receives the clear sanction of our highest Court, then the end of constitutional government in the United States is measurably in sight, and in that event, which has not yet come to pass, a future generation of Americans may wonder that this generation wasted its priceless heritage under which, and partly because of which, we became the most powerful Nation in the world.

THE NAVY DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL—FISCAL YEAR 1935

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H.R. 7199) making appropriations for the Navy Department and the Naval Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. LANHAM in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole for the consideration of a bill of which the Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

INCREASE OF THE NAVY

Construction and machinery: On account of hulls and outfits of vessels and machinery of vessels heretofore authorized, including the commencement of 1 cruiser of subcategory (a) and 3 cruisers of subcategory (b), authorized by the act approved February 13, 1929 (45 Stat. 1165), $27,342,000, and, in addition, (1) the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed, upon the request of the Secretary of the Navy, to make transfers during the fiscal year 1935 from the naval supply account fund to this appropriation of sums aggregating not to exceed $5,000,000, and (2) there is hereby reappropriated for the objects embraced by this paragraph (a) $1,450,000 of the appropriation "Public Works, Navy, Emergency Construction, act July 21, 1932", contained in the act entitled "An act to relieve destitution, to broaden the lending powers of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and to create employment by providing for and expediting a public-works program", approved July 31, 1932, and (b) $550,000 of the unexpended balances of the amounts heretofore appropriated under the head of "Public Works, Bureau of Yards and Docks", and the total sums hereby made available shall remain available until expended: Provided, the sum to be paid out of the amount available for expenditure under the head of "Construction and Machinery" for the fiscal year 1935 for employees in the field service assigned to group IV (b) and those performing similar services carried under native and alien schedules in the schedule of wages for civil employees in the field service of the Navy Department shall not exceed $465,000: Provided, That of the appropriations contained in this act under the head of "Increase of the Navy", there shall be available such sums as the Secretary of the Navy may from time to time determine to be necessary for the engagement of technical services, including the purchase of plans, and the employment of personnel in the Navy Department and in the field, in addition to those otherwise provided for owing to the construction of vessels heretofore authorized and herein or heretofore appropriated for in part.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I think that the House and the country ought to be advised of the amount available under this bill and under allotments for the fiscal year 1935. My understanding is that there is available, as appears on page 469 of the hearings, an allotment of $129,468,000 from the Public Works toward increases of the Navy; that there are available otherwise $55,000,000, and the total available after 1935 is $184,000,000 plus. The amount available this year—1934—altogether for increase of the Navy is $77,000,000.

The amount available without very substantial appropriations otherwise for the fiscal year 1936 will be $92,778,000 along with the allotment. For the fiscal year 1937 the amount available is estimated to be $19,871,000.

It has been my privilege, up to this year, for the last 10 years to serve on the Naval Appropriation Subcommittee. I feel that the membership of the House should have some of this information put before them. It has been found as a matter of practice that when we want to get good ships and efficiency out of our Navy Department, out of our navy yards and the shipyards of the country, we ought to feed to them more even working loads. That the peak for 1 year should not be too high, so that we have a lot of inexperienced men working on ships, nor should the drop be too low, so that experienced shipworkers in the different yards get into other lines because of lack of employment in these yards.

I call attention to the fact that in 1918 and 1919 and 1920 we built a lot of destroyers and a lot of submarines. These destroyers and submarines, because of the rush with which they were put through the yards and the lack of experience in a large number of men who worked on them and who designed them, were not as good ships as we ought to have had in the Navy.

I am interested in seeing not only that the Navy is second to none, but I am interested especially in seeing that the ships of the Navy are the best ships possible. For that reason I want to see the work load as even as possible so that the ships will be the best in the world.

I understand it is proposed on the part of some Members to offer at the end of this bill a separate section, the bill H.R. 6604. That is a bill providing for a certain number of destroyers and a certain number of submarines and one aircraft carrier which has been reported by the Naval Affairs Committee.

Formerly it has been the policy of that committee to object to legislation on appropriation bills, but they seem to want at this time to put this bill on this appropriation bill.

I wanted to take the floor at this time to call attention to the amount that was going to be available for construction work in the Navy this year and the next year and the years thereafter. I want to say that I am not going to object or raise any point of order with reference to this bill because the construction work is necessary, but I do feel that there should not be any substantial appropriation added to the increase of the Navy for the fiscal year 1935. The work on these ships, in my opinion, should come in the fiscal years 1936, 1937, and subsequent years, when the work load on the yards, both public and private, is such that it can take care of them much more efficiently than if any of it is crowded into the fiscal year 1935, when there seems to be a great big hump.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. Yes.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Yesterday I consulted with the committee, and we concluded to ask unanimous consent to offer this legislation to the appropriation bill, but after further thought about the matter I can announce to the House that the Naval Affairs Committee is asking a rule, and we will not offer this legislation to this bill.

In reference to what the gentleman has just stated, it is the intention of the Navy Department not to ask for any large supplementary appropriation. Therefore that is in line with what the gentleman from New York has stated with reference to this bill. We hope that within the next 2 or 3 days a rule will be brought in here according us an opportunity to present to the House this authorization program, which seeks to bring the Navy up to treaty strength.

Mr. TABER. I am very glad to hear the gentleman say that. I shall call attention to just one other thing in connection with the bill while I have the opportunity. The total amount available under this bill in all ways for expenditure is, on account of allotments and otherwise along that particular line, $146,914,000, and on account of appropriations, direct and indirect, $295,000,000, or a total of $442,000,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. Yes.

Mr. BRITTEN. What does the gentleman mean by indirect appropriations?

Mr. TABER. Indirect appropriations are transfers from the clothing and small stores fund, $2,000,000; transfers from the naval supply account, $5,000,000; and reappropriations, $2,085,000.

Mr. BRITTEN. I understood the gentleman to say something about $147,000,000.

Mr. TABER. Public Works allotments amount to $147,000,000.

Mr. BRITTEN. Applying to the present appropriation bill?

Mr. TABER. Applying to use in the fiscal year 1935, which is the same year that this bill covers.

Mr. BRITTEN. So that the annual cost of the Navy for the next year is estimated at $435,000,000?

Mr. TABER. Four hundred and forty-two million dollars.

The Clerk read as follows:

Armor, armament, and ammunition: Toward the armor, armament, and ammunition for vessels heretofore authorized, $6,277,334, to remain available until expended: Provided, That the sum to be paid out of the amount available for expenditure under this head for the fiscal year 1935 for employees in the field service assigned to group IV (b) and those performing similar services carried under native and alien schedules in the schedule of wages for civil employees in the field service of the Navy Department shall not exceed $175,000.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. There is a very strong sentiment running through my district against the Government engaging in business in competition with private industry. That was stressed very strongly by business men and laborers in my district during the last campaign. They have brought it to my attention many times since. I am interested in the report which has been circulated that the Post Office Department is going to build a factory at Reedsville, W.Va., costing $525,000, to manufacture what is known as "screen equipment." That is the part that separates the lobby from the workroom of the post office. I called on the Public Works Administration and I found that $525,000 had been allotted to the Post Office Department. I called at the Post Office Department and they said yes, it had been allotted to them; that the funds had been transferred; and that they were now drawing plans to build a factory in Reedsville, W.Va., which has a population of something like 345 people, a factory costing $525,000, to build this particular line of equipment, that comes in direct competition with the furniture industries of five States. It comes in competition with furniture industries in New York, Connecticut, Indiana, Pennsylvania, and West Virginia.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. And also of Michigan and Ohio.

Mr. REED of New York. Michigan and Ohio, my friend from Ohio says. I have the names of the concerns in the five States that I have mentioned. In my district we have a furniture center—the city of Jamestown, N.Y., which is one of the largest points of manufacture of furniture in the country, where the industries have moved heaven and earth to keep their men employed.

At the present time the quota for C.W.A. work in Jamestown is 1,000, and it is now filled. There are 3,000 men on the rolls, waiting to be employed under the C.W.A. Yet we now find the Government building a factory in a little town where they certainly cannot find enough skilled labor to make this particular line of post-office equipment at this time. Furthermore, we know that as soon as the Government has completed the job of making screen-line equipment it is going to manufacture other types of furniture.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REED of New York. Yes.

Mr. EVANS. And do those concerns in the gentleman's community produce the same kind of equipment?

Mr. REED of New York. Yes; and in the five States that I have mentioned; and then there are the two mentioned by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER].

Mr. EVANS. And they are produced in other communities?

Mr. REED of New York. Absolutely.

Mr. EVANS. The same material?

Mr. REED of New York. Yes. They have no skilled labor in this little town at all; and just imagine, if you will, a factory costing that amount coming into direct competition with factories now trying to keep their men employed.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Did Congress ever authorize this construction?

Mr. REED of New York. Of course not; and when we had the vote here in respect to the Federal prison at Lewisburg, Pa., going into the furniture business, the vote was overwhelmingly against it in this House; but they are paying no attention to the will of Congress at all. The bureaus are allotting these projects now that have been condemned by the Congress in the past.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REED of New York. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. In other words, the Government today is embarking in a business in direct competition with private industry, and those people who are responsible for that private industry will have to go down in their pockets and in part be taxed to erect this Government institution which will interfere very much with their own particular business.

Mr. REED of New York. There is no question about that; and the entire policy is one of nationalization of industry.

Mr. RICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REED of New York. I yield.

Mr. RICH. Last year the House, as the gentleman stated, voted overwhelmingly in opposition to some of these projects which prisons are going into?

Mr. REED of New York. Yes; 250 against, 46 for.

Mr. RICH. But we find we are not only having the prisons going into various industries, but the Post Office Department now is taking it up, and they are constructing plants at the present time which will put many people out of industry and put the Government into business.

Mr. REED of New York. Absolutely.

Mr. RICH. If that is what this Congress wants to do, then we are on the wrong track.

Mr. REED of New York. Congress does not want to do it, and it has expressed itself emphatically and overwhelmingly against that policy.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED] has expired.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I do this, Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of once more paying my compliments to the administration. I have taken real pleasure in doing that in the past couple of weeks, and I want to do it again.

The naval appropriation bill about to be passed carries a regular Budget appropriation of $294,000,000. That is very low. It is lower than it has been for many years. I think the administration and the gentlemen who framed this bill are to be complimented on it. They have done a great work of bookkeeping. It is in line with the new deal in many other respects, where gentlemen on the Democratic side of the aisle are covering up their crowding deficiencies. The fact of the matter is, Mr. Chairman, that this bill actually carries $441,000,000. That will not be shown in the Budget; I mean in the real Budget. A great portion of it—$147,000,000—carried in this bill will ultimately come out in some other budget, not the regular Budget, because under the new deal the regular Budget will have to be balanced.

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRITTEN. In just a moment I will yield to the gentleman. In other words, it is going to cost $441,000,000 to run the Navy next year, but because that would look like a lot of money we will take $147,000,000 of that expenditure out of the P.W.A. of the N.I.R.A. They do not have to account for the vast expenditures of the P.W.A. They are carried in an auxiliary budget, and thus the cost of the Navy for the next year will appear unusually low. Nothing will be permitted to dislodge or dislocate the regular Budget. The Budget, under the new deal, simply must appear to be balanced. That procedure sounds silly, but that is the situation.

Mr. McFARLANE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRITTEN. The Treasury will suffer, in this instance, to the extent of $147,000,000. That $147,000,000 goes into new ship construction; it goes into aviation, shore stations, radio equipment, and many supply directions; it goes into various naval directions where money that is usually and ordinarily appropriated for the Navy goes. I want to compliment the gentlemen on the Democratic side, because this is in line——

Mr. McFARLANE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRITTEN. I cannot yield to the gentleman. I want to compliment the Democratic majority, because this is in line with all the other hoodwinkery that has been going on in connection with their foolish suggestions that they will have a balanced Budget this year. It is thoroughly absurd to talk about balancing the Budget only a few days after your President told us the national deficit would be $7,000,000,000 this year. You could take the entire amount necessary to run the Navy next year out of some butterfly fund in order to save the face of your regular Budget, but that would not alter the fact that the money came out of the Treasury.

Mr. McFARLANE. Will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. BRITTEN. No. I now yield to the gentleman's senior, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. AYRES].

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. I do not care to interrogate the gentleman now.

Mr. BRITTEN. I will yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. McFARLANE. Is it not true the gentleman is in favor of the expenditure of every dollar that is carried in the bill, whether under the N.R.A. or under the Navy appropriation bill?

Mr. BRITTEN. I knew the gentleman would ask me that. Of course I am.

Mr. McFARLANE. What is the gentleman crying about, then?

Mr. BRITTEN. I am not crying, but I am complimenting you gentlemen on that side of the aisle for your audacity in accountancy. You have all the expert accountants of the country backed off the boards. You think you can balance the Budget irrespective of your vast expenditures out of special funds, which require no direct accounting in what you refer to as the normal Budget, and you still have the face to say to the country, "Under the new deal we are balancing the Budget."

Mr. RICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes; I yield.

Mr. RICH. Last week we passed the Interior Department appropriation bill, where we claimed we saved $17,000,000, and the fact is, and the chairman of the committee admitted, the C.W.A. was going to spend $25,000,000, and we balanced that Budget in the same way.

Mr. BRITTEN. When the gentleman talks about $25,000,000, he is talking about hairpins and shoe laces. That is nothing at all. I suggest that he go over on the other side of the aisle and see how they do business; $147,000,000 will never be accounted for as having been spent for the Navy out of the regular ordinary Budget of the country. Next year you gentlemen on the Democratic side of the aisle will be parading up and down the States of Texas and Kansas and Oklahoma and New Jersey and New York and Illinois telling how you balanced the Budget. The truth of the matter is that while you are balancing one budget you are ruining the Treasury with another. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN] has expired.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

That in the expenditure of appropriations in this act the Secretary of the Navy shall, unless in his discretion the interest of the Government will not permit, purchase or contract for, within the limits of the United States, only articles of the growth, production, or manufacture of the United States, notwithstanding that such articles of the growth, production, or manufacture of the United States may cost more, if such excess of cost be not unreasonable.

Mr. HAINES. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I do this to ask unanimous consent to have the Clerk read a telegram I have received from the Governor of Pennsylvania and to have it inserted in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

JANUARY 24, 1934

Hon. HARRY L. HAINES,
House Office Building:

I urge you most earnestly to support and expand the Civil Works program. Curtailment of this work for the unemployed is nothing short of a catastrophe in Pennsylvania.

Last week there were 240,000 people at work in the State on C.W.A. projects, with a total weekly pay roll of $3,300,000. The recent cut in working hours has already cut that pay roll $910,000 a week.

The reduction in the working hours of 50,000 laborers on rural roads from 30 to 15 hours means that their pay has been cut from a little over $10 a week to barely $5 a week. That amount of pay constitutes work relief, not a C.W.A. job.

I have wired the President these facts and urged him not to permit the slowing up of C.W.A. now. It is our common duty to see that hundreds of thousands of Pennsylvania men, women, and children are not deprived of their means of livelihood and self-respect.

GIFFORD PINCHOT.

Mr. HAINES. Mr. Chairman, I am in entire accord with the gentleman from Illinois when he talks about balancing the Budget. I plead guilty to having gone up and down my district in the past urging that the Budget be balanced; but to me, over and above that, there is a sacred responsibility I owe my people—and I think every Member of Congress owes a similar responsibility—to see that the men and women of this Nation are employed and given at least the opportunity to earn their bread by the sweat of their brow.

We have in one of the cities in my district a project under C.W.A. that has given employment to almost 5,000 people, something worthwhile, constructive in its nature; and it is a godsend to my community.

In the city of York, which I have the honor to represent, one third of our people were in bread lines with nothing being done to put them to work. So the coming of the C.W.A. was a godsend to them.

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAINES. I yield.

Mr. BOLAND. Has the gentleman any information about P.W.A. projects for Pennsylvania which have been approved in Washington but not started in Pennsylvania, thereby curtailing the number of people who could be employed? Is that a fact?

Mr. HAINES. Surely.

Mr. BOLAND. In other words there are many P.W.A. projects for Pennsylvania that have been approved, but as yet have not been started?

Mr. HAINES. That is correct; we have a list of projects for Pennsylvania. I am sure if you cut off the work in my State, a lot of people now employed will find themselves again unemployed. I am very much in favor of continuing this C.W.A. work at least through the severe weather. We have got to keep our people employed during these winter months.

The particular project in my district is that of flood control. Last year we had a flood in my community which destroyed $5,000,000 of property in one city alone. We are trying to correct this situation through funds that a humane administration has seen fit to make available to our people. I hope Congress will be reluctant to listen to the criticism against this form of relief, whether the relief comes in this naval bill or from the N.I.R.A. I am interested in getting our people back to work. In my district I have a great industrial section as well as an agricultural section. I know the distress my constituents are in. Let me say, however, that I am one Member of Congress who, while interested in balancing the Budget, is more interested in seeing men and women being able to hold up their heads and feel they have worked for and earned that which they have received.

Mr. Chairman, this is no time for Members of Congress to raise a question of partisan politics. I do not care what a man's political affiliation is back in my district. I am interested in seeing that he has a job, and if the C.W.A. offers an opportunity for men to be employed, we are not only contributing to the morale of our people but we are also contributing to their needs in the support of their families.

When I go back home, as I do each week-end, men in every walk of life approach me and usually ask two questions, first, "Is the N.R.A. succeeding?" and, second, "Is there no other way to meet our present economic difficulty than through the revolutionary N.R.A.?" I believe that the answer to the first question is "yes", and that if our people will fully cooperate we can rehabilitate more rapidly. Hope and enthusiasm is Nation-wide, and even the leaders of our greatest industries, who were somewhat hesitant and held back about coming under codes of fair competition, as provided in the N.R.A., are rapidly becoming our greatest enthusiasts, and many of them who had experimental codes have had the agreements extended.

Now, as to the second question, whether this issue could not have been met in some other way, let me remind you, my colleagues, that there has been world-wide discontent and violent upheaval. The American plan differs in that we have had very few uprisings of any sort; and while our plan does differ from that of any other country that has had a similar economic experience, I believe I am safe in saying that our plan is more in keeping with the American method of doing things than those of the experiments tried in other countries. So I say, those of us in Congress who enacted the law which made possible the President's program have given an American method, one that is democratic in thought and action. In other words, labor, industry, and the Government become partners.

I believe that the most important problem before this Nation is to put our people back to work and to plan for them a better future, and, as the President so aptly puts it, "for a longer pull." I sincerely hope that the C.W.A. need only be temporary, but I want it known to all of you that if industry cannot absorb the unemployment of this country, I for one will advocate its continuance, even though it is so costly to the Government. The cost is not nearly as great as it would be otherwise, if we continued to have these millions unemployed. This is a tremendous problem, my colleagues, and it calls for cooperation on the part of every Member of this House on both sides of the aisle. I wish that we might forget that this is campaign year and say those things only that will instill continued hope in the minds of our industrial leaders, our labor leaders, the farmers, and the great host of others in America. Our people back home should ask only for such C.W.A. projects that will be most helpful, and, of course, that will employ the most human hands. I think it is a mistake to hand out a dole to our people; and if I had it my way, every man who is given relief through a charitable organization would be required to do a certain amount of work for the money given him. I am rather confident that practically all of them would prefer to work for what they receive, rather than be looked upon as objects of charity.

Let us back up the President in his program. There may be some things in the program that we do not like, but it is an effort toward recovery, and in that effort every one of us should do all he can to hold up the hands of the man in the White House in order that recovery may be made more rapidly.

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I thought we were very liberal in this matter when under general debate we allowed 7 hours for the discussion of matters in general. Another appropriation bill will follow this one, and in general debate on the next bill Members can get time in which to talk about matters other than the bill itself. That bill will come up this afternoon.

Now, I do feel, in view of our liberality in the matter of general debate on this bill, we should be permitted to go ahead and finish this bill, which ought to be done in the next 25 or 30 minutes, without debating other matters entirely out of order.

By unanimous consent, the pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

In expending appropriations or portions of appropriations contained in this act, for the payment for personal services in the District of Columbia in accordance with the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, with the exception of the Assistant Secretaries of the Navy, the average of the salaries of the total number of persons under any grade in any bureau, office, or other appropriation unit shall not at any time exceed the average of the compensation rates specified for the grade by such act, as amended: Provided, That this restriction shall not apply (1) to grades 1, 2, 3, and 4 of the clerical-mechanical service, or (2) to require the reduction in salary of any person whose compensation was fixed as of July 1, 1924, in accordance with the rules of section 6 of such act; (3) to require the reduction in salary of any person who is transferred from one position to another position in the same or different grade in the same or a different bureau, office, or other appropriation unit; (4) to prevent the payment of a salary under any grade at a rate higher than the maximum rate of the grade when such higher rate is permitted by the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, and is specifically authorized by other law; or (5) to reduce the compensation of any person in a grade in which only one position is allocated.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of getting into the RECORD information as to whether or not any testimony was taken on the dirigibles Los Angeles, Macon, and the other so-called "blimps." What is going to happen to these big airships? Are we going to continue them all in operation?

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. I may say that the Los Angeles is decommissioned. In other words, it is laid up, so to speak. So far as the Macon is concerned, it is in operation out on the Pacific coast.

Mr. GOSS. Is it the plan to dismantle the Los Angeles?

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. It is planned to dispose of the Los Angeles just as early as it may be practicable.

Mr. GOSS. Is the gentleman informed as to what the policy of the Government is going to be in regard to this type of airship in the future?

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. No; I am not. I may say that it will depend very largely upon the result of operations of the Macon with the fleet.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, a few moments ago my colleague, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN], though he claimed a desire to cooperate with the administration and to approve all its activities—which, of course, is splendid on his part—nevertheless finds fault with the administration on every possible and impossible occasion, and now with the committee because it has provided a naval appropriation of $295,000,000, and an additional $147,000,000 is to be provided for the Navy from other funds.

The gentleman is well informed on naval affairs, being the ranking member of the Committee on Naval Affairs. We are about to take a vote on this bill. I should like to know from him if there are any provisions in this bill that he feels should be eliminated.

Mr. BRITTEN. Would the gentleman care to hear from me now?

Mr. SABATH. Not at this time, please. I feel that had there been any items placed in the bill that were not justifiable and that did not meet with his approval, he, having had plenty of opportunity to object, would have objected to the subcommittee on naval appropriations, which, I am sure, would have given him a hearing and enabled him to object, thus informing the subcommittee at that time rather than have him object at this late hour. As I have said before, this able subcommittee has given this bill most thorough and careful consideration. Therefore, the gentleman's criticism is not justified and is made, as we understand, for political reasons only.

This is the first time in many years I have heard him complain that appropriations for the Navy are too large. It is amusing to me. But I know that all he wants to do is to criticize the administration with the lame assertion that it will not be able to balance the Budget. I do not know whether it will or not; but I know that the deficit under this administration will not be so great as it was under the Republican administration. Whatever the deficit is to be, it will be for really constructive work under the wise and benevolent leadership of President Roosevelt, who is laudably providing employment for millions who were thrown out of employment owing very largely to Republican misrule. I know also that for the years 1931, 1932, and 1933, under a Republican administration, the deficit was more than $5,000,000,000. I never heard my talented colleague complain that his administration was not balancing the Budgets of those days. Notwithstanding that, most of that money was wasted and expended in a way which has properly subjected that administration not only to serious criticism but also to serious attack.

Mr. BRITTEN. I want to ask the gentleman a serious question.

Mr. SABATH. If that is possible, all right. [Laugher.]

Mr. BRITTEN. The President came here the other day and stated there was going to be a deficit of $7,000,000,000 this year.

Mr. SABATH. Yes.

Mr. BRITTEN. Is the gentleman still suggesting that the Budget will be balanced and that that is not an important deficit?

Mr. SABATH. No; I have not made such an assertion. I have never given a great deal of serious consideration to the clamor in reference to balancing the Budget, because it never has been balanced, and the deficit that will be created this year will be for constructive work that is bringing the country back to the prosperity which it enjoyed under a former Democratic administration.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. Yes; I gladly yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman ought to feel most charitable toward his colleague from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN].

Mr. SABATH. I do feel charitable toward him.

Mr. BLANTON. Because the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN] is suffering a great disappointment. The gentleman and his Republican colleagues helped to provide magnificent quarters for the Naval Affairs Committee, and then the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN] lost the chairmanship and never got to enjoy the palatial suite. [Laughter.]

Mr. SABATH. This failure to retain the committee chairmanship should not be charged to my colleague, Mr. BRITTEN, because we all know that he worked exceedingly hard to effect the reelection of President Hoover as well as a Republican Congress.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LANHAM, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill H.R. 7199, the naval appropriation bill, had directed him to report the same back with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments thereto to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. AYRES of Kansas, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

HOUSE RESOLUTION 236

Mr. DE PRIEST. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there any objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. DE PRIEST. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following resolution offered by me today:

Whereas it has come to my attention, as a Representative in Congress, that a rule of discrimination is being enforced in the restaurant service of the House of Representatives; and

Whereas I stand peculiarly as the representative of the 12,000,000 loyal colored citizens of the United States; and

Whereas these people and their forbears have contributed of might and main, blood and sinew, in the development of this country; and

Whereas from the year 1619, when a group of 20 slaves were landed at Jamestown, Va., these people have been loyal to the country to which they and their forbears were brought through a commercial traffic in human souls; and

Whereas for 244 years of unrequited toil these loyal citizens tilled the soil, planted the fields, harvested the crops of the southern plantations, nursed and succored the families of their masters, were custodians of the "family chest" while master was at war to keep them in slavery; and

Whereas the first blood that fertilized the soil of this continent in the cause of liberty and fraternity flowed from the life stream of that hero-martyr Crispus Attucks, who fell on Boston Common in 1770; and

Whereas the colored citizens of the United States have borne their full share of responsibility and sacrifice in every military movement in which this country has been engaged from the Revolutionary period, through the Civil War, on through Carizal, San Juan Hill, and the Argonne front; and

Whereas this loyalty must gain for them the liberal plaudits of patriotic America and place them beyond the pale of present-day serfdom and slavery; and

Whereas under the Constitution of the United States and the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments thereof these people are citizens of the United States, entitled to all the privileges and immunities as are enjoyed by others; and

Whereas in the Washington Post of the issue of Wednesday, January 24, 1934, the Honorable Representative LINDSAY C. WARREN, of the First District of North Carolina, chairman of the Committee on Accounts, House of Representatives, is quoted as saying: "In refusing to serve two colored persons in the House restaurant today, Manager P. H. Johnson of the restaurant was acting under my orders and instructions", and

Whereas Representative LINDSAY C. WARREN, of the First District of North Carolina, chairman of the Committee on Accounts, House of Representatives, is further quoted in said Post as saying, "The restaurant has been operated by the committee since 1921. It has never served colored employees or visitors, nor will it, so long as I have anything to do with the restaurant;" and

Whereas the rule of discrimination was put in force and effect Tuesday, January 23, 1934, and the restaurant of the House of Representatives announced that the service was reserved for white people only to the exclusion of colored citizens, and two colored persons were so refused as stated; and

Whereas the House of Representatives of the Sixty-seventh Congress (H.R. 99) adopted the following resolution June 2, 1921, to wit:

"Resolved, That there shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House such sums as may be necessary to make such alterations and improvements of the rooms occupied by the restaurant with sanitary fixtures and utensils as may in the judgment of the Committee on Accounts, be deemed advisable and necessary; and until otherwise ordered by the House the management of the House restaurant and all matters connected therewith shall be under the direction of the Committee on Accounts"; and

Whereas said simple resolution lost its force and effect upon the final adjournment of the Sixty-seventh Congress, since which time the House of Representatives of succeeding Congresses, including the present Congress, has not adopted a resolution conferring authority upon the Committee on Accounts to manage and control said House restaurant: Therefore,

Resolved, That a committee of five Members of the House be appointed by the Speaker to investigate by what authority the Committee on Accounts controls and manages the conduct of the House restaurant and by what authority said committee or any members thereof issued and enforced rules or instructions whereby any citizen of the United States is discriminated against on account of race, color, or creed in said House restaurant, grill room, or other public appurtenances or facilities connected therewith under the supervision of the House of Representatives.

Said committee is authorized to send for persons and papers and to administer oaths to witnesses and shall report their conclusions and recommendations to the House at the earliest practicable moment.

I have read the resolution mentioned by the gentleman adopted in June 1921 under which he is claiming to act at this time and which is erroneous because the Sixty-seventh Congress by House resolution cannot bind the action of the Seventy-third or any succeeding Congress. This is why I have asked the appointment of a committee to investigate the whole question.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

TREASURY AND POST OFFICE DEPARTMENTS APPROPRIATION BILL, FISCAL YEAR 1935

Mr. ARNOLD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 7295) making appropriations for the Treasury and Post Office Departments for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and for other purposes; and, pending that, may I suggest to the gentleman from New York that we come to some arrangement as to general debate and division of time. I have not many requests for time on this side.

Mr. TABER. We have not a large number of requests at this time. I would suggest to the gentleman that probably we would finish a little quicker if we went into the Committee and divided the time equally. Perhaps we would get through in time to start reading the bill this afternoon.

Mr. ARNOLD. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time for general debate be equally divided and controlled by the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] and myself.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H.R. 7295, the Treasury and Post Office Departments appropriation bill, with Mr. FULLER in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

Mr. ARNOLD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CASTELLOW].

Mr. CASTELLOW. Mr. Chairman, I was very pleased to support the Navy bill, which was just passed by the House. It is true, of course, that as money was formerly considered it carries a rather large appropriation. On the other hand, while I believe in economy, I realize there is such a thing as false economy. If we individually have something worth protecting, in my judgment, it would be false economy to reduce expenditures for locks. If our country were deluged with poisonous gas, it would certainly be false economy to minimize the importance of gas masks. As the world seems to be of beligerent mind at this time, in my judgment, it would be false economy to reduce appropriations for our national defense.

I respectfully submit that a government should be a business institution and as such the same rules which apply to the transaction of ordinary business apply with equal force in the management and operation of its affairs. While I have not studied extensively the operation of government from a theoretical standpoint, I have observed for many years the practical operation and effect of principles applied in its management.

I have been especially impressed with the results of the activities within certain political subdivisions. In my State we have an unusually large number of counties. As I recall, there are 159 at present. I have read some splendid editorials upon the subject of consolidating these counties and forming larger governmental units. This suggestion has been sponsored by men of unquestioned ability and I have read with great interest something of what they have had to say upon the question. The contention is, of course, that a reduction in the number of counties will effectuate a reduction in the number of offices to the great financial advantage of the taxpayer. We know, as a practical proposition, that a hotel can feed 100 guests much cheaper per capita than it can feed 50 or 25. We know there is economy per article in mass production. This principle applies throughout business. It does seem it could and should apply to governmental agencies with even greater force than in private affairs, as it appears logical that it should be much cheaper per capita to govern 100,000 men as a unit than it would be 10,000 men as such, but let us observe its practical operation, Mr. Chairman. Where theory conflicts with the results of actual experience, I am of the definite opinion that theory should yield. In my section of Georgia, which happens to be the southern part, for many years I have paid taxes in five counties and naturally on account of personal interests have observed the respective rates of taxation. These counties differ greatly in size, one at least being among the smallest in the State.

I have compared most carefully the rate of taxes assessed by these several counties, and they seem to vary almost in proportion to size, the lowest rate prevailing in the smallest counties. Only 2 counties in the State of Georgia, as I recall, have a tax rate for county purposes as low as 3 mills. These counties are Clay and Schley, both in the third district, which I have the honor of representing at this time. They are both small counties and only assess 3 mills for county purposes. I visit them along with other counties, and so far as public activities are concerned I have been unable to observe any appreciable difference. If it works this way, as indeed it seems to, there is a perfectly logical reason for it, as nothing is a "happen so." There is a perfectly logical reason for everything which has transpired since time began, though it may often be with the greatest difficulty that the cause or reason is ascertained. There is no such thing as an accident in the common acceptation of the term, for the same causes and conditions produce, without exception, the same results. Then why do we find this condition existing?

I apprehend, Mr. Chairman, there is one thing we would do well to consider throughout all our legislation, and that is the human equation. It is most hazardous in any event to reckon without it. I am cognizant of the fact that the matter which I am immediately discussing could be of no special interest to this House except as it may elucidate a principle, and I hope presently to so apply it. Some time ago I was discussing with a friend in Cordele, Ga., this question of consolidation and the effect upon administrative expenditures. After stating the facts just related to you, and in an effort to make clear my idea as to the causes of the great difference in results from the application of a principle to private enterprise and public government, I gave to him the following rather crude illustration. I remarked, "We are now in Cordele, Ga.; Vienna is 12 miles distant.

"If we had 100 tons of sugar on a truck of sufficient strength to bear such a burden, and undertook with manpower to transport it from Cordele to Vienna, and a thousand men were to do the pushing, the probability is the truck would not reach Vienna without stalling. It would probably proceed quite nicely for a time and so continue as long as all, or comparatively all, continued to push or pull, but presently it would occur to some man that his efforts were not essential where so many were engaged and consequently he would lag. His neighbor would not be slow to observe the dereliction but would be slow, for fear of offense, to remark upon it. Seeing that the conveyance continued to move regardless of his friend's withdrawal, he might soon conclude that his friend was wise and emulate his example. Another observing the two, and with an even greater desire for ease, might conclude to ride and so board the truck with the result that many doing likewise, we find it stark still in the middle of a hard-surfaced road on a perfect level."

Gentlemen, there is a warning in this picture which it might behoove us as a Nation to consider. What has been the situation of America during recent years? This great truck, with its splendid cargo, stopped dead still in the middle of the road, on level ground, with no one for a time apparently able to budge it. We cannot attribute the situation to Providence. We have not suffered from famine nor pestilence, and nature has been most generous. Our harvests have been abundant, our granaries filled to overflowing, yet we found ourselves in such an unfortunate situation that we were unable to render unto Caesar the things that are Caesar's, unto God the things that are God's, and at the same time provide for the outstretched and pleading hands of humanity—that which every citizen has a right to expect—the opportunity to earn an honest living. The real manhood of America expects nothing more and will be content with nothing less. We are not, and I trust to God will never be, a Nation of beggars. [Applause.]

An extended dole will finally destroy any nation by depleting the morale of its citizens. I can understand now, better than ever before, the full meaning of the expression, "It is better to give than to receive", for in the giving the giver is strengthened, and in receiving the recipient is weakened. May we all throughout the Nation apply these principles to our conduct as it relates to the Government. Let every man realize that the contribution of his effort is essential to its proper functioning.

This brings to mind a splendid cartoon which appeared in the papers just after the last census. It showed a boastful youngster as he appeared all puffed up with pride and asked his companions if they had seen what the papers were saying about him that morning. "They've said nothing about you," was the taunting reply. "Oh, yes, they have," came the rejoinder, "they say there are 120,000,000 people in the United States and I'm one of 'em." A great lesson if taken thoughtfully!

But, reverting again to the illustration and putting it another way, the load, as we understand, is of sugar contained in 200-pound sacks, and, in accordance with the plan, is to be divided equally among those engaged in its transportation at the end of the journey. What probably would happen along the way is that someone would slip off a sack. If another saw him, he would probably be a friend to whom it would naturally occur that the taking was not fair nor honest, and his first impulse might be to report it; but upon second thought he would probably conclude that, inasmuch as this was his friend, whose enmity he preferred not to incur, and, after all, the taking of such a small quantity from this bulky supply would not diminish his portion a spoonful in the final division, he concludes to say nothing and passes it by.

Others seeing or learning of this successful taking would naturally at first be inclined to condemn, but afterwards condone to the extent of emulating his example, with the result that, if the vehicle did eventually reach its intended destination, there would probably be an insufficient quantity of sugar aboard to justify the sweeping of the floor. To make application just here, I state most regretfully that from many sources comes the question, "Will the many loans which the Government is so generously making ever be required to be paid in full?" The sentiment seems to be growing that they will not, and especially those extended to political subdivisions. So with that thought comes this conclusion, expressed in common parlance, "Let's get ours while the getting is good!" Can it be possible, my colleagues, that he who waits for the division at the end of the journey will be greeted with only an empty truck?

Referring again to the problem of transportation, I hazard this suggestion: Suppose we divide the commodity at the beginning of the journey, giving to each man his 200-pound sack of sugar and furnish him a wheelbarrow with which to transport it to Vienna; then let some fellow rest his avoirdupois upon any one of these wheelbarrows. My prediction is that it would be interesting indeed to observe the result. Or, let him presume to appropriate one of those sacks after it had been reduced to exclusive ownership, and the consequence might be equally interesting. Such is human nature, without due consideration of which we reckon in vain. It has been often said there is safety in numbers, but may I suggest that in too great a number there might be weakness. Consider China, the greatest Government on earth, if only numbers are considered; but what of her condition?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. ARNOLD. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 10 minutes more.

Mr. CASTELLOW. What of China and her Government? Do not think the Chinaman is a fool by any means. It was not for the lack of intelligence of those people that they have been reduced to negligible rank in the role of nations. Their ancestors were philosophers, while ours were possibly in an uncleared forest, and yet what of their Government today? A little handful of people on a small island, coming probably from the same stock, runs over China at will, the same as a live rat runs over the carcass of a dead elephant. What is the next largest government in numbers? That of India, and it becomes necessary for another small island across the sea, and inhabited by a different race, to furnish India with a stable government. The next largest government on earth is Russia, a people of our own race, and what has been the experience of this erstwhile powerful "Bear of the North"? The world has spoken for years its estimate of Russia as a nation and as a government. Now comes the most interesting of all, the next largest country in population, the United States of America, our own beloved country, the land of the Stars and Stripes and of boasted liberty, the most desirable part of this globe in which to live. But let us take warning, if indeed we should need it, from what has befallen others. Possibly the truest measure of real intelligence is the ability to profit by the experience of others. These thoughts might well challenge our most serious consideration, especially in the light of some of our past and present experiences. The scientists tell us the largest animal that ever trod the soil of this earth was the dinosaur, but he is not with us today, and why? Being the largest, most ferocious, and most powerful of all animals, it does seem that he at least should have been able to perpetuate his species. I apprehend his size and strength, the very things upon which he relied, were his undoing. His brain evidently was not in keeping with his size and importance. The ancestors of the rat coming along possibly about the same time possessed even less brain, and yet their descendants are with us. While doubtless they possessed less intelligence, at the same time they had so much less in proportion for that intelligence to protect.

Practically 150 years ago we began a most wonderful Government in a country not nearly so large as we have now. In the beginning of our national existence our entire population was less than we have in a single city of today. A small body, so to speak, but a most remarkable intelligence in the personnel of our peerless statesmen whose names are household words and need no mentioning. We have grown in extent of territory and population to tremendous proportions. The vital question is: Has our statesmanship kept pace with our physical development? We are now experiencing a crucial test, and I pray the results may not be disappointing. While we have a great, fearless, and experienced leader and statesman directing our course, his responsibilities and burdens are greater than any borne before, and an unselfish cooperation of our citizens generally is, in my judgment, essential to ultimate success.

While fiscal matters may not be of paramount importance they are certainly deserving of consideration. We feel so secure in the greatness of our national wealth that we have come to speak of billions of dollars as being a matter of only casual concern. While it appears necessary to spend with a lavishness never before dreamed of, it behooves us to give thought to the effect of this spending—not so important, perhaps, in the effect upon the Treasury as the effect upon our citizens, though it is within the realm of possibility that even a Treasury deficit could be of concern.

There is much water in the Atlantic Ocean, but even that could be emptied with spoons if we had enough spoons and somewhere to put the water, and with an efficient and active appropriations committee the place might be provided. The magnitude and number of the avenues of approach to the Federal Treasury is by no means reassuring. The spending of money is, of course, essential. No business or enterprise can be conducted without it. But what if the limit is reached?

I am anticipating with the greatest interest one more phase of our activities here—the report of the Committee on Ways and Means upon the subject of providing revenue is sure to furnish interesting reading. While it is not my desire to be in the least critical, I have been impressed by the fact that our spending committee, the Appropriations Committee, is entirely distinct and disassociated with our Ways and Means Committee, charged with the duty of providing the wherewithal to pay the bills. This, however, is rather in keeping with the way in which many of our families are conducted—one part does the spending, another must provide the funds. I have always felt that the one who provides the money should have something to say about how it is spent. Another thing, too, my observation is that the Appropriations Committee acts first. In other words, the money is spent before it is provided.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CASTELLOW. Yes; with pleasure.

Mr. HOEPPEL. We also have another committee in this House to gag, so the people of the country can receive nothing.

Mr. CASTELLOW. I have always been of the opinion that the committee making the appropriations should be charged with the duty of providing the funds to meet them; and my judgment is, further, that it is usually a wise policy to have the money provided, or at least in prospect, before the investment or allocation is made. However, upon this point I am evidently in the minority.

There is one other matter to which I feel attention should be directed, and that is to the situation as regards our relief program. What is being done to prepare these people for a resumption of their individual responsibilities in the normal walks of life where they must soon be called, not only to rely upon themselves for their individual support but to become factors in the support of the Government if we are to carry on. We cannot rely upon these expedients indefinitely, and we will have played false to these people if we fail to prepare them gradually for resumption of their obligations and duties as self-reliant citizens. My observation is that the fixed laws of nature which affect the various phases of life apply with equal force to man. We all know that a canary bird raised in a cage without the necessity of self-reliance becomes not only dependent but comparatively helpless. If suddenly given its liberty it would likely starve in the same environment where an ordinary English sparrow would fatten. The longer one is maintained in a position where he is not called upon to rely upon his own resources the more helpless he becomes. The point I am endeavoring to stress is that time will necessarily be required in the abandonment of these activities, and to this extent it is my wish to admonish those in authority. It would be manifestly unjust to remove at once from a sheltered position thousands of men and women and thrust them unprepared into the sharp conflict of the struggle for individual existence. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CASTELLOW] has expired.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH].

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, in 1931, when the Post Office appropriation bill was before the House, I endeavored to elicit information from the then chairman of the committee relative to the tremendous increase in the costs of leases that were contracted for by the Post Office Department, which leases appeared to me to be unjustifiably exorbitant and unreasonably high. I wanted to know, in view of the growing deficit in the Post Office Department, why it was that we should continue to increase the prices of leaseholds or leases for post offices.

The same day a Republican colleague of ours from Minnesota called my attention to a great abuse in the city of St. Paul, where more than $1,000,000 had been paid for a lease, which action, he claimed, was positively criminal. He demanded an investigation. All I desired here at that time was information. I was unable to obtain any information; and thereupon I endeavored to get the information from the Department, but unfortunately, again I was unsuccessful. The following year, when the Post Office Department appropriation bill was before the House, my attention was again called to the growing abuses in the Post Office Department, and I served notice on the chairman of that committee as well as the Postmaster General, that unless the Department ceased those abuses, including the criminal wastes and expenditures, I would introduce a resolution demanding an investigation of that Department. The saturnalia of abuses continued, and, consequently, I did introduce that resolution, and the House acted favorably upon it and authorized and directed the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads to make an investigation, not only as to the exorbitant prices paid for leased premises, but also the exorbitant and unjustifiable prices that were paid for sites purchased by the Post Office Department for post-office buildings.

In the same resolution I also requested the investigation of the unjustifiable, yes, criminal, contracts that were entered into by the Postmaster General for the Air Mail Service and ocean mail service.

My resolution called for an investigation of those matters, including the exorbitant prices that were being paid to the railroads for the carrying of the mail. My resolution was adopted and a committee was authorized to make the investigation, but, unfortunately, due to lack of an adequate appropriation, it never has been able to proceed properly to investigate all these shameful abuses which are now coming to light. Whereupon in the last session of Congress the Senate appointed a committee to take up and investigate those abuses, which the House committee was unable to make, due to the fact that they could not engage investigators or attorneys to aid the committee to ferret out the crooked deals. I do not wish to criticize the Post Office Committee of the House, because the chairman of that committee is an able, honest, and sincere gentleman who secured valuable information as to some of the air mail contracts, also as to some of the outlandish and outrageous leases that had been contracted for, and the purchase of some of the sites; but he and his committee were almost fatally handicapped by a lack of adequate funds. They could not get an experienced, competent investigator or anyone else, such as able counsel, to aid them in thoroughly conducting the investigation. I am pleased that the life of that committee has been extended so that it may proceed with renewed vigor to the further investigation of these abuses.

But in the meantime, as I have stated, the other body has acted, and only this morning I read in the newspapers to what extent these unfaithful representatives of the last administration had gone; to what extent the former Postmaster General had gone to serve those specially favored interests, such as steamship companies and air mail combinations. I am satisfied that before the Senate committee has concluded its investigation it will disclose many more frauds against the Government than have been disclosed in the last few days. Personally, of course, I would have preferred that the House had the opportunity and facilities at that time to properly conduct that investigation, but I am satisfied that from this time on the House will agree with me that it has certain functions to perform, and that it should not, whenever a resolution to investigate wrongdoing on the part of any official is offered, shirk its plain duty and refuse to proceed with such investigation. I am satisfied that if the Post Office Committee had been placed in a position to proceed properly with its investigation in 1931 and 1932, our Government would have saved millions upon millions of dollars and the deficit of 1932 would not have reached more than $180,000,000 in that Department alone.

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. I am glad to yield.

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Is there not some way of canceling some of those contracts that have been obtained by fraud?

Mr. SABATH. That is just what I want to call attention to.

Mr. SHOEMAKER. I was informed that there was one of these contracts on one of the shipping lines that operates from San Francisco to Mazatlan, Mexico.

On some of these trips there is not even one sack of mail carried. The contract pays for the entire operation of the shipping line for the year. If there is no mail on a trip the captain of the ship will sit down in San Francisco and address a letter to himself at Mazatlan so they can carry mail; and for this one letter they collect $24,000.

Mr. SABATH. I fully agree with the gentleman that all these fraudulent contracts should be canceled; and I arise today for the purpose of demanding the cancelation of all these fraudulent contracts not only in the Air Mail Service but also in the Railway Mail and the Ocean Mail Services. I demand and insist that immediate steps be taken to cancel all the fraudulent leases that have been made throughout the United States, leases which cost the Government needless millions of dollars annually. This applies likewise to the purchase of sites that were entered into during the years 1930, 1931, 1932, and the first 3 months of 1933.

So I have taken the floor to call attention to these abuses. As I have stated, I tried to bring about that investigation in 1931 and 1932; and although I succeeded in having passed in 1932 the resolution to investigate these wholesale frauds against the Government on the part of a Republican post office administration, the committee was unable to do justice either to the House or itself or the cause involved because of lack of funds with which to engage properly qualified investigators who could aid them in ferreting out these dishonest deals and their ramifications.

I greatly regret to read in today's paper that these predatory interests have gone so far as to influence a Republican Member of the Senate to conduct a filibuster to enable a steamship company and a railroad company to wiggle out at the very last minute one of these fraudulent contracts; but, thanks be to God, another department was able to prevent its consummation.

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. I yield, with pleasure.

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Does the gentleman know that the United States Government is running a line of boats to Panama Canal from New York and that a private shipping company follows the Government boat with one of its boats, 3 or 4 hours later, and gets a big contract for carrying mail which could be carried on our own Government boats, and that the contract to this private company amounts to hundreds of thousands of dollars annually?

Mr. SABATH. I know of this and many other abuses, as I have received in the last 4 years so many complaints against that department that I could hardly believe the men then in power could have had the temerity, the gall, the audacity to go as far in robbing the Government as they did. Therefore I am calling upon not only the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads but every other committee of this House having any information and jurisdiction in the matter to familiarize the Postmaster General and the President so as to aid in bringing about the cancelation of all these fraudulent contracts. If proper steps are taken, it will mean the saving of millions and millions of dollars to the Government, and it will not be necessary for us to reduce the salaries of the low-paid employees.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. ARNOLD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 6 additional minutes to the gentleman from Illinois.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. GLOVER). The gentleman is recognized for 6 additional minutes.

Mr. SABATH. Yesterday when I rose to call attention to an item carried in the Navy appropriation bill, a Member on the Republican side wanted to know what investigations I had advocated. Answering him hurriedly I named seven investigations I have advocated, some of which are now being prosecuted. In my answer, however, I failed to mention one investigation in which I am especially interested and which I started advocating in 1929. Had the House acted then, as I have said on this floor many times, the country would not be in its present deplorable condition. In 1929 I demanded an investigation of that robbing institution known as the "Stock Exchange" and of the infamous scoundrels who control that wicked institution, these crooked gamblers and unscrupulous bankers who robbed millions of honest American people and who still are outside but deserve to be within the walls of the penitentiary, while many unfortunate small bankers who took their advice and invested in their securities are being prosecuted and sent to jail. I say that if anybody should be sent to jail they are these despicable, contemptible manipulators and other malefactors I tried to reach by my resolution in 1929, so that in the future we could prevent the recurrence of these unfortunate things and from which our good and matchless President is now trying with all his might and ingenuity to rebuild what they have destroyed.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, that is the reason I have taken the floor again today to call attention to the need of immediate legislation not only for the punishment of those guilty of the near destruction of our Nation and those whose nefarious acts and wanton disregard of humanity engulfed nearly 99 percent of our American citizenry, ruined our commerce, and deprived millions of people of employment, but to urge the enactment of such legislation as will rehabilitate these suffering millions and put them to work. I reiterate the demand for the prosecution of those guilty criminals and for the passage of legislation that will make impossible in the future a recurrence of such crimes. Though I have several bills pending, I know that at this time I cannot effect their consideration; but I am reliably informed that, under the direction of the President, a bill is being drafted looking to the elimination of these untenable abuses on all the stock exchanges. It is my earnest hope that the proposed bill will reach this floor shortly and that it will be speedily enacted into law.

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. I gladly yield.

Mr. BOLAND. Yesterday I was very much interested in the various investigations the gentleman from Illinois said he had advocated. I noticed that all these investigations he referred to were prior to December 1931. Has the gentleman offered any resolution of a similar nature since that time?

Mr. SABATH. Yes. I may say that the resolution authorizing and directing the Post Office Committee to make an investigation was passed in 1932. Of course some of these resolutions are still pending and some committees are working. I am hopeful that we may pass a resolution to investigate the Treasury Department so we may learn who were responsible for and made possible the refund of $2,000,000,000 of the people's money to the pockets of the specially favored interests, those men who were the beneficiaries under the last three Republican administrations.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. I gladly yield to my friend.

Mr. McFARLANE. Does not the gentleman believe that while we are investigating these parties we ought also to insist upon being made public the tax returns of these tax evaders?

Mr. SABATH. We passed such a resolution in 1932, but these very men whom it affected started a hue and cry that it would be detrimental to the interests of the people to publish what their incomes and profits were. I myself believe we should give full publicity to everything that is being done because, after all, these men are the beneficiaries of the Government; they have the protection of the Government; they should be the subjects of the Government, not its masters.

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. I am very glad to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BOLAND. The gentleman referred to tax refunds. The gentleman is aware, of course, that $3,000,000,000 of this $4,000,000,000 which was returned under Andrew Mellon in the form of tax refunds went to Pennsylvania, is he not?

Mr. SABATH. I really do not know whether $3,000,000,000 is the amount that went to Pennsylvania; but I do know that most of it went to Pennsylvania, New York, to a few of the large manipulators, and to the 347 directors who are owned and controlled by the House of Morgan.

Mr. BOLAND. In other words, $100,000,000 went to the Bethlehem Steel Co.?

Mr. SABATH. Which is, of course, a Pennsylvania corporation.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BLANCHARD].

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask a question of the chairman of the subcommittee, if I may be permitted to do so. I propounded a similar question to the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] a few days ago on the subject of the C.W.A. My question goes to the sums that have been allocated out of the $3,300,000,000, some of said sums for the coming year and some going as far into the future as 1936. I asked the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] the question whether or not in his opinion the President had the right to reallocate funds from the $3,300,000,000, making those funds available to the C.W.A. for both the present program and the contemplated extended program which has been discussed on many occasions.

Mr. ARNOLD. I will say to the gentleman that, so far as that $3,300,000,000 fund is concerned, the Administrator of Public Works has the right to make allocations from that fund as he sees fit. There are absolutely no restrictions on what he might do as to allocation of such funds. He did allocate something like $400,000,000 of the $3,300,000,000 to the Civil Works Administration.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I understand it requires an Executive order to add any funds now to what has been allocated?

Mr. ARNOLD. The money, as I understand it, has already been allocated. I understand they may come down here and ask for an additional appropriation to carry on some of the work further.

Mr. BLANCHARD. That goes to the point I have in mind. Is it the gentleman's opinion that additional legislation is required to extend the C.W.A. activities or to make funds available to the C.W.A. authorities at this time so these programs may continue?

Mr. ARNOLD. I do not understand that additional legislation is necessary. The basic law is there for that purpose, but Congress will have to appropriate the funds.

Mr. BLANCHARD. We appropriated in the special session of Congress $3,300,000,000. We have not even approached the point where we are going to use up all of those funds, because much of it has been allocated into the future as far as 1936. Why is it not possible at this time to make use of some of the money appropriated in the special session of Congress and not heretofore expended for civil-works activities?

Mr. ARNOLD. The C.W.A. activities fund is pretty well used, as I understand it. It will be exhausted by the 15th of February.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I understand that perfectly.

Mr. ARNOLD. If the work is to be carried on any further, it will require an additional fund.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Why could not those funds come out of the money appropriated in the special session of Congress.

Mr. ARNOLD. The $3,300,000,000 has been allotted. Just what the machinery or mechanics will be as to getting additional funds for that purpose, I cannot answer the gentleman definitely.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANCHARD. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I do not think the gentleman fully understands how the Treasury handles these appropriations. We have appropriated $3,300,000,000. This money is not all in the Treasury of the United States. It is a charge against the Treasury and is secured as it is needed. Take a project that requires 4 years to complete. They pay as they go along and raise the money as it is needed.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Oh, I understand that perfectly.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. The money we are going to spend in 1936, for instance, on a project that extends over a period of 3 or 4 years, will be raised in that year. The money is not now in the Treasury. Therefore it could not be used for some other purpose.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I understand that.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. If it were applied to the C.W.A. projects, they would have to go out immediately and finance that allocation in some way; that is, if the money was going to be used at once.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Of course, everyone knows the money has to be raised. We cannot spend millions of dollars without at the same time raising the necessary funds by taxation or otherwise. But I call the Members' attention to the fact that there was allocated to the Coast and Geodetic Survey the sum of $6,463,000 out of the same fund. I wish to add that that afterward was withdrawn.

The point I have in mind is that, with the severe situation that has arisen as a result of the curtailment of the C.W.A. program over all the United States and the legitimate demand made upon the Federal authorities by municipal authorities of the various States that this program continue at least until many of the projects are completed, and with the winter months before us, I think it presents to Congress for consideration at this time a problem of very serious moment. Let me give you an illustration of exactly what is transpiring in my home State, because of the fact, as the Federal authorities claim, we have exceeded our quota. Perhaps we have exceeded our quota, but through no fault of the local officials or through no fault of the people of my State. They have started many of these projects and now are unable to complete them because the Federal authorities say the funds are running out. If this were merely a program on the roadside, you could curtail the operation without any serious consequences to the projects themselves, but there are dozens—yes, hundreds—of school projects in the State of Wisconsin that were started as a result of the C.W.A. program which cannot be completed. In my district, because of the curtailment order that went into effect a few days ago, we have some country schoolhouses that cannot be completed so that they may be occupied within a reasonable length of time.

Let me read a letter from the county superintendent of schools of Rock County, Wis.:

OFFICE OF SUPERINTENDENT OF SCHOOLS,
ROCK COUNTY, WIS.,
Janesville, January 22, 1934.

HON. GEORGE W. BLANCHARD,
House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. BLANCHARD: I have been watching the news items in the Janesville Daily Gazette concerning the C.W.A. work and project and appreciate very much the effort that you have been putting forth to have these projects continued.

The latest information that has come to my attention concerning the C.W.A. project is indicative that the time for the men on the rural-school jobs has been cut down to 15 hours a week. A good many of our rural districts have undertaken to put basements under the schoolhouses. Many of these schoolhouses are sitting up on stilts or beams. Schools are being held temporarily in old homes, rooms of houses, and in one case in a former tavern. If the amount of time is going to remain permanently at 15 hours a week, I just wonder what is going to happen in an educational way to the boys and girls that are attending school this year. I certainly hope that you may be able to have the number of hours on these rural-school jobs extended to a longer period than 15 hours a week.

Yours very truly,

G. T. LONGBOTHAM,
County Superintendent of Schools.

I appreciate the fact as well as you do that at some time there must be a tapering off of these activities, but this is not the opportune time to put into effect a curtailment order.

I attempted to elicit information from the chairman of the subcommittee so that I might decide to my own satisfaction whether or not the President or the administrative authorities of the public relief funds, the C.W.A. and the P.W.A., might not immediately allot sufficient funds so that some of these projects could be brought to completion at an early date.

Mr. ARNOLD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANCHARD. Yes.

Mr. ARNOLD. Of course, I do not know how extensive these projects have been in the gentleman's community. It is possible that a community or a State might provide or lay out a program which they would hope to complete under the Civil Works Administration that would be far beyond anything that could be accomplished along that line. I do not know what kind of program was laid out so far as your local authorities are concerned. The chances are that what the gentleman says as to his community would apply over all the country if these people are so ambitious as to lay out big programs and expect the Government to come along and pay the expense. Naturally there must be a limitation on those things.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I quite agree with the gentleman, but these are not ambitious building programs. They are repair and remodeling jobs. The ones I have definitely in mind are installations in some cases of furnaces and heating units; in other cases, the construction of a basement.

Quite naturally you can understand what has happened to many of these schoolhouses in the country where they have gone about the digging of a basement and the construction of a foundation and then found the work suspended completely or drastically curtailed because of a lack of funds.

I am not so concerned about the local aspects of the situation. If I were satisfied that it was the duty of Congress at this time to provide additional funds, then I might know where the responsibility rests; but I am far from convinced, because of what has happened here in the last few days, that there is not ample authority right in the administrative branch of the Government to reallocate some of these funds and make them available for the C.W.A. If curtailment must eventually come, it should not be put into effect as it has been during the past week. My criticism, if it is a criticism—and I hope it is not a so-called "destructive criticism"—perhaps should be leveled against the entire system which permits Federal authorities to set up projects and then discontinue them. It is a criticism, of course, of the system that handles projects of this character.

Mr. BOLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANCHARD. I yield.

Mr. BOLAND. I listened to the gentleman's statement about all the different projects and jobs that have been started and half finished and then stopped because of a curtailment order. I should like to know why all these jobs were started and allowed to get into this condition. Was there not money enough allocated before the jobs were started, or was there not some provision made so they could be completed? It seems to me rather strange that so many jobs should have been started and half finished and then no funds provided to complete them.

Mr. BLANCHARD. To be frank with the gentleman, I would attribute it largely to the administrator in the State of Wisconsin, the Federal authority in charge of the work. If this man exceeded his authority and laid out too ambitious a program, naturally, Wisconsin cannot expect treatment different from that given any other State; but if at the same time the Federal authorities have sanctioned a program of this kind and we now find ourselves in a situation in which many of our schools cannot be properly conducted, then it naturally follows that the necessary sums should be allocated to the C.W.A. so that these worth-while projects may be completed.

Mr. ARNOLD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANCHARD. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. ARNOLD. The gentleman, of course, understands that the C.W.A. is an employment proposition as well as a relief one. The object was not for the Federal Government to go in and build projects as Government projects, but the purpose was to permit projects to be built by labor paid for out of the Federal Treasury as long as the money was available for that purpose. The mere fact that a community has started a project that cannot be completed within the time of this employment program should not be charged to the Federal Government, because it was well known that these projects were for the purpose of employing labor, and there was only $400,000,000 allocated for that purpose for the entire country. If communities have laid out ambitious programs extending beyond the time the money would last, neither the C.W.A. nor the Government should be censured for that.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I think the gentleman will agree that the C.W.A. program was laid out with the idea of going forward until February 15.

Mr. ARNOLD. Giving employment for something like 4,000,000 men up to that time.

Mr. BLANCHARD. You cannot give employment to the men on public-work projects without at the same time purchasing materials, can you?

Mr. ARNOLD. It requires the purchase of materials, but as I understand it, the C.W.A., so far as materials are concerned, hoped to have this material supplied by the local community. There may be cases where the local community cannot supply the material, and then material, perhaps, may be provided out of C.W.A. funds on public projects.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Chairman, in the first place, I contend the President has ample power now to reallocate funds and provide money for the C.W.A.; and, secondly, if I am right in this contention, this money should be immediately reallocated so that the C.W.A. projects which have been approved by the Federal authorities can be completed; and, thirdly, if it is to be the policy of Congress and the President to curtail C.W.A. projects, we certainly should not curtail them so drastically at this particular time of the year. We could provide the necessary funds and taper it off when there is a reasonable chance for the people working on Civil Works jobs to find other employment. If it devolves upon the Government of the United States to provide some additional funds, may I call the attention of the Appropriations Committee to the fact that they should be using their time now in considering the advisability of extending the C.W.A. and should make that fact known to the people of the United States. Our people need employment right now as they never have before. I submit that the policy of casting them adrift at this inopportune time is entirely uncalled for. [Applause.]

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BOILEAU].

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, my distinguished colleague from Wisconsin has brought up a subject which is causing a good deal of discussion among the people and in the press of Wisconsin at the present time.

I call the attention of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ARNOLD] to the situation that exists in Wisconsin. The gentleman very mildly criticized the local people in the various communities——

Mr. ARNOLD. If the gentleman will permit, I do not mean to criticize. I am simply speaking about providing an ambitious program beyond the funds available.

Mr. BOILEAU. I appreciate the attitude of the gentleman from Illinois.

The people of Wisconsin are entirely without blame in this situation. The original allocation was 90,000 men for Wisconsin. I am advised by Mr. Hopkins that the Federal administrator in Wisconsin was instructed not to employ more than 90,000 men. For some reason or other, certainly without the fault of the local people, the Federal officials permitted 166,000 to go on the rolls.

Of course, permitting that number of people to be employed in C.W.A. work, many projects were entered into that would not have been entered into if there had been a lesser number of men employed. But that was not the fault of the local people, because there were many men looking for employment and the Federal agent put them to work.

When the Federal officials saw that there were 166,000 employed instead of 90,000, they issued orders to dismiss many men who were first employed. They made a new quota of 100,000 and ordered 66,000 to be taken off the pay rolls. Hardly had that allocation of 100,000 been put into effect when they issued another order reducing it to 75,000.

So, after we got the project started with 166,000, the orders were to reduce them to 75,000 men, which meant that many projects that were begun under the order of the Federal authorities have been stopped and the result is that many of them will not be completed unless there is a new arrangement and the program extended a certain length of time.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOILEAU. I yield.

Mr. BLANCHARD. And the gentleman will recollect that in addition to cutting down the number to 75,000, the number of hours that the men were permitted to work were decreased.

Mr. BOILEAU. Yes; the reduction in the number of men employed was made before the orders were issued to reduce the number of hours. Instead of 166,000 men working 30 hours, we have 75,000 men working from 15 to 24 hours a week.

The situation in Wisconsin is one, I think, that should cause the officials of the Civil Works Administration to sit up and take notice. It should cause us to reflect upon what will happen when they decide to discontinue the Civil Works Administration work.

The program was to give 4,000,000 men work. I think everyone is in accord with the program and hopes that it will be continued at least until the 1st of May. However, the time will come when these 4,000,000 men will be thrown off the C.W.A. pay roll, and we must prepare for that emergency.

The experience we had in Wisconsin when the quota was reduced from 166,000 men to 75,000 men shows what is going to happen when they are all cut off from the pay roll. Men who had found employment for the first time in months—yes; in years, in many instances—were happy at the prospect of having some money to provide for their families, and now they find themselves, through no fault of their own, again thrown back on the local communities for support. Naturally, these people, having tasted for such a brief period the pleasure of having some money in their hands with which to provide the necessaries of life for their families, could have nothing but the greatest disappointment in finding themselves without work. So I say we should be preparing for the day when the C.W.A. program is stopped and have something ready to give to these men.

I realize that a tremendous amount of money has been spent in the past year to give work to men. I think we all approve of the policy that the Government should find work and should create jobs, in order to give these men employment, but I believe it will be a sad day for this Nation if these 4,000,000 men are to join the other millions of unemployed and if such a great number should again find themselves in the position where they cannot earn a living.

The other day when we were passing the gold revaluing bill I felt that I would be personally disappointed if there does not come along a sufficient expansion of currency so that credit will be more easily obtained, so that money that is now in hiding will come out in the open, so that the money will be invested in things rather than held as currency in hoarding. I am hopeful that the program of revaluing gold will be followed by an expansion of the currency, so there will be immediately a trend toward higher commodity prices, so that agriculture will get a greater price for its commodities, so that agriculture will have purchasing power restored to it. I am hopeful that this program will be carried out soon, so that we can immediately have the effect from such a program of expansion in currency and its reflection in higher commodity prices and more employment, because it is necessary that we do something in the near future to take care of the slack in employment that will be created when these 4,000,000 men are definitely off the rolls. We must do something immediately, as the welfare of our country demands prompt and definite action.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY].

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the menace of unemployment hangs over America like a sword. The debate here this afternoon proves that fact. This root evil of unemployment occupies our minds, and because the C.W.A. deals with it to some degree, we are united in the belief that the principle of this organization must be maintained. It must not be abandoned, but it must be extended and expanded under a better system.

The wide-spread charges of graft, favoritism, and injustice, which surround the operations of the C.W.A. could be easily foreseen. When there are 4,000,000 jobs for 10,000,000 workers, desperate for employment, these evils are inevitable. Tremendous as the problem is, we must undertake the imperative task of coordinating private industry and public employment so that every American, able and willing to work, shall be assured a job at fair wages.

In the midst of uncertainity there is on thing certain: Mass production is dependent upon mass consumption and mass consumption is impossible without adequate purchasing power in the hands of the American people. If a great section of the public cannot buy, the business structure cannot be maintained.

Private industry failed completely to distribute that purchasing power and the country went down the sorrowful road of 1930, 1931, and 1932. Then, under the National Industrial Recovery Act, we undertook to halt that downward slide. It was halted and for a time there was a distinctly upward trend. However, it was never expected by anyone who knew the facts, that the N.R.A. could, of itself, restore the unemployed to full-time jobs. The N.R.A. is a governor on the industrial machine. It can abolish child labor, provide fair wages and hours, eliminate cutthroat competition, and give employees and employers a chance to act together in organized responsibility.

It was recognized that additional purchasing power must be furnished through governmental action and for that reason title II was carried in the National Industrial Recovery Act. The Public Works Administration was provided with $3,300,000,000 with a view to forcing that vast sum speedily into circulation as purchasing power for workers employed on many projects. This fresh, new blood in the arteries of business was counted on to hasten recovery by creating orders for more of the products of farms and factories. More workers would be needed to meet this demand and private industry would call them back into service. At fair wages, under the N.R.A. codes this additional purchasing power would help set in operation the benevolent cycle of increasing production, prices, employment, and pay rolls.

That plan was not put into effect. In 6 months a large number of industrial codes were formulated and put in operation. But by December, 6 months after the act was passed, less than one half of 1 percent of the public works appropriation had actually been expended. The additional purchasing power to speed the wheels of industry was not in effect. A great opportunity was lost and the Public Works Administration must stand responsible.

In the meantime, the National Recovery Administration was handicapped in its own great task of establishing a balance between industrial production, pay rolls, and prices. Without a doubt blunders were made in the administration, and some of them worked injury to the entire program. However, if there had been perfect administration exactly on the lines laid down in the act, the breakdown in the public-works features would have prevented the full success desired.

What is the situation? In order to answer that question I requested the research division of the Federal Reserve Board to prepare a comparison of production, employment, pay rolls, and prices for the months since the passage of the N.I.R.A. with the year 1926. It is generally admitted that the year 1926 furnishes a normal standard on which to base recovery progress.

The table herewith gives the facts as disclosed by the Federal Reserve Board's careful compilation of statistics:

	Percent of change, 1926 to—
	July	August	September	October	November
Industrial production:
Total	−7	−16	−22	−29	−32
Manufacturers	−7	−16	−23	−29	−34
Minerals	−17	−16	−19	−25	−25
Factory employment	−32	−28	−24	−25	−28
Factory pay rolls	−52	−46	−44	−45	−48
Wholesale prices:
All commodities	−31.1	−30.5	−29	−29	−28.9
Farm products	−39.9	−42.4	−43	−44	−43.4
Food	−34.5	−35.2	−35	−36	−35.7
All other commodities	−27.8	−25.9	−24	−23	−22.8

What do these figures mean? Simply that pay rolls or wages, which make up purchasing power, are completely out of balance as compared to both production and prices, and the situation is not getting better.

In July industrial production jumped to a point within 7 percent of the 1926 level, while prices were 31.1 percent under 1926. Employment was 32 percent under the standard, while pay rolls lagged 52 percent behind.

In August production was 16 percent under 1926 and prices were 30.5 percent under. Employment had jumped up 4 points and pay rolls had increased 6 percent.

In September production had dropped to 22 percent under 1926, while prices were 29 percent under the standard. Employment had made 24 percent, or a further gain of 4 points, and pay rolls were 44 percent under 1926, a gain of 2 points.

In October production and prices were exactly balanced at 29 percent under 1926. Employment was 25, which was a more favorable point than either production or prices, so that these three factors were fairly in balance. But the one key factor, pay rolls, lost 1 point and stood at 45 percent under 1926.

In November production was 32 percent under 1926, while prices were 28.9 percent under 1926. Factory employment was 28 percent under that level, while pay rolls had dropped to 48 percent under 1926.

Mr. Chairman, it requires no gift of prophecy to foretell what will happen if that trend continues. Lack of purchasing power as embodied in wages will cause both production and prices to collapse.

It must be apparent to everyone that the recovery program depends upon an increase in the buying power in the hands of Americans. Since wages and salaries make up a great part of American buying power, more money must be distributed through these channels. The N.R.A. codes must be revised upward as to wages and downward as to hours of labor if the balance is to be established and maintained.

More than that will be needed. Additional purchasing power through wages and salaries paid to workers on public-welfare projects must be provided, in a coordinated and not a haphazard program. There must be a guarantee of a job to every unemployed worker in socially useful work.

The C.W.A. is a piecemeal attempt to meet the task which must be met if there is to be recovery. The President said on November 15, when he announced the C.W.A. plan:

> I am very confident that the mere fact of giving real wages to 4,000,000 Americans who today are not getting wages is going to do more to relieve suffering and lift the morale of the Nation to a higher degree than any previous plan.

There is no doubt that the C.W.A. program did bring new hope and confidence to Americans. Shall that newly created morale be shattered now by an abandonment of the principle that jobs and jobs alone can restore prosperity? The most tragic thing that can happen is to announce that these 4,000,000 workers are to be discharged and must again seek the bread lines and charity.

It is true that the C.W.A. program left some 6,000,000 unemployed workers out of consideration and that gross injustices followed as a result. It is true that improvised work projects led to the employment of many men at useless work, which made the wages only a concealed dole.

That situation does not furnish proof that the principle of the employment program should be abandoned. It only proves that those evils should be eliminated and the program put on a better basis. To forsake the principle is to admit that we cannot cope with the depression.

I maintain, Mr. Chairman, that we must develop a program for the employment of all idle workers, not for a fraction of them. They must be employed in useful, constructive work which will add to the wealth of the Nation. The billions of unemployed dollars and the millions of unemployed men can be put to work and must be put to work.

I introduced a bill this afternoon which provides a method for using these surpluses. It undertakes to coordinate all the work being done now by various relief and employment agencies. It sets up the national industrial adjustment corporation for the purpose of providing public employment when necessary to supplement private employment.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I will be glad to yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The gentleman knows, of course, that I have very great admiration for his opinion on this labor problem, because he has been an expert on it and has given it a great deal of study.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I thank the gentleman, but he does me too great honor.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do not mean to flatter the gentleman. The thing that is disturbing my mind is, what is going to be the ultimate result of this program of C.W.A. and similar work? Of course, I am in hearty approval with what has been done to date and what is in prospect for the immediate future, but suppose the unemployment situation continues to exist another year or 2 years or 3 years with its terrible burden upon the Treasury of the United States; what is the opinion of the gentleman with reference to the indefinite continuation of the program until the unemployed may be absorbed in industry?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Alabama raises a most vital point. How is this employment to be financed? How are these employment projects to be paid for? I admit that we cannot indefinitely pay out vast sums on projects which do not return in national wealth more than their entire cost. The C.W.A., as far as its work projects have been valueless as permanent improvements, has been operating as a distributor of doles.

But that is not necessary. There is a vast amount of work to be done in this country where the wealth created will far exceed the amount expended. We have not reached the stage where we can write finis to our program of betterment. There are new communities to be built and highways to be built to them. There are homestead projects which would redistribute the overbalance of population in city and industrial sections. There are slum districts to be cleared and homes to be built. There are schools to be established and resources to be conserved. There is a vast amount of construction needed which, under proper development, would pay a profit on every dollar expended and at the same time furnish jobs to every unemployed man who was not absorbed into private industry.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Certainly.

Mr. BANKHEAD. In that connection I understand the gentleman's proposition is that in large measure future advancements, after we dispose of the immediate emergency, should be made only to self-liquidating propositions?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Yes; if the gentleman means by self-liquidating projects, as I do, all those projects and improvements which create new wealth to a degree greater than their cost. I would not exclude those Federal projects such as river and harbor improvements, flood control, public buildings, good roads, and others which are mistakenly, in my estimation, opposed because they do not directly return to the Government every dollar invested. I do believe that by far the greater amount of money would be spent on projects which would directly return their cost. The direct beneficiaries would be able to return the funds invested and the work itself would give employment to those who must have work if our immortal declaration as to life, liberty, and happiness is to be more than an empty phrase.

Mr. Chairman, we have not yet touched the fringes of the constructive work to be done in this country. We provided in the N.I.R.A. for a subsistence homestead division. It is only a very slight step toward a vitally important goal. It is badly named. The general idea back of the word "subsistence" is unworthy of such a plan. It gives a picture of a family struggling desperately for mere existence. We should have American homestead projects through which families would have modern comforts and conveniences, with a standard of living in line with the productive powers of American industry. It is not an impossible dream. It can be accomplished by intelligent use of the resources we have at this moment.

All the costs can be repaid out of restored income. In 1929 the national income was 92 billions while in 1933 it was approximately 48 billions. If we can restore that lost income, the investment in recovery will be felt but slightly. If that income is not increased our entire industrial structure will fall.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. I was very much interested in the table the gentleman read, dealing with production, prices, and so forth. I shall be interested in reading it carefully in the RECORD. As I recall, the margin between employment now and in 1926 is greater than the margin between production now and in 1926.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. No; the gentleman is in error. Employment, counting part-time employment, of course, is in a more favorable position now than is production, compared to 1926. In November production was 32 percent below the standard while employment was 28 percent below.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. And that despite the fact that under the codes the hours of labor have been sharply curtailed?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. The gentleman understands that the reason employment is at a better level than production is due to those codes which shortened the hours of labor and thus provided more jobs.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. I understand that. Nevertheless, there is left a considerable margin. Do not these figures indicate to the gentleman the need of further reducing the hours of labor in order to adjust them with the tempo of the machine?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. That is quite true. These codes must be revised downward as to hours of labor. More important still, they must be revised upward as to wages, for it is wages that furnishes the motive power for recovery.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. The only alternative is the displacement of the machine with hand labor, or at least stopping the installation of new labor-saving machinery. In that connection, I wonder whether the gentleman noticed the press report which indicated that in the Ford industry in Detroit, Mich., new machines had been produced which made it possible for three men, I believe, to do the work for which a large number of men were required formerly.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. That is true in all industry. Machines are taking over the work of men and production is being increased per man to an amazing degree.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. I am wondering whether the gentleman has any method to propose whereby excessive expansion of the use of machinery may be discouraged in this country.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. No; I have no such suggestion, and I am opposed to any such attempt. Rather I would encourage the installation of every new machine which can lift old and heavy burdens from the backs of American workers. But I would control those machines in the public interest so that they would serve mankind. I would cut down the hours of labor for the individual worker and try and more justly divide the product of our marvelous machine system.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Then, if I understand what the gentleman proposes, it is to lower the wage of the machine and to raise the wage of the laboring man.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Well, the machine is not a wage earner, but I would certainly put these contraptions of steel and rubber and aluminum and bronze on a different plane than human flesh and blood and hand and mind. I would put the man above the machine. These machines cannot buy goods. The industrialists who forget that fact are making a fatal mistake. They should realize that the sale of their products and thus their own prosperity depend upon buying power in the hands of American workers.

Mr. Chairman, during this entire depression there have been but two policies which could be consistently maintained. One is the let-alone policy of letting things take their downward course without interference. Then at the bottom of the gulf, in the midst of practically universal bankruptcy, a poverty-stricken Nation might begin the long upward climb.

The other policy is to make war on the depression with every resource of the Nation. Production, prices, employment, and pay rolls must be steadily increased, and they must be kept in balance. The motive power must be income in the hands of the great mass of Americans.

We deliberately chose this second policy, refusing to risk the destruction of our institutions by sitting supinely by while we starved in the midst of plenty. Then why should there be a halting between the two courses of action? Why should 4,000,000 workers be given jobs and then dismissed from those jobs with no other provision for them? If there is to be victory in this war, there must be no turning back in the midst of the battle.

Mr. Chairman, with the help of persons who have studied this problem for the past 4 years, I have prepared and introduced H.R. 7297 for the purpose of providing a program to meet the present need. It establishes an agency to be known as the National Industrial Adjustment Corporation, which would take over the duties of the Public Works Administration, the C.W.A., the Federal Emergency Relief Administration, the subsistence homestead division, and the other emergency employment and relief agencies of the Federal Government.

Under its direction, subsidiary corporations would be organized to take over these duties and also to undertake such enterprises as slum clearance, home construction, industrial activities in connection with home building and the enlargement or betterment of public or social services in any State or subdivision thereof, or for the conservation of natural resources.

Provision is made for the organization of the emergency-employment corporation under the directing agency, which shall undertake the employment temporarily of persons able and willing to work who are not needed in private industry under present conditions or in the special-purpose State and private corporations.

Upon the approval of the board of directors of the directing agency, the subsidiary corporations would be authorized to issue bonds, with provision for combined interest and amortization not to exceed 6 percent per annum. These bonds would be purchased by the Treasury with currency issued for the purpose and with a 40-percent gold reserve behind the currency. When deemed advisable, these bonds would be sold through public channels and would be acceptable as security for any trust funds the investment or deposit of which is under the authority of the United States. When sold to the public, these bonds would be guaranteed as to principal and interest.

Mr. Chairman, the more we study this critical problem of unemployment the more forcibly must the conclusion be forced upon us that the solution depends upon the coordinated employment of surplus capital and surplus labor. We have money, men, machines, and materials to produce all the things needed for the comfort and material happiness of 30,000,000 families. They must be put to work, no matter how great the task may be.

Dr. Virgil Jordan, in Business Week, estimated that the accumulation of surplus capital between 1919 and 1929 amounted to $85,000,000,000. Forty-five billion was corporation surpluses and 40 billion was in individual savings. This vast sum was taken out of current purchasing power during those years and thus helped to throw production and consumption out of balance.

At the same time there were surplus workers whose unemployment and inability to buy goods made the situation worse. The following table shows the unemployment in all industries from 1920 to 1933:

1920	1,401,000
1921	4,720,000
1922	3,441,000

1923	1,532,000
1924	2,315,000
1925	1,755,000
1926	1,669,000
1927	2,055,000
1928	2,100,000
1929	2,500,000
1930	6,000,000
1931	8,000,000
1932	15,000,000
1933	12,000,000

While the $85,000,000 went into surplus, 70,000,000 man-years were lost, together with all the wealth that would have been created had they been employed. At the average rate of value output per worker during that period, the actual loss amounted to $140,000,000,000. Idle dollars and idle men side by side do not promote the general welfare.

It is of interest to note the actual distribution of the national income during those years. While the national income has dropped to the danger point, wages and salaries, which make up direct purchasing power, have decreased still further. The following table discloses this fact:

	Total realized income	Total wages and salaries	Remaining for other interests
1919	$65,900,000,000	$35,400,000,000	$30,500,000,000
1920	74,000,000,000	42,300,000,000	31,700,000,000
1921	63,000,000,000	36,200,000,000	26,800,000,000
1922	64,000,000,000	37,700,000,000	26,300,000,000
1923	74,000,000,000	42,900,000,000	31,100,000,000
1924	77,000,000,000	44,500,000,000	32,500,000,000
1925	82,000,000,000	46,900,000,000	35,100,000,000
1926	86,000,000,000	49,800,000,000	36,200,000,000
1927	88,000,000,000	51,400,000,000	36,600,000,000
1928	89,000,000,000	51,100,000,000	37,900,000,000
1929	92,000,000,000	51,700,000,000	40,300,000,000
1930	70,000,000,000	42,500,000,000	27,500,000,000
1931	60,000,000,000	32,500,000,000	27,500,000,000
1932	49,000,000,000	20,000,000,000	29,000,000,000
1933	48,000,000,000	22,000,000,000	27,000,000,000
Total	1,082,900,000,000	606,900,000,000	476,000,000,000

Since 1926, while the national income dropped 43 percent, wages and salaries decreased 56 percent. This meant a decreasing amount going into purchasing power and still greater unemployment.

However, interest and dividend payments showed no such trends. They steadily increased to 1930 and lost very little in 1931 and 1932. Since this amount is generally available for new investment and not for purchasing consumers' goods, the balance was still further affected. The following table shows total interest and dividend payments by all industrial corporations, banks, and trust companies, railroad, and traction companies, the United States Government, and New York City, and all wages and salaries:

	Interest and dividends	Wages and salaries
1919	$3,189,184,000	$35,400,000,000
1920	3,414,876,000	42,300,000,000
1921	3,341,806,000	36,200,000,000
1922	3,399,719,000	37,700,000,000
1923	3,585,217,000	42,900,000,000
1924	3,840,590,000	44,500,000,000
1925	4,083,828,000	46,900,000,000
1926	4,319,185,000	49,800,000,000
1927	5,570,548,000	51,400,000,000
1928	6,028,184,000	51,100,000,000
1929	7,588,248,000	51,700,000,000
1930	8,600,052,000	42,500,000,000
1931	8,242,524,000	32,500,000,000
1932	7,200,000,000	20,000,000,000
1933		22,000,000,000

These figures show that while interest and dividend payments increased 66 percent between 1926 and 1932, wages and salaries during the same period showed a loss of 60 percent. Certainly such a maladjustment is destructive to general prosperity and helps prevent the restoration of prosperity.

Another factor has been at work and that is the almost complete collapse of the private building industry. A large number of unemployed workers today were formerly employed in the construction industry. The following table is an estimate of the value of building contracts and wages paid in the construction industries:

	Value of construction contracts	Salaries and wages paid
1919	$2,579,000,000	$1,128,000,000
1920	2,533,000,000	1,086,000,000
1921	2,360,000,000	1,044,000,000
1922	3,353,000,000	1,671,000,000
1923	3,494,000,000	1,613,000,000
1924	3,880,000,000	1,783,000,000
1925	5,043,000,000	2,504,000,000
1926	5,422,000,000	2,798,000,000
1927	5,474,000,000	2,735,000,000
1928	5,844,000,000	3,039,000,000
1929	5,426,000,000	2,876,000,000
1930	3,808,000,000	2,018,000,000
1931	2,773,000,000	1,498,000,000
1932	1,351,000,000	743,000,000
1933	1,256,000,000	690,000,000

Mr. Chairman, during the period since 1919, and especially during the past 4 years when wages and pay rolls have decreased with a tragic rapidity, the productivity of the average industrial worker has steadily increased. The average worker in 1933 produced 83 percent more than the average worker in 1919. Since 1926 there has been a gain in productivity per man of 30 percent.

If we are to use 1926 as the goal of our efforts as to production, and so forth, it follows that wages should be brought back to the 1926 standard, and the hours of labor should be decreased 30 percent. Only in that way can we attain even the degree of balance in evidence during that year.

Mr. Chairman, with all my heart I desire to see the restored prosperity which will follow immediately upon the restoration of 10,000,000 unemployed workers to the great task of producing wealth for America. I have followed the President in every effort which was calculated to bring recovery. I believe that private industry can absorb millions of these unemployed workers if it can be given the long-term credit which has been given other interests, and if needed construction projects are organized and directed by the Federal Government.

Paraphrasing rule no. 1, issued by the Civil Works Administration, I would express the deliberate and determined position of the United States, as follows:

The purpose of the Federal Government is to provide regular work on useful and constructive projects at regular wages for all unemployed persons able and willing to work until they can be absorbed into private industry.

The continuation of relief activities on a temporary, piecemeal basis will result in so great an increase of tax burdens that industry will not be able to resume capacity production and thus absorb unemployment. By the beneficial employment of surplus capital and surplus labor it is possible to turn what are now the chief liabilities of the Nation into valuable assets; to create new and durable wealth, with a minimum of interference with private business and with little addition to the burden of taxation.

Mr. ARNOLD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. BUSBY].

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Chairman, while we were considering the recent monetary program there was but little opportunity for us to discuss the questions involved in that bill on the floor of the House. It is not my purpose today to undertake to discuss specifically the provisions of that bill; but I want to call attention to one or two things that seem to me of vital importance and involved in almost half the conversations we hear about this Chamber and in the cloakrooms.

AN ADEQUATE DEPENDABLE MEDIUM OF EXCHANGE IS IMPERATIVE

I may be too serious in believing that in order to do business, in order to have employment, in order to build roads, to improve commuities, and to carry on the business and commerce of this Nation, it is absolutely necessary to have an adequate and dependable medium of exchange. I believe that when I go to the grocery store and order groceries weighed to the amount of $5 that it is necessary for me to deliver $5 in currency, a bank check, or some other evidence of value to balance the purchase. I believe that when I purchase a home or a farm that it is necessary for me to furnish a sufficient medium of exchange representing value to balance that transaction. I believe that when a people or a nation find themselves where they cannot do that thing, where they have no money or other medium of exchange, trading must stop, business must cease, and general stagnation must set in. That is the situation confronting our Nation and other nations of the world today.

I believe that the conception has been general that I am more of a currency inflationist than I have ever dreamed. I think there are Members of this House who believe that I should like to see the Government print unlimited quantities of currency. I have never proposed any such thing.

THE GOVERNMENT HAS NEVER MET ITS DUTY TO FURNISH A MEDIUM OF EXCHANGE

The Government of the United States has never undertaken and has never accomplished its duty in furnishing to the people of this country a dependable medium of exchange. If you will look over the statement of the Treasury and compare it with the statement of the banks, you will find that currency in existence usually runs about $1 to each $10 of bank credit. The currency furnished by the Government of the United States amounts to practically nothing when it comes to carrying on the trade and commerce and business of the Nation.

MONEY USED IN BUSINESS IS MANUFACTURED BY THE BUSINESS MAN AND THE BANKS

Get this point. The money that is used by the ordinary man and by business in general is manufactured by the individual and the banking set-up of the country. How has that been done? If I want $1,000 to be used for business purposes in my local community, I go to the local bank and say: "I want to borrow a thousand dollars." The banker then says to me: "What have you to secure the loan with?" I say: "A farm worth $3,000 or $4,000." The banker then suggests that I give him a trust deed on the farm. I execute a mortgage and deliver it to the bank for $1,000, and the bank then gives me credit for the $1,000, or passes over to my account $1,000 of bank credit.

What happens is this: I take a check book and go about the community writing and signing checks, and this becomes bank money because the bank has guaranteed with all its resources that it will back, honor, and make good all these checks to a total amount of $1,000. So as far as I am concerned and so far as the community is concerned the bank and myself agree upon a plan to manufacture a thousand dollars of medium of exchange. The bank checks are just as effective in business as if they were Treasury notes of the United States, signed by the Treasurer. That "bank money" is as good a medium of exchange as currency. There is just 1 chance in 10 that I will ever call for money or that anybody else who receives these checks will ever call for money on those checks that I passed out in paying obligations to persons with whom I have done business.

So that in our country, under our banking set-up, the masses of the people have depended on manufacturing their own currency, their own medium of exchange, with which to carry on and transact their business. The Government has never done its part. It has no plan of its own for meeting its duty to furnish a dependable medium of exchange.

If that source—bank credit—breaks down, what is the result to business? Certainly stagnation must set in. I call attention to this, that the Government furnishes only one tenth of the medium of exchange, coined and issued currency.

BANKERS NEVER AGREE TO FURNISH MEDIUM OF EXCHANGE

It depends on the banking set-up of the country to furnish the other nine tenths of the machinery business must have, and the banking set-up of the country never did agree to furnish the other nine tenths. This bank money is manufactured only as a byproduct incident to the business of the bankers who try to make a profit for those who have invested in bank stock. This is a byproduct and not a direct objective of the banks. The banks cannot furnish this medium of exchange when business becomes bad.

BANKS CANNOT MAKE LOANS WHEN PRICES ARE FALLING

They cannot assist business in manufacturing bank money when property price levels are falling. When price levels begin to go down, then the action of the bank is such that it is not only not helpful but injurious. Why? Because the banks have to call in loans, make collections, and to squeeze borrowers. I am not blaming the bankers. They could not agree to do anything other than what they are doing. The very nature of their set-ups makes it necessary for them to get funds to meet the demands of depositors. They have to take the course they do in order to protect their depositors. So the banks began to say to everyone who has borrowed from them, "You must pay up." Then deflation set in and ruination was increased by reason of the fact that the banks were not functioning in the way the Government expected them to furnish a medium of exchange. They are working in the reverse order and bringing on the calamity more surely and more quickly.

Mr. PARSONS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUSBY. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. PARSONS. The gentleman has made a very close study of this matter for the last few years, and I should like to ask the gentleman this question: How does the amount of currency against our bank credit in the United States compare with the amount of currency in England, France, Germany, and Italy as related to the bank deposits in those countries?

Mr. BUSBY. In France there is about twice as much currency as there is bank credit. So, of course, they have no bank failures. In England they have a larger proportion of currency to bank credit than we have; that is, the amount of bank credit to the amount of currency there is smaller than ours. I will sum it up in this one statement, we have the greatest banking system in the world for developing a country, but the poorest banking system in the world for security to depositors; that is, until the deposit guaranty law.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUSBY. Yes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Does the gentleman think that the deflation of the dollar that will follow the enactment of this legislation will stimulate the price of farm commodities?

Mr. BUSBY. I should like to come to that a little later.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. If it will, I should like for the gentleman to account for the reduction in farm commodity prices that has been going on since the deflation started last July.

Mr. BUSBY. I shall be glad to come to that later.

Mr. LANZETTA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUSBY. Yes.

Mr. LANZETTA. Will the gentleman explain how an increased amount of currency would avoid the situation that the gentleman has just spoken of?

Mr. BUSBY. I am going into that proposition immediately.

I have had the pleasure of going over some of these matters with high officials of our Government, and some, or one, of the highest officials in the Government. I advance this thought, and I believe I am correct in it, that the banks in this country cannot make loans unless they can make collections. The banks cannot make collections unless they can sell at public auction the farm or the house or the property pledged to them for the loan and banks cannot sell at public auction unless there is buying power in the masses of the people so someone can bid in the property at the sale. So when commodity and property prices shrink and fall to where there is no buying power in the people, it is dangerous for the bank to take any other course than the course they are taking today.

What course have the banks fallen upon? They will make no adequate loans, as a general rule, to business unless the loans are secured by Government bonds. These bonds are first mortgages on all the people and the future income of the Government. Let me point to a local situation.

The Riggs National Bank statement a few days ago showed that they had $71,000,000 of deposits and $80,000,000 of assets. Of these $71,000,000 of deposits, $49,500,000 were invested in Government securities and in currency, leaving uninvested in Government obligations only $21,500,000 of the deposits of the people that ought to go to help business in ordinary times. This policy, you know, is pursued throughout the country, and will not help business. No loans; no bank money or checking accounts; no help for business; only a market for Government bonds.

This is the main point I want to stress in the talk that I shall deliver at this time, and that is, with all the things the Government is doing to get business on its feet and the people back to a normal condition of employment, can we have no hope of succeeding unless we, through our effort, again develop a medium of exchange which the people can use to carry on business after the Government quits furnishing the credit?

BANKS MUST BE PUT BACK TO MAKING LOANS FOR CHECKING ACCOUNTS OR WE FAIL IN THE END

If we cannot get the banks back to where they will again furnish that nine tenth of the medium of exchange, we will necessarily fail, with all the R.F.C., N.R.A., C.W.A., and other activities that we are now engaged in. If, when this program is finished, we have not developed a condition in which the banks have come back into the field of business and operate in a normal way, and have reached the point where they will furnish business a medium of exchange based on loans against tangible property of the ordinary individual, we cannot possibly go on after the Government quits its program. Think of this one point: What are we going to use after the credit of the Government fails, if banks like the Riggs National Bank and the other big banks adopt the policy of refusing to loan money or lend so as to create checking accounts for business men?

I give you another illustration. A doctor friend of mine told me he had $3,000 on deposit in that particular bank. He asked for a loan of $2,000, just to see what he could do in the way of securing credit at his bank. He was told they would take it up with the board and see what could be done. A few days afterward the board reported to him they were sorry, but they could not make him the $2,000 loan. He said, "I did not want the $2,000; I was just sounding out to see what your policy is."

NATIONAL GOVERNMENT TO BLAME FOR FAILURE OF MEDIUM OF EXCHANGE

I am not blaming the bank. It has a right to refuse to make loans. This may be the best policy. I do lay the blame at the door of the National Government, whose duty it is to furnish a dependable medium of exchange for our people, and until we use our heads and our intelligence and evolve a method of assuming this responsibility to the American people and to business, we need not expect anything but conditions to come around periodically such as we are confronted with today.

Mr. McKEOWN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUSBY. I yield.

Mr. McKEOWN. Does not the gentleman think that the banks that refuse to make loans are just hastening the day when they are going to be put out of business and become nothing but safe-deposit vaults?

Mr. BUSBY. Probably that is right.

Mr. PARSONS. Will the gentleman yield for a question in that connection?

Mr. BUSBY. I yield.

Mr. PARSONS. Can the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. McKEOWN] tell us on what security or on what value the banks can make these loans? Can the banks make these loans on the value of the securities they are offered at the present time? What is the gentleman going to do to raise the value of the security which the general public has to offer for loans? If the gentleman can put his finger on that situation, that will show us the key to the door of the whole situation.

Mr. McKEOWN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUSBY. I am coming to that point, but I shall be glad to have the suggestion of the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. McKEOWN. I suggest to the gentleman from Illinois that the trouble is not lack of security but a policy of absolutely not making loans.

Mr. BUSBY. I do not agree with the gentleman from Oklahoma. As I stated a while ago, the banks have never agreed to make such loans and furnish this medium of exchange. They must have some collateral when the loan matures on which they can realize so that they can restore credit to their bank and meet the demand of the depositor when he comes for his money.

Mr. McKEOWN. Some of the banks go to the extreme limit and refuse loans on collateral that is 10 times the amount asked for.

Mr. BUSBY. That is because they do not believe they can sell such collateral to the public and get their money back. I think they are taking the only safe course.

ONLY GOVERNMENT BONDS REGARDED BY BANKS AS GOOD SECURITY

In 1929, if you will note the amount of Government bonds that were held by the Federal Reserve System, you will find it was about $2,000,000,000. I think you will find now that all the banks have increased their bond holdings to nearly $14,000,000,000, indicating they do not regard anything but first mortgages on the entire country as adequate and safe. This is because it is a secondary type of money which the Treasury is obligated to take in exchange for currency and relieve the bank in case the bank gets in distress, and no other type of security has such call upon the Government of the United States.

But let me come directly to the point. Every time we sell a billion dollars of Government bonds we reach out into the various sections of the country and take up the deposits of the people and bring them to Washington and put them in the Treasury, then scatter them out through the recovery programs we are putting on now. I am not disagreeing with the recovery program, I am only reciting the facts. It is like this: The banker says, "I will not lend. I cannot feel secure in making these loans." The Government says, "If you will not lend, we will swap you Government bonds for these deposits and the Government itself will do the lending or the giving." This is what is happening to all the deposits which ordinarily go to make loans and help business to carry on.

The result is that business in that particular section of the country is robbed of the opportunity of getting a loan at the local bank, because the Government has taken the funds out of that bank, brought them to Washington, and is scattering them throughout the land. While the Government can do this it seems to help.

Let me illustrate. Suppose in your community you have a factory and you are ready to start the factory, but you need $10,000. You go to your local bank and they say, "Yes; we have plenty of money and your proposition appeals to us. Submit your financial statement and let us pass on it. I think we can make you the loan." Next week the Government sells another billion dollars of bonds, and the bank directors get together and say, "Things are not so secure; maybe we ought to buy $50,000 worth of Government bonds so as to have a little more liquidity." They buy the $50,000 of Government bonds, and when you come back with your financial statement, which is a good one, and apply for the loan of $10,000, the banker will say, "We believe in you and in your proposition, but we thought we ought to have a little more 'liquidity' and therefore we bought $50,000 of Government bonds, and we cannot make you the loan right now." So you are turned away.

This is what is happening to business everywhere, and when we have sold $10,000,000,000 of Government bonds, we will have taken up $10,000,000,000 of credit that might have gone to business, and we have made this credit static and unusable, and business must wait until another day.

Mr. LANZETTA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUSBY. I yield.

Mr. LANZETTA. Sometime ago the savings banks in New York City reduced their rates of interest paid on deposits because the money they held was not earning a sufficient amount to pay more. This was not because there was not a demand for the money from the banks, but it was because the banks refused to make certain loans or to lend money on certain securities. As a matter of fact, many of the banks in New York City refused to lend on certain real estate.

Mr. BUSBY. Yes.

Mr. LANZETTA. So I say it was not because there was not the demand there; the banks were willing to hold their money in the banks rather than lend it on risks that they considered unsafe.

Mr. BUSBY. I am sure the gentleman is right.

Now, I want to go ahead with this thought. How are you going to meet this situation?

The banks in this country today have $1,000,000,000 of excess reserves piled up in the Federal Reserve banks, and this $1,000,000,000 is not bringing them one penny of income, but is lying there idle.

They have a billion dollars in currency in their vaults. Two billion dollars that the banks now hold is idle and still they do not make loans to aid struggling business.

Now, suppose when it comes time to raise the next billion dollars to meet the expenses of the recovery program, the President says to the banks, "You can't make loans to business; we don't expect you to make loans to business in times like these, for you might not be able to collect your money back, business is so unprofitable just now and collections are so hard to make. It is all right for you to pile up your excess reserves. But you banks are now notified that you are not going to get any more first mortgages—Government bonds—on the people just now. We are not going to give you bonds into which to sink your deposits and reserves. We are going to raise the next billion dollars by Treasury notes instead of bonds." Bonds and the Treasury notes are both products of the printing press, both dependent on the faith the people have in the Government and its future. If he would say to the banks, "We are not going to sell you any bonds; we are going to raise this billion dollars by paying out Treasury notes", we would pay out that money, and it would go into the hands of the people. There is no way to prevent its getting into the banks immediately. Business men will get the cash in trade, then take it to the banks and deposit in the banks.

There are only three ways, then, the banks can proceed along: First, they can keep the money in the vaults; second, they can send it to the Federal Reserve and take credit for it; or, third, they can make loans to business.

So we do not sell them any bonds, and the first thing banks know they have two billions in excess reserve drawing no interest and worth nothing in the way of making the banks a profit.

Then we say to the banks, "You are not easy enough yet to make loans to business, so we are going to pay the second billion dollars of the recovery program in Treasury notes."

Mr. TABER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUSBY. I yield.

Mr. TABER. Is it not a fact that with these Treasury notes paid out, with the law as it stands now, the only effect would be to force retirement of the Federal Reserve notes now outstanding?

Mr. BUSBY. No, sir; there might be some retirement. There is always some retirement. They retired silver; they retired gold. Federal Reserve notes or any other kind of money may be surrendered into the Federal Reserve and credit taken for it by the bank turning it in. Any kind of currency may be surrendered in the same way; one kind is no different from the other.

The second billion dollars would go into business from the persons who received them in payment in the recovery program, and they would be turned into the banks. Immediately business would gather up the currency and deposit it in exchange for bank credits and checking accounts.

Then the banks would have, we will say, $3,000,000,000 of excess reserve instead of $1,000,000,000 that they have now.

What I am coming to is this, that before you will get out $3,000,000,000 of Treasury notes, the banks will have accumulated so much unusable credit that they will try to effect loans and thereby bring about that beginning which we must look forward to if we are ever to get out of this awful financial situation.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUSBY. Let me finish. I want the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] to listen for a moment. There is only one of three things that the banks can do with this currency. It is true they can surrender any kind of currency to the Federal Reserve bank, then it is changed into excess reserves, or they can make loans, or they can keep the cash in their vaults. There is no other thing that they can do with it unless the Government sells them bonds by the billions and takes up the funds that ought to go to business, that belong to business, that have been deposited by the local communities, and that are to accomodate the local communities instead of financing the Federal Government.

SELLING BONDS IS THE WORST KIND OF DEFLATION

To sum up, we will have to do something beside sell bonds and deflate. We have to make the banks so unprofitably comfortable that they will begin to look for private loans and investments of that type and go back again to aiding business and giving business a chance to come to life and carry on.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUSBY. I yield.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. In other words, the course that we have been pursuing, the issuing of Government bonds to cover all these projects that we have been putting into effect has worked to the disadvantage of the extension of credit to business, commerce, and so forth. The banks are lying back with the money and do not want to let it go until they get another bond issue, and until we give them enough Treasury notes, or whatever we give them, to force them to loan if they would not do it.

Mr. BUSBY. When you make them so uncomfortably unprofitable that they cannot get anything out of their holdings, they will be compelled to loan to business.

CHEAP GOLD DOLLARS MUST HAVE DOLLARS IN CIRCULATION IF RECOVERY IS TO COME

There is the question of our gold-buying policy. I have given a great deal of thought to that, and I discussed the matter extensively with Professor Pearson and with Professor Warren, before he came into his present service, where he ought to keep quiet and does so. He believes that the gold-buying policy and depreciating the dollar in terms of gold would raise the commodity-price level. I never could see the reason for that having an immediate effect. The cheap gold dollar is in terms of foreign money measured in terms of gold. All foreign exchange is measured in terms of gold. Whether the country has a dollar of gold or not, its currency sells in terms of gold.

Whatever this money sells for in the international exchange market, it is measured in gold. When we went off the gold standard, we refused to pay gold, and so the dollar began to depreciate. The dollar has gone down now to about 60 cents compared with what it was in terms of gold. But that has nothing to do particularly with this country. It does this: It makes our market more attractive to the foreigner, because he can come in here with his foreign money and buy our dollar much more cheaply than he could. He can exchange the dollar for our goods and ship our goods to his own country. It opens up the domestic market to foreign buyers. That is the principal good, and insofar as he brings wealth and money into this country and turns it over to the American seller for his goods, he will help to lift the commodity-price level, and in the course of 3 or 4 or 5 years that trickling in of foreign funds will have so affected the American market and the surplus in that market as to have an appreciable effect upon our general commodity-price level. But it is not an immediate or instantaneous method for lifting the commodity prices in this country. Our money question is a domestic question. Unless we have some kind of a dollar—silver, gold, Treasury note, Federal Reserve note—to represent this cheap gold dollar, it does not mean much to us.

We will have to have some kind of dollars in this country to represent those cheap gold dollars or it will not revive trade. Let me point to another field. The price-commodity level in this country has increased less than half the amount the dollar has depreciated in terms of gold. Why has it increased at all? That little trickling in of foreign funds has helped some, but the thing that has helped has been the fact that Uncle Sam has gone out and said, "Here is $7,000,000,000 in bonds, you banks take them and give me your cash and I will scatter it to the four corners of the country." That has been done; and as long as that credit lasts, there will be an uplift in price levels and there will be a revival of business; there will be activity, and that is what has increased the commodity price level in this country about 12 percent. It has been the activity in exchanging Government bonds, payable in the future with interest, for those funds which the banks would not put out, but which the Government did put out. That is what has helped business. It has helped the situation and will continue to help as long as we continue to do that, which we know must come to an end some time.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUSBY. Yes.

Mr. O'MALLEY. The gentleman says the commodity-price level has increased in this country. Has it actually increased over last July?

Mr. BUSBY. I am not trying to draw technical distinctions to that point. I am trying to cover the general situation. It may not be much higher than in July. There might have been excitement—and there was—and apprehension, because prices were going up, and everybody began buying and ran prices up at that time, but we have sobered down some.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUSBY. I yield.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. The gentleman made a statement, if we would put out a bond issue of $7,000,000,000, get the money from the banks, and send it to the country. Is there $7,000,000,000 worth of money in all the banks combined?

Mr. BUSBY. There is not $7,000,000,000 in currency. There is not more than $1,000,000,000 in actual coined and issued currencies, but the dollars that the business of this country uses and that the ordinary man uses, as I have explained, are the dollars made by the bank, by lending against his tangible property, thereby creating credit accounts to be checked against.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. And usually coming back to the Treasury and getting Treasury notes printed for the same bonds that they take. Is that not right?

Mr. BUSBY. That is often quite true.

HOW MANY BONDS CAN THE GOVERNMENT SELL?

Now, let me discuss one other proposition for a moment and then I will not longer trespass on the time of the House. The question then arises to what extent we can sell bonds of this country. About 1929 the best authorities said that the wealth of the Nation was $360,000,000,000. The wealth of a man depends on the market condition at the time his property is offered for sale. He may be worth $100,000 today when the market is open and attractive to his properties. He may not be worth $20,000 next year when the market has no liking for his properties. So the wealth of the country is dependent largely on the attitude of the buying public and its ability to buy when the properties are offered for sale.

The same authorities say that the wealth of this Nation is now about $236,000,000,000. The debts in this Nation are about $235,000,000,000, so we are about even, or almost bankrupt if we were called on to pay up what we owe. How many bonds can the Government sell? To whom must it look to purchase them? I believe the Government can sell to private investors 10 or 12 billion dollars of Government bonds. Now, to whom else can it sell? To the banking set-ups of this country.

There are $38,000,000,000 of deposits in the banks. How much of those deposits can be converted by the banks into Government bonds? If the bond holdings of the banks since 1929 have risen from $2,000,000,000 to $14,000,000,000 in 1934, we see that they are rapidly converting their deposits into Government bonds and making static the condition of credit we hope to remedy. I do not believe the Government can sell more than $25,000,000,000 of bonds to the banks. I do not think they can convert $25,000,000,000 of the $38,000,000,000 of deposits into Government bonds. The Government must have a purchaser for its bonds, just as I must have a purchaser for my farm. After these bonds have absorbed the liquidity of the people and of the banks, that will end the ability of the Government to sell bonds without inflation having set in. "Printing-press bonds" are the same kind of ink and paper as "printing-press money", only they are better for the banking element, because they have a service charge in interest which costs the people 3½ to 4 percent. A 20-year bond of $1,000,000,000 issue will cost the people $2,000,000,000 before they get through paying. After you have absorbed the base, bonds will begin to sink below par. After Government bonds have gone down to 95 percent, another billion-dollar bond issue will not sell at 95 percent, but all the bonds will lower enough so as to absorb the additional bond sale of $1,000,000,000, and the total of the bonds outstanding will not sell for any more than those outstanding would have before the last issue. So we will have reached a condition of inflation in Government bonds which will be no better than inflation in currency. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to revise and extend my remarks made before the Committee this afternoon, and to insert a letter received from the county superintendent of schools of Rock County, Wis. It is a short letter.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. FULLER). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BLANCHARD]?

There was no objection.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOOPER].

Mr. HOOPER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks, and I ask unanimous consent to read not editorials but two or three very brief excerpts from some editorials along the line of my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOOPER]?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOOPER. Mr. Chairman, the old principle of party government that the spoils of office belong to the victor is so firmly established in our system that the vast changes resulting from an overturn are looked on by everyone with complacency. Undoubtedly it would be better if district attorneys and marshals, ambassadors and ministers, district clerks and postmasters were appointed and retained under a merit system; but this certainly will not come about for many years, if ever.

There are, however, Executive appointments which, not coming under the foregoing nor under civil service, are vested by Congress with a peculiarly nonpartisan character. One of the great independent agencies of the Government—the Federal Trade Commission—is typical. It was created by a Democratic Congress under an act approved by President Wilson on September 26, 1914. Its 5 members are appointed by the President, the Senate concurring, for a term of 7 years; and the law provides that no more than 3 of these 5 members may be of one political party. Congress obviously made the term 7 years to establish firmly independence of action and judgment by the members of the Commission. Obviously Congress meant that the views of both of the major parties should here have a forum. Such was its purpose in making similar enactments concerning the Tariff Commission and the Interstate Commerce Commission. The business of the Commission, that of investigating and acting upon unfair methods of competition in commerce, is nonpartisan and of equal interest and benefit to Democrats and Republicans alike.

Under the law the President may remove Commissioners for inefficiency, neglect of duty, or malfeasance in office.

To this Commission on February 25, 1925, President Coolide appointed Hon. William E. Humphrey, for 14 years a Republican Representative in Congress from the State of Washington. At the end of his term President Hoover reappointed him for the 7-year term. He has been an active and useful member of the Commission. He has been charged with no inefficiency, with no neglect of duty, with no malfeasance in office. His record has been excellent.

In September 1933 President Roosevelt sent a letter to Mr. Humphrey in which he says:

Without any reflection at all upon you personally or upon the service you have rendered in your present capacity, I find it necessary to ask for your resignation as a member of the Federal Trade Commission. I do this because I feel that the aims and purposes of the administration with respect to the work of the Commission can be carried out most effectively with personnel of my own selection.

In a second letter he said:

You will, I know, realize that I do not feel that your mind and my mind go along together on either the policies or the administering of the Federal Trade Commission; and, frankly, I think it is best for the people of this country that I should have a full confidence.

On October 7, 1933, the President wrote him:

Effective as of this date you are hereby removed from the office of Commissioner of the Federal Trade Commission.

The controversy will be finally passed upon by the courts.

The absolute legal right to removal is one thing; the sheer justice or injustice of his removal is quite another. The three Republican Presidents who held office previous to Mr. Roosevelt's administration respected the law in its letter and its spirit. No one has heard the democracy of members of that party serving upon the Trade Commission challenged in any quarter. Their appointments were brought about largely through Democratic recommendation. When our greatly beloved former member, Finis Garrett, was appointed as a judge of the Court of Customs and Patent Appeals, an appointment which gave pleasure to Republicans as well as Democrats, no question was asked as to whether or not he was one whose mind went along with that of the then President on any subject. When President Hoover named the great Justice Cardozo to the Supreme Court he named him as a Democrat and a liberal, with universal approval. When Hon. Charles E. Crisp was tendered a Federal appointment by President Hoover, his democracy was neither challenged nor inquired into. That has been true of virtually all the nonpartisan appointments made in this manner by former Presidents.

President Roosevelt may have the legal right to remove Mr. Humphrey. It is quite certain that he has not removed him for any of the reasons set forth in the law. On the contrary, he congratulated Mr. Humphrey upon "your long and active service", and added that his request for Mr. Humphrey's resignation was "without any reflection upon you at all personally or upon the service you have rendered."

The deduction is a simple one, that Mr. Humphrey being a real Republican was therefore objectionable to the President. It was rumored widely through the country at the time the resignation was requested that the President intended to appoint ex-Governor La Follette, of Wisconsin. No one questions the honesty and ability of Mr. La Follette, but there are millions of citizens who question his Republicanism. It would be as though a Republican President had nominated Norman Thomas to the Trade Commission on the theory that he was a Democrat. There is no doubt that the President would like to have independent offices, as well as the more political ones, filled by members of his own choice, but to violate the spirit of the law as well as perhaps the letter is a method of procedure so harsh that it has been challenged not only by Republicans but as well by some of the prominent Democratic papers of the United States.

On September 19, 1933, the Baltimore Sun, to my mind the greatest Democratic paper in the United States, with the possible exception of the New York Times, said editorially:

By removing Mr. Humphrey without specifying charges under the law, President Roosevelt has struck at this independence. If such action is permissible, the Trade Commission will cease to be the continuing body Congress intended, for the terms of its members will be terminable at the will of the President. If disagreement with the President's policies is a valid ground for removal—and this is the only ground on which Mr. Roosevelt bases his case—then the Trade Commission will be subject to reorganization with every change of administration and it will cease to be an independent, quasi-judicial body and become one of the administrative agencies of the Government.

It may be argued that the new Securities Act with the administration of which the Trade Commission is charged so enlarges the authority of the Commission as to make such reorganization essential. Some grounds for this contention exist, but the fact is that neither the administration, which drafted the act, nor the Congress, which passed it, provided for such a change. The enforcement of the securities law was intrusted to the Trade Commission as the Trade Commission then stood. If this was an oversight, it could be remedied by appropriate legislation at the next session of Congress. To attempt to remedy by administrative fiat is to risk the establishment of a dangerous precedent.

The independent Washington Star summed up the matter in the following words:

The attack upon the independence of the Trade Commission by the Chief Executive in the removal of Mr. Humphrey is a serious matter. If the decisions of the Commission in important matters relating to the conduct of business, placed in the hands of the Commission by law, are to be dictated from the White House there may be trouble ahead. Such an attack will be regarded in much the same light as an attack upon the judiciary by the Executive. Federal judges hold their appointments during good behavior under the terms of the Constitution. It has been held they are only removable after impeachment and trial by the Senate. The President and all civil officers of the Government also may be removed after impeachment proceedings, as a matter of fact. But the Congress in passing its laws setting up various Government agencies has recognized the right of the President to remove civil officers outside of the judiciary for cause.

These are typical of many editorial discussions.

I have not thought that the power of the President could possibly extend to removal of the judiciary, at least to the Supreme Court, which is a constitutional court. All other Federal courts, however, are the creatures of the legislative body and it is not impossible that a President of the United States might attempt to remove a district judge or a judge of the Court of Claims from office, ignoring the constitutional method of impeachment. That would seem to be a violent infringement upon the law but it would be little more violent than the attempt to remove without charges of "inefficiency, neglect of office, or malfeasance" a legally appointed member of a commission set up under a law the obvious intention of which was to make that commission nonpartisan and beyond the reach of politics.

The vital question involved in this action of the Chief Executive is whether the provisions in the law creating the Federal Trade Commission and similar provisions in other statutes requiring that not more than a majority of the Commission shall be of one political party, that they shall be appointed for a term of 7 years, that they may be removed for the causes specified, and all other provisions in that statute intended to make the Commission an independent body and keep it free from political influence are constitutional or unconstitutional.

Undoubtedly the Myers case (272 U.S. 107) will play an important part in the legal argument which will finally take place over this controversy. That case involved a statute reading as follows:

Postmasters of the first, second, and third classes shall be appointed and may be removed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and shall hold their offices for 4 years, unless sooner removed or suspended according to law.

In this statute, differing from the one in question in the Humphrey case, broad power of removal is given to the President. The reasons for which removal may be made are not specified. The decision in the Myers case sustained the right of the President to remove a postmaster without consulting the Senate. In deciding this case Chief Justice Taft said:

> There may be duties of a quasi-judicial character imposed upon executive officers and members of executive tribunals whose decisions after hearing affect interests of individuals the discharge of which in a particular case the President cannot properly influence or control. But in such a case he may consider the decision as a reason for removing the officer on the ground that the discretion regularly intrusted to the officer by statute has not been on the whole intelligently or wisely exercised.

This, however, as stated in an editorial in the Detroit Free Press, "is not the law—it is merely the Chief Justice's obiter dictum." In this case no claim was made by the President that the duties of Mr. Humphrey were not either intelligently or legally exercised. There is a wide difference between the Myers case and that of Mr. Humphrey.

It is very difficult to see where the possible difference in viewpoint between President Roosevelt and Mr. Humphrey can possibly be involved in an interpretation of the law. The law does not require that the mental attitude of Mr. Humphrey should be either one favored or disfavored by the President. It merely requires that not more than three members of the Commission shall belong to the same political party. It cannot be presumed that Mr. Humphrey has or will act in opposition to views entertained by the President as to unfair competition or other subjects which come before this Commission; and even if such a presumption existed, it ought to play no part in deciding whether or not an official, duly appointed under this statute, should continue to serve out his term. If this policy were carried out to its logical conclusion, the Trade Commission, and every other like body, would be subject to changes of this character with every change of administration. What would be the result? It would cease to carry out the purpose for which it was organized—that of an independent semijudicial body—and would take its place among agencies purely administrative in character. As stated by the Baltimore Sun:

> It may be argued that the new Securities Act, with the administration of which the Trade Commission is charged, so enlarges the authority of the Commission as to make such reorganization essential. Some grounds for this contention exist, but the fact is that neither the administration, which drafted the act, nor the Congress, which passed it, provides for such a change. The enforcement of the securities law was intrusted to the Trade Commission as the Trade Commission then stood. If this was an oversight, it could be remedied by appropriate legislation * * *. To attempt a remedy by administrative fiat is to risk the establishment of a dangerous precedent.

The removal of Mr. Humphrey has a striking analogy to the attempt by President Roosevelt during the special session to have enacted a law empowering him to appoint as Governor of the Territory of Hawaii someone from continental United States. The organic law of Hawaii requires that the Governor of that Territory be a resident of the islands. President Roosevelt wished to appoint someone from the mainland; so Congress was requested to violate what is virtually a pact between the people of that defenseless Territory and the people of this powerful Nation and to enable him to do legally what he could not do ethically. Fortunately for our national honor, this bill has so far failed of passage in the Senate.

The principle in that case and in the Humphrey case is the same, and no sophistry can discriminate between them. The law must be the law for magistrate and citizen alike or we are no longer a Republic. Those who believe in arbitrary power may take comfort, perhaps, from incidents such as these; but they are big with disaster to democratic ideals and traditions and government. Every time that one legal right is whittled away, every time that one constitutional principle is nullified, every time that law must bow to political expediency, the way is made easier for greater and more permanent infringements upon individual rights and privileges.

Mr. Humphrey, the man, is of little importance in this controversy. I barely know him. Whether he or some other man holds his position on the Federal Trade Commission is of little comparative importance. But there is a principle at stake which, if violated, if given the status of a precedent, may be of paramount importance. It may be legal; it is certainly moral, and the preponderance of morality is against the position of the Executive; and if it becomes precedent it will arise some day to confound his successors and will detract from his own place in our country's history.

If Mr. Hoover had removed a Democrat for purely political reasons from an office such as this, the country would have rung with denunciation. Perhaps it is not unpatriotic or treasonable for a Republican—and a much stronger one today than ever before—to point out this apparent injustice on the part of a Democratic President.

For the Presidential office I have the utmost respect; for the holder of that office I wish nothing worse than a career of splendid service to his sovereign, the people. He can best serve them by administering the law as it is written, with justice to all, with injustice to none.

Mr. ARNOLD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. YOUNG].

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Chairman, yesterday we listened with interest to the very eloquent address by the gentleman from California, protesting against the removal of the battle fleet of the United States from the Pacific into the Atlantic, and advocating that our war fleet be compelled to remain in the Pacific.

Of course, the battleship fleet of the United States belongs to the entire United States and not to the Pacific coast alone. Yet most of us sympathize with the views of the gentleman. We realize that in California there is a peculiar racial condition and that there is a potential menace in the Orient. The real enemy of the American people is not Japan or any foreign country. The enemy of the American people is unemployment, hunger, nakedness, cold, distress and suffering. Those are the enemies that we, as representatives of the people, must combat. A stranger from another planet, coming into our midst, beholding a surplus of wheat and pork, and people hungry, an abundance of cotton and wool, and people inadequately clothed, plenty of coal and people cold, would say this is an insane Nation. We were; but, thank God, we are finding our way out.

Earlier today the gentleman from Illinois—I am sorry he is not here because I admire him very much personally and consider him one of the most valuable Members of this Congress—earlier today he twitted us Democrats mildly and castigated us in his genial manner because perchance the Budget would not balance and there might be a $7,000,000,000 deficit by 1935.

There are things more important than balancing the Budget. For instance, it is important to provide work to industrious and worthy men and women who desire to be gainfully employed. As a general policy it is, of course, proper to balance the Budget. This is the proper attitude for individuals and the proper attitude for government. If, however, the effort to meet the running expenses of the Government out of current revenue involves widespread hardship, then the attempt to balance the Budget should not be made at this time.

Let me call attention to the fact that in time of war, for purposes of destruction, this Government floated bond issues totalling more than $21,000,000,000. That war was remote from our shores some 3,000 miles and cost the American people $40,000,000,000. But the American Government was prepared, as the experts of the General Staff declared that the war would not end until 1919, for an expenditure of $30,000,000,000 additional during 1919 in the winning of the war.

A condition now confronts this Congress more serious than war. It is a condition that is here with us, a condition that threatens our very institutions, that menaces our people, a condition that is far more dangerous than war. It is involuntary unemployment. It is the depression. Involuntary unemployment is a great moral wrong. It is wrong to deny to worthy and industrious men and women the opportunity to be gainfully employed.

It happens that I served as a member of the Ohio Commission on Unemployment Insurance, having been appointed to that Commission by the Governor of Ohio and serving for a period of more than a year. I am proud to say that as a member of that Commission I helped draft a report recommending compulsory unemployment insurance. I helped draft the model legislative bill that was presented and is now pending in the General Assembly of Ohio, establishing in the State I represent here as Congressman-at-large, a model unemployment insurance statute for our people.

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. YOUNG. I yield.

Mr. DUNN. Does the State of Ohio have workmen's compensation insurance?

Mr. YOUNG. I am glad to answer the gentleman from Pennsylvania. It has been the boast of the Republican Party that that party has been the protector of the workingman; yet, in 1913, when I served my first term in the General Assembly of Ohio, and when we Democrats, after a lapse of some years, came into power in that State, in a few months we did more for the American workingman than the Republican Party had done in 40 years, for we enacted the compulsory compensation insurance law which was introduced in the General Assembly of Ohio by William Green, who is now president of the American Federation of Labor. [Applause.]

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. YOUNG. I yield.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. Does not the State of Ohio have a method or means of carrying its own compensation insurance in the case of State employees and insurance on government buildings? Does not the State of Ohio have a State insurance fund taken care of by the State instead of being let out to private concerns?

Mr. YOUNG. In Ohio it is not let out to private concerns. The Industrial Commission of the State of Ohio has an industrial insurance fund contributed to by all employers of the State employing three or more people in their workshops.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. Has not the State of Ohio built up a considerable surplus in that fund?

Mr. YOUNG. There is a considerable surplus in the insurance fund.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. I may say to the gentleman that in our State it is farmed out to political lobbyists for the purpose of controlling politics and it goes into a kind of slush fund to those who happen to have political influence.

Mr. YOUNG. Unfortunately, we had that same experience in Ohio. But in 1913 there took office in that State a great progressive Democrat, Gov. James M. Cox. Under his leadership we established the workmen's compensation insurance fund.

Now, may I proceed, Mr. Chairman? At the time last March when I first entered this Chamber as a new Member the entire financial structure of the United States had collapsed; a depression originally avoidable and then terminable had grown to be a great calamity by reason of ineptitude on the part of the Chief Executive and his pulling the covers over his head, ignoring the pitiful condition of his countrymen, and muttering to himself that prosperity was just around the corner; that conditions would be normal within 60 days. Banks in 48 States were closed; our international trade had been destroyed; transportation was paralyzed; our farmers were bankrupt; factories were shut down; millions of worthy and industrious men and women walked city streets jobless. Light had faded from the eyes of men and women and hope had died in breaking hearts. In fact, at no time since the northern troops fled in panic early in 1861 had our institutions been so menaced as last March when a new President took the oath of office. The times demanded leadership.

As the wandering and abject tribes of Israel in that remote period of almost forgotten centuries called to Moses to lead them from a wilderness of despondency and to free them from shackles which bound them in ruthless subjection to tyranny, so the American people called to a new President and to a newly elected Congress to lead them from a wilderness of despondency into the promised land of steady employment and economic security.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that in any country of the Old World the unparalleled condition of suffering and distress which confronted our people on March 3 and 4 of this year would have resulted in revolution and bloodshed. But here a new Executive acted promptly; a newly elected Congress acted with rapidity. We did not postpone the hope nor continue the hunger of men and women who were unemployed and little children who were underfed.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. YOUNG. I yield.

Mr. FOSS. Did Mr. Hoover receive the same kind of support from a Democratic Congress for 2 years that the Republicans accorded to Mr. Roosevelt in this special session?

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Hoover had 3 years or more to give some constructive plan, but he did nothing whatever.

Mr. FOSS. He had 2 years of a Democratic Congress and he could not do a single thing.

Mr. YOUNG. Democrats came along and acquiesced with him in farm relief and other measures, but these were not effective. Yes; Democrats supported his measures when they were of a helpful character. He had no constructive program.

We have since last March 4 gone a long way and under a great leadership.

In this Congress we are engaged in and embarked upon an ambitious program of reconstruction and recovery. Christopher Columbus, you will remember, when he started out on his voyage of discovery, did not know where he was going. When he reached his destination he did not know where he was. When he returned home he did not know where he had been. Old-timers who sailed uncharted seas, climbed unknown mountains, and plunged into unbroken forests have no reason to boast before the fine leaders of today who are blazing new trails out of old social jungles, giving employment, making life broader and more worth while for those who have heretofore lived in the darkness of unemployment and poverty.

Let me say that the Civil Works program of this administration must not be stopped. Millions of men—some 4,000,000—have already been given employment. Appropriations for the continuation of the great C.W.A. work must be forthcoming from this Congress. The C.W.A., in fact, should be expanded. It should be accelerated. It should not be curtailed. It should be continued for the duration of this depression.

President Roosevelt declared on November 15:

> I am very confident that the mere fact of giving real wages to 4,000,000 Americans who today are not getting wages is going to do more to relieve suffering and to lift the morale of the Nation than anything undertaken before.

Of course, this is just as true now as it was on November 15, and I fear that unless the funds are made available to continue the C.W.A. the depression will continue through this year. Nothing is more important than to continue to give gainful employment and continued purchasing power to our people. Certainly, private charities, soup kitchens, and bread lines cannot be permitted to be the only answer of American intelligence and sense of justice to the problem of unemployment in this country. Everywhere throughout the land people are asking: "Are we really on the way? Is this going to last?" The answer should be made by this Congress in this present session to 126,000,000 of the finest people living anywhere under the bending sky of God, that they are being definitely led away from the threatened chaos of revolution and ruin, and definitely led into the promised land of steady employment and economic security. We must not fail these people. The new deal is here, and it has brought a new day and a new hope to America. [Applause.]

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN].

Mr. MCFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein quotations from previous speeches delivered by myself and a statement of the Secretary of the Treasury recently given out to the press.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, a citizen of the United States has asked me to explain for his benefit and for the benefit of other United States citizens the real meaning of the Roosevelt gold bill, the bill which the House passed last Saturday by 360 votes to 40, with 32 Members not voting.

Mr. Chairman, a law against the Constitution is void. The gold bill creates a nullity. Old John Marshall said that the words of the Constitution are not to be twisted out of their plain, everyday meaning. The Constitution says Congress shall have power to coin money and to regulate the value thereof. This, Mr. Chairman, means that Congress has power to make coins of metal and to stamp the true value upon each one of them. It does not mean that Congress shall refuse to furnish the people of the United States with an adequate coinage, and it does not mean that a theoretical amount of uncoined metal shall be called a coin. A coin is an object which may be seen and felt and even heard if one tests the ring of it.

Mr. Chairman, the gold bill attempts to cut out, delete, and destroy that part of our great written Constitution pertaining to the power of Congress to coin money and to regulate; that is, to stamp on the metal coin the value thereof. The bill is unconstitutional on its face because it seeks to nullify the Constitution. Moreover, it is a bill which is contrary to the common law and to the law of custom upon which the common law rests. It attempts to legalize robbery. It attempts by force to deprive the people of the United States of their right to the currency of the Constitution. It gives the international bankers power to send the gold belonging to the people of the United States to a place of deposit reserved to themselves in Europe. Mr. Chairman, the gold bill cannot become a valid law by any constitutional means.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let us look at the bill to see if the legal hirelings of the Bank of England and their agents, the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Reserve banks, have been able to disguise its purpose. Let us see if they were able to clothe the grisly skeleton of their greed with echoes of glib religiosity, moral precepts, economic jargon, and shop-worn tags of speech, according to the fashion set by the present administration. The first thing that meets my eye is the title. We read:

A bill to protect the currency system of the United States, to provide for a better use of the monetary gold stock of the United States, and for other purposes.

It is indeed a bill to protect the present currency system of the United States, but it is a bill to protect it from the just wrath of United States citizens. It is a bill to save for the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Reserve banks their gigantic monopoly of a special paper currency which they steal from the Treasury and upon which they charge the people of the United States a heavy toll of interest. It is indeed a bill to provide for a better use of the monetary gold stock of the United States, if better use means the issuance of two sets of obligations against one piece of security. It is indeed a bill for "other purposes", and those are purposes which the proponents dare not mention.

Among the purposes of the gold bill not mentioned in the title is that of pretending to take into the Treasury the gold now held by the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Reserve banks, and a great effort has been made to have it appear that the Federal Reserve banks are unwilling to surrender the gold they now hold to the United States Treasury. This effort is dishonest for two reasons. First, the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Reserve banks have already made a profit of some billions of dollars out of the President's gold seizures, and those billions were stolen from the people of the United States; and, second, the transfer is fictitious. The President sought to convince Members of Congress that the Federal Reserve banks were resisting his efforts to have the Treasury take possession of the gold, but one of the members of the Federal Reserve Board spoiled that argument by declaring that the Federal Reserve Board had asked the President to have the Treasury take the gold.

You see, Mr. Chairman, under this bill the United States Treasury has to pay for the gold. Although the gold belongs to the people and was taken away from their bank deposits and their cash registers and their pocketbooks in the first place and put into the Federal Reserve banks, and although the Federal Reserve banks tricked and fooled the people into giving it to them for Federal Reserve currency, which they now refuse to redeem, and although that gold does not belong to the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Reserve banks, the United States Treasury has to pay the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Reserve banks for it. Well, how does this bill propose to pay the Federal Reserve outfit? How does this bill provide that the Government shall take over the stolen goods? It provides that the United States Government shall give the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Reserve banks new gold certificates to the full value of the loot. The gold certificates will give the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Reserve banks legal title to the gold, and the United States Treasury will be nothing more than its physical custodian. The Secretary of the Treasury will give the Federal Reserve banks gold for their new gold certificates whenever they ask for it. It is a fraudulent transfer.

When the individual citizens of the United States were required to surrender their gold, they were required to surrender their gold certificates as well as their gold coin and bullion. The Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Reserve banks are private corporations, but they did not obey the gold orders. They did not surrender any gold coin, gold certificates, or gold bullion. On the contrary, the gold which was commandeered from the people was given to them as a free gift; and now, after they have taken into their possession all the gold belonging to the people, they are ready to make a pretended transfer of that gold to the Government. Evidently there is law for the common man and no law for the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Reserve banks. The common man must toe the mark, but the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Reserve banks are the agents of the Bank of England, and the law, it seems, does not apply to them. Many of the officials of the Federal Reserve outfit have had charges of impeachment brought against them, but those charges have not been investigated.

The Federal Reserve outfit now has in its possession gold coin, gold certificates, and gold bullion. But this bill does not require them to surrender their present holdings of gold certificates. After this bill becomes law, if such a catastrophe should occur, the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Reserve banks will still hold their present gold certificates. They may exchange those gold certificates for gold between the time this bill becomes law and the day the President makes his proposed devaluation proclamation. Is not this gift of over $1,000,000,000 in gold a great treasure to bestow upon the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Reserve banks—the corrupt and sinister organization which has bankrupted the country? Does this not make favorites of the financial crooks who control it?

Mr. Chairman, all the gold in the possession of the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Reserve banks belongs to the people of the United States. During the last 20 years, under the vicious Federal Reserve Act, they have taken it from the people in exchange for Federal Reserve currency, and it has not cost them one penny. Now they come forward to make a pretended transfer of the people's gold coin and bullion to the United States Treasury. Not one penny of the gold they pretend to transfer to the United States Treasury is owned by them; every dollar of it belongs to the individual citizens of the United States. The United States Treasury is to buy it on credit and to pay for it with new gold certificates. How does this transfer title to the United States Treasury? Can the Congress lend itself to such a transaction? Last May I stated that, in my opinion, the people's gold, unjustly impounded in the Federal Reserve banks, should be placed in the people's Treasury, but I did not state that it should be placed there as the property of the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Reserve banks, to be withdrawn by them with gold certificates and to be made exportable from the United States Treasury to the Bank for International Settlements in Europe. What this bill proposes to do in connection with the President's message suggesting that this United States gold may be sent to Europe to be kept in the Bank for International Settlements with the loot of the central banks of other countries is one of the greatest fiscal frauds in history. It is one of the biggest swindles of all time.

Again, Mr. Chairman, as you very well know, the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Reserve banks had paper currency outstanding to the extent of about $5,000,000,000 when the present administration came into power. That currency was redeemable in gold. It constituted the people's title to all the gold held by the Federal Reserve outfit. It constituted a first and paramount lien on all the assets of the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Reserve banks. Instead of taking over the gold and the assets of the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Reserve banks, including the great hoard of United States wealth which they have hidden in foreign countries, and honestly administering those assets for the benefit of the people who had been defrauded by the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Reserve banks, the President of the United States unlawfully relieved the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Reserve banks from their legal liability to redeem their Federal Reserve currency in gold, or in lawful money convertible into gold, and from the surrender of all their assets. Every dollar that was unlawfully taken from the people of the United States by Roosevelt's gold order was given to the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Reserve banks in preparation for this great steal, this wholesale robbery of the masses for the benefit of the privileged few. And now that American citizens have lost their gold, an entirely fictitious transfer has been arranged to deceive the people. Mr. Chairman, the President may underrate the mental capacity of the American people as much as he likes, but I venture to say there is no man in the United States so dumb that he cannot understand how this bill tricks and deceives him.

The Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Reserve banks have profited to the extent of $5,000,000,000 or more by being released from their obligation to redeem their outstanding $5,000,000,000 of paper Federal Reserve currency in gold. They have profited by having had over a billion dollars in gold certificates saved to them. They have profited during the last 20 years by the criminality of the Federal Reserve Board, which never charged them one penny in interest on the great mass of Federal Reserve currency they have taken from the Government. They have profited from their own wrongdoing by the unlawful creation of fictitious claims against the United States Government and the giving of those claims to foreigners, and they have profited by their control of all the public revenues. And now they come forward with a scheme to sell the gold they have taken from the American people to the Treasury for new gold certificates which will give them a legal title to that gold and permit them to do as they please with it. An era of corruption is culminating in one of the greatest crimes that have ever been perpetrated against the people. Mark my words, Mr. Chairman, there will be trouble here if this bill becomes law.

Why, Mr. Chairman, this fiscal fraud, this crime is so stupendous that the instigators and manipulators of it did not dare to have all the transactions performed by one man. Each man did his part and then got out of Washington pretending that he disagreed with the President's money policy or pretending that he was ill. William H. Woodin, who sat beside Albert H. Wiggin on the board of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York and who acquiesced in and helped to perpetrate the financial misdeeds which bankrupted the country, is now hiding in a western sanitarium. Dr. Sprague, the tool of the international bankers and an employee of the Bank of England, was, in my opinion, put into the Treasury to resign at a certain time and to create uncertainty in the minds of the people by the manner of his going and his subsequent articles pleading for sound money. Mr. Chairman, all the bickering and the resignations and the artful propaganda that have been thrown around the monetary policy of Franklin D. Roosevelt cannot disguise the fact that he was selected by the international bankers to carry on the work they started with the great depression; that is, the pauperization of the masses and the seizure of American property for their own use and benefit, and that he has lent himself to their schemes by unconstitutionally demanding and assuming the dictatorial powers which will enable him to carry them out.

Another purpose of this bill not mentioned in the title is the transference of a very large quantity of United States gold to the Bank for International Settlements. One of the chief objects of the gold policy of the present administration is the sending of gold taken by force from its lawful American owners to the Bank for International Settlements in Europe, where it will be kept with the property of the central banks of the world. According to the Hague convention, under which the Bank for International Settlements was formed, gold deposited in the vaults of the Bank for International Settlements is safe from seizure. Our gold, when it goes there, will certainly be safe from seizure by the United States. The Bank for International Settlements is dominated by the Bank of England. It is not on American soil. It is in Europe. American gold, therefore, will be kept in Europe. It will be placed where none of the wage slaves of the United States will ever be able to acquire any of it. It will be the capital and means of oppression of that international superstate, that financial superstate, which has been after Uncle Sam's gold money ever since the wealth of this country attracted the attention of greedy European bankers and brought them flocking over here to set up the suction pumps of the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Reserve banks.

The Bank for International Settlements is an international bankers' bank. It is a central bank of central banks. The international bankers, who brought about the depression, have been drawing gold to themselves from the common people of every land. It is their intention to use that gold for their own purposes. They propose two kinds of money. Gold—the real money—is what they intend to have for themselves, and paper money, which has no intrinsic value in itself, and which is made out of nothing and is worth nothing unless it can be redeemed by the holder in gold—that is for the common people, or, as they call us, the peasants.

George Washington said:

> I never have heard, and I hope I never shall hear, any serious mention of a paper emission in this state; yet such a thing may be in agitation. Ignorance and design are productive of much mischief. The former is the tool of the latter, and is often set at work suddenly and unexpectedly.

While he was here in Congress, Daniel Webster, in 1832, made the following statement:

> Of all the contrivances for cheating the laboring classes of mankind, none have been more effectual than that which deludes them with paper money. This is the most effectual of inventions to fertilize the rich man's field by the sweat of the poor man's brow. Ordinary tyranny, oppression, excessive taxation—these bear lightly on the happiness of the mass of the community compared with fraudulent currencies and the robberies committed by depreciated paper. Our own history has recorded for our instruction enough, and more than enough, of the demoralizing tendency, the injustice, and the intolerable oppression, on the virtuous and well disposed, of a degraded paper currency, authorized by law, or in any way countenanced by government.

Franklin D. Roosevelt, the high priest of repudiation, the apostle of irredeemable paper money, and the man who intends to send United States gold out of the United States to a place where no American citizen can claim it—this Franklin D. Roosevelt characterizes all those who do not agree with his monetary policy as mules. If that is true, what an awful mule President Woodrow Wilson must have been. Concerning Andrew Jackson, Wilson said:

He had no idea of allowing the country to undertake the fatal experiment of an irredeemable paper currency.

This is the fatal experiment Franklin D. Roosevelt has undertaken. This is a part of his policy of "bold experimentation." Not long ago he told the people at Savannah that George Washington, like himself, was an experimenter. Mr. Chairman, there are no points of resemblance between George Washington and Franklin D. Roosevelt, experimental or otherwise. George Washington did not take orders from money changers. He did not rob the people of their gold. George Washington abhorred dishonor in all its forms. He would have died before he would have violated his oath of office or tampered with the Constitution of the United States in the manner of Franklin D. Roosevelt.

In 1837 the New York Herald described the crime of suspending payments in specie, that is, in gold or silver, on demand, as follows:

The general suspension of specie payments is a terrible fraud upon the community that will end in destruction to all concerned. This fraud is heightened into crime of the deepest dye, from the fact that it is done to send gold and silver to England by the actual plunder, at the point of the bayonet, of the great mass of the people here * * *. Such an act is a phenomenon in the annals of crime, without a parallel in the history of tyranny, violence, or bad government, from the remotest ages of the world down to the present day.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let us hear the true purpose of the $2,000,000,000 fund which this bill proposes to set up. I quote from the prophecies of Henry Morgenthau, Mr. Baruch's Secretary of the United States Treasury, as shown by the following article which appeared in the Washington Times of January 16, 1934:

TREASURY SEES UNITED STATES NEED OF BLUE CHIPS

When you play poker, you want just as many blue chips as the other fellow.

That, in a man's language, was the gist of Secretary Morganthau's summing up of the Roosevelt proposal for a $2,000,000,000 stabilization fund to protect the currency of the United States.

In other words, the American Government is engaged in probably the greatest gamble of all time. The stake is the credit of the United States.

TO EQUAL BRITISH

When asked why a figure of 2,000 millions for the stabilization fund had been asked, Morgenthau said:

"We figured we might need an amount substantially equal to the British stabilization fund.

"If we are going to play, we must have as many chips as the other fellow.

"We want every piece of machinery the other countries have. We want to be in a position to buy gold and to sell gold."

The 2,000-million stabilization fund will be derived from the Government's profit on the debasing of the value of the dollar to from 50 to 60 percent of the normal valuation.

FUND FROM PROFITS

If the debasement is 50 percent, the profit to the Government will be $4,000,000,000 in round numbers. A 60-cent dollar will mean about 2,666 millions in profits.

Out of these profits will come the stabilization fund to be administered by the Secretary of the Treasury, the remainder being available for any Government expenditure. Morgenthau said:

"It is possible that the mere existence of the fund will be sufficient to carry out the law which requires that the Secretary of the Treasury maintain all lawful money of the Government on parity with gold."

The Secretary of the Treasury is charged with the responsibility of administration of the fund to carry out that purpose. If any particular type of currency issued—United States notes, for instance—should become depreciated in value, the Treasury would go into the market and buy a sufficient quantity of that currency to maintain its parity. Operations in the foreign markets to protect possible depreciation of the dollar would be similar.

Let this quotation from Morgenthau go down into history. Long from now some curious investigator of the present age of witchcraft and magic in the White House may unearth it and reconstruct the financial history of the new deal from it, as science from a single part reconstructs the entire animal.

Mr. Chairman, it is not the gambler's voice in Mr. Morgenthau's confession which most deserves political attention. We are becoming accustomed here to gambling terms as they are employed by the executive branch of the Government, and we can well understand that the Executive and his favorites must of necessity speak the lingo of their kind. This is a gambler's administration, and all the "big shot" gamblers are here to revel in it. Mr. Roosevelt does not deny his gambling propensities. He is a "new dealer." He is "on his way", but he "doesn't know where he is going." He is for a policy of "bold experimentation", just as Samuel Insull was for a policy of bold experimentation. He has not been Ben Smith's patron all these years for nothing. But, Mr. Chairman, there is something apart from the vice of gambling to be observed in Mr. Morgenthau's utterance, and that is its entire untruthfulness. He would have us believe that the United States is on one side of the fence and Great Britain on the other. That, of course, is not the case. The United States has been placed in a position of financial servitude to Great Britain, and Mr. Morgenthau's loud-sounding propaganda is designed to conceal that fact from the people. Great pains have been taken to conceal it. It would be very damaging to this administration if certain people in the United States should find out about the great sums of United States money which have been sent to England during the past summer. Those funds were appropriated by Congress for the people of the United States.

Mr. Chairman, why should tax money paid by American citizens be sent to London? When England makes her periodical gesture of insult toward the United States by paying a small installment on the war debt she owes us, she pays us in debased coins, in token coins, to be exact. But when Mr. Roosevelt sends American money to England, he sends it in gold or its equivalent. When Mr. Morgenthau obtains his "kitty", for this, I have been told, is what he called the proposed stabilization fund at the White House a week ago last Sunday evening, American funds will be fed to Europe more expeditiously and with less secrecy than such operations now require. If Congress puts the people's property into a "kitty", someone, if he cannot be the knight of the bedchamber, can at least pose before royalty as the knight of the "kitty."

Mr. Chairman, understanding that Henry Morgenthau is related by marriage to Herbert Lehman, Jewish Governor of the State of New York, and is related by marriage or otherwise to the Seligmans, of the international Jewish firm of J. & W. Seligman, who were publicly shown before a Senate committee of investigation to have offered a bribe to a foreign government; and to the Lewissohns, a firm of Jewish international bankers; and to the Warburgs, whose operations through Kuhn, Loeb & Co., the International Acceptance Bank, and the Bank of Manhattan Co. and other foreign and domestic institutions under their control, have drained billions of dollars out of the United States Treasury and the bank deposits belonging to United States citizens; and to the Strauses, proprietors of R. H. Macy & Co., of New York, which is an outlet for foreign goods dumped upon this country at the expense of the United States Government, which is compelled to issue paper money on the said foreign goods of the Strauses; and that Mr. Morgenthau is likewise related or otherwise connected with various other members of the Jewish banking community of New York and London, Amsterdam, and other foreign financial centers, and that he has as his assistant, presiding over public funds, Earle Bailie, a member of the firm of J. & W. Seligman, bribe givers as aforesaid, it seems to me that Henry Morgenthau's presence in the United States Treasury and the request that Congress now give him a $2,000,000,000 "kitty" of the people's money for gambling purposes is a striking confirmation of the statement made by me on the floor of the House on May 29, 1933, which statement was as follows:

Mr. Chairman, the Constitution of the United States has served us well. I am in favor of defending it against all comers. In the Constitution of the United States it is written that the United States shall guarantee a republican form of Government to every State in the Union. This guaranty has been broken by Franklin D. Roosevelt in his unlawful assumption of dictatorial powers. It is also written that no State shall make anything but gold or silver coin a tender in payment of debts. This repudiation bill and its predecessors nullify this provision of the Constitution. It is also written in an amendment to the Constitution, "The validity of the public debt of the United States, authorized by law, including debts incurred for payment of pensions and bounties in suppressing insurrection or rebellion, shall not be questioned." Mr. Chairman, this repudiation bill questions the validity of the public debt and repudiates it. It repudiates the Liberty bonds; it repudiates the veterans' adjusted-service certificates; it cancels the war debts due to the United States from foreign governments.

Now, Mr. Chairman, we have come to the place where we must decide whether we shall serve God or Mammon. Shall we nullify the Constitution at the behest of the money changers who have unlawfully taken all our gold and lawful money into their own possession or shall we take a stand here in defense of the faith of our fathers? Mr. Chairman, my mind is made up. I will stand by the Constitution. If I should fail to do so, I should expect to be met at the train when I go home to my district by a delegation of honest Pennsylvania citizens with 50 or 100 feet of rope. I should expect to be escorted to the nearest tree to be taught what it means to vote for a nullification of the Constitution in the House of Representatives.

Mr. Chairman, the provisions of this repudiation bill were foretold by a writer in the Dearborn Independent some years ago. There is, therefore, nothing novel or original about them. The writer of the article in the Dearborn Independent made the following quotation prophesying some of the measures which have been introduced here by the President of the United States:

"(2) Confiscation of money in order to regulate its circulation.

"(3) We must introduce a unit of exchange based on the value of labor units, regardless of whether paper or wood is used as the medium. We will issue money to meet the normal demands of every subject, adding a total sum for every birth and decreasing the total amount for every death.

"(4) Commercial paper will be bought by the Government, which * * * will grant loans on a business basis. A measure of this character will prevent the stagnation of money, parasitism, and laziness, qualities which were useful to us as long as the Gentiles maintained their independence, but which are not desirable to us when our kingdom comes.

"(5) We will replace stock exchanges by great Government credit institutions, whose functions will be to tax trade paper according to Government regulations. These institutions will be in such a position that they may market or buy as many as half a billion industrial shares a day. Thus all industrial undertakings will become dependent on us. You may well imagine what power that will give us.

"'Remember that when next you hear the Jewish plan that "Gentiles" shall do business with their own bits of paper, while Jews keep the gold reserve safely in their own hands. If the crash comes, "Gentiles" have the paper and the Jews have the gold. Says protocol XXII: "We hold in our hands the greatest modern power—gold; in 2 days we could free it from our treasuries in any desired quantities."'

"The Jews are economists, esoteric and exoteric: They have one system to tangle up the 'Gentile', another which they hope to install when 'Gentile' stupidity has bankrupted the world. The Jews are economists. Note the number of them who teach economics in the State universities. Says protocol VIII:

"'We will surround our Government with a whole world of economists. It is for this reason that the science of economics is the chief subject of instruction taught by the Jews.'"

Mr. Chairman, have not most of these predictions come to pass? Is it not true that, in the United States today, the "Gentiles" have the slips of paper while the Jews have the gold and lawful money? And is not this repudiation bill, a bill specifically designed and written by the Jewish international money changers themselves, in order to perpetuate their power? What else do you make of it, Mr. Chairman? Does it not cancel the war debts? Does it not defraud the holders of Liberty bonds and every other obligation calling for the payment of money? Does it not defraud the veterans of the World War and take the value out of their adjusted-compensation certificates?

Mr. Chairman, do you not see in this "kitty" bill the identical features outlined in the Protocols of Zion? Do you not see the Protocols of Zion manifested in the appointment of Henry Morgenthau as Secretary of the Treasury? It is not by accident, is it, that a representative and a relative of the money Jews of Wall Street and foreign parts has been so elevated?

Why, Mr. Chairman, this "kitty" bill takes the hitherto obscure young Henry Morgenthau and makes of him a central bank of the United States. It makes of him a central bank, an institution which Jefferson declared is one of deadly hostility to the free institutions of the United States. It exalts him above all other men. Under the powers to be granted him, his conduct is not subject to review or control by any other officer of the United States Government, not even the President.

What this "kitty" bill really does is to slide into the hands of Henry Morgenthau the emergency powers which Congress granted to the President. Those powers will not lapse. Instead, they are being slyly and dishonestly transferred to the bankers and after the bankers, in the person of Henry Morgenthau, have exercised them long enough to get the gold of the United States into their exclusive possession and to transfer it to their den of thieves, the Bank for International Settlements, Congress may take back its constitutional power over the currency, but it will have nothing left to exercise it on. The monetary gold of the people of the United States will, like the sons of the people, be buried in a foreign field.

Mr. Chairman, if you, as one of the party in power, are thinking of remaking the world so that the old America we knew and loved is to be no more; if you are one of those who is countenancing the placing of this country under the British Crown and the pooling of all American resources with those of England and Soviet Russia; if you are one of those to whom a title of nobility appears to be more desirable than plain citizenship in the Republic founded by George Washington, I trust that you will some day descend from the Speaker's chair and let us know the reasons for your preference. If, on the other hand, you are not what these words depict, I trust that you will come down to the floor and tell us how constitutional government is to be maintained in this country if the plutocratic managers of the Democratic Party continue their efforts to destroy it. You, if anyone, should be able to give the people of the United States an answer to this question.

Under this administration the result of the American Revolution has been reversed. The United States has become an economic vassal of Great Britain. The once proud Republic of the United States with its great charter of human freedom, the Declaration of Independence, and its written Constitution, which had kept it free and independent for over 140 years, and its flag, first made by the hands of Betsy Ross in Philadelphia, and its national anthem, born within earshot of the British guns that shelled Fort McHenry—all these, like the American dollar, were brought down from their high estate.

Oh, say, can you see by the dawn's early light
What so proudly we hailed at the twilight's last gleaming?

Mr. Chairman, you know very well that you cannot see that flag there as it used to be. Others started very cautiously to pull it down. But it was Franklin D. Roosevelt, in his unlawful and unconstitutional assumption of dictatorial powers, who finally lowered it and tore it from its standard.

Mr. KELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. Yes. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. KELLER. I should like to ask this question, if the gentleman holds that our only legal money under the Constitution is metal money?

Mr. McFADDEN. I do; yes.

Mr. KELLER. What does the gentleman think of the legal-tender decisions of our Supreme Court on this subject?

Mr. McFADDEN. I do not care to pass upon the decisions of the Supreme Court.

Mr. KELLER. They hold contrary to that, do they not?

Mr. McFADDEN. I think I have covered that in my remarks.

Mr. ARNOLD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. DOCKWEILER].

Mr. DOCKWEILER. Mr. Chairman, I was reminded this morning of the subject I am going to speak about in my reading of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of yesterday, and that subject I have entitled "One of the Great American Rackets." It exists under the very nose of Congress and under the very nose of the Senate, and has continued for the more than 150 years this Nation has existed, and this is the question of postmasters.

Ever since the days of "Ben" Franklin, when he acted as the first postmaster in this country, and down through the line of subsequent postmasters, there has grown up in this Nation a barnacle that has clung tight to the bottom of our ship of state, and it is nothing more than a pure and simple political racket, in my estimation—postmasters.

I bring this matter up because I am a member of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and I am just becoming more familiar with some the things that have existed.

I note in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of this morning, and I tabulated the number very roughly, the President has sent to the Senate over 500 names to be approved by the Senate for postmasterships throughout the Nation.

Mr. Chairman, I also read in the hearings on the Post Office appropriation bill, and I bring this subject up at this time because I think it is opportune when we are considering such appropriations for the Post Office Department—I read on page 49 of the report of the hearings that there are, in all, a total of Presidential postmasters amounting to 14,113, and that there is expected to be paid under this appropriation for 1935–36 a total sum, in salaries, of $28,057,700.

Mr. Chairman, I have no complaint to make about the good souls, men and women, who are appointed postmasters and postmistresses throughout this country. I have appointed postmasters and postmistresses, and so have you, but let us get right down to the real situation. We appoint postmasters and postmistresses purely as a reward for some political effort they make in our behalf in our own congressional districts. The Government does not get a quid pro quo for their services. They are more or less political contact men for the Congressmen and for the political party of the State.

I feel I have a better right to talk upon this subject because it is my party that is in power and it is my party that for some years to come will dole out the postmasterships in this country. So I can take this attitude with better grace than if I were a Member on the Republican side of the House.

We pay out $28,000,000 a year in salaries to these postmasters, and we know when we appoint them that they are either the butcher, the baker, or the candlestick maker in our particular district. We appoint them, not because they have any post-office experience—of course not—they know nothing about the Post Office Department, its activities, or its administration. They have not the slightest idea of what to do, but they are taught, as soon as they are appointed, the duties of the office by a very able chief assistant who is a member of the civil service.

Mr. Chairman, I am now preparing a bill which I expect to file in this House very soon. This bill has to do with the elimination of first-, second-, and third-class post offices. There is no need to include the fourth-class post offices, because many years ago, or somewhere down the line, it was deemed fit and proper to place the fourth-class post offices in the hands of regular post-office civil service. I cannot understand why the first-, second-, and third-class postmasters should not also be regular civil-service men; that is, they should be men or women drawn from clerkships or graduated, you might say, from the regular line of duty of clerk in the Post Office Department. My bill will propose to do this, and in order not to cause a great deal of harm or disturb a great many good men and women who now hold such commissions, I am going to propose in my bill that there be a gradual elimination of political postmasterships up to, perhaps, and including the year 1938 or 1940, so that this practice can be forever done away with in this Nation at least by that time.

After all, it would be a great help to the Post Office Department and to all of its workers. It would create a great spirit of enterprise and a better morale among the workers of the Post Office Department if they felt that after years of service they could hope to be elevated by the Civil Service Commission or by the Postmaster General to the position of holding in their declining days a post office in their own particular locality. This would give these clerks and carriers something to look forward to.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOCKWEILER. Yes.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Why does not the gentleman go all the way and provide in his bill that Cabinet members and heads of departments be subjected to civil-service examinations? They are clearly in the same class.

Mr. DOCKWEILER. No; they are not in the same class.

Mr. O'CONNOR. The chiefs of bureaus and men in the various departments learn such duties after years and years of experience, and many of them would make the best Cabinet members and many of them would make the best heads of departments, and the only step beyond this would be to put civil service on Congressmen and the President.

Mr. DOCKWEILER. I do not agree with the gentleman.

Mr. FOULKES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOCKWEILER. I have only a few minutes left, but I yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. FOULKES. Does the gentleman expect to get home alive after introducing this bill?

Mr. DOCKWEILER. If I get out of this body alive, I think I can get home alive.

The gentleman from New York asked me the question, Why not put the members of the Cabinet under civil service? Members of the Cabinet have the duty of carrying out or performing the functions of the policy of the administration. I tried to explain in the beginning of my speech that a political postmaster is not a man who is able to take care of that particular office. He is not a man who has had experience in that line. He is appointed because he renders a political service and the man who really does the work is the chief assistant.

Now, there is another thought. We have about turned the corner in a new deal, even in politics. I suppose there will be introduced in Congress a bill to correct some of the evils that have grown up in the great political system of the country.

I have heard, and no doubt it exists in some of the well-organized communities, that a certain person is selected for postmaster and is expected to contribute 10 percent of his salary to the political party that is responsible for securing the office for that person. Of course, that is a political contribution.

Mr. ARNOLD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOCKWEILER. I yield.

Mr. ARNOLD. Does the gentleman state in good faith that 10 percent of the salaries of postmasters is contributed to political parties?

Mr. DOCKWEILER. No; I say I assume that.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Why does the gentleman assume it? In what part of the country do they make that contribution?

Mr. DOCKWEILER. I said that I had heard that such was the fact.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I never heard of any postmaster in my section contributing to the campaign any percentage of his salary.

Mr. ARNOLD. That is rather a severe statement. I am sure that in my section of the country, as far as I know, the practice has never been indulged in.

Mr. MEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOCKWEILER. I yield.

Mr. MEAD. I do not believe the gentleman's statement is so serious, in view of the fact that he prefaced his statement with language indicating that he was making that assumption. We have heard for a great many years of postmasterships being sold, and that has been aired in the Senate and perhaps in this body. It is assumed also that men in political office, such as a postmaster, are subject to considerable political pressure. For instance, in the last Republican campaign the First Assistant Postmaster General and the Second Assistant Postmaster General insisted that the postmasters go out on the hustings and work for the election of the President, and they were threatened with dismissal from the service if they did not carry that out. To quote Assistant Postmaster General Glover, he said:

> If you do not do that, I will welcome your resignation when I get back to Washington.

So the gentleman has the right to assume that that has been done by some political party in power. Of course, that does not apply to the present organization, because they have been selecting the highest type of officials.

Mr. DOCKWEILER. I thank the gentleman for his remarks. I had just that in mind.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOCKWEILER. Yes.

Mr. O'CONNOR. The gentleman made the statement, and I want to say that some people have been put in jail for selling postmasterships. Furthermore, in the last campaign orders went out—I do not know whether it was from the Postmaster General or the Assistant Postmaster General—advising the postmasters that there was no prohibition whatever about indulging in a campaign, and they might freely take all the time, for which they were paid by the Government, to participate in the campaign.

Of course, he did not have to suggest that they participate in behalf of the Socialist Party. They could gather from the carte blanche given to them for whom they could campaign.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOCKWEILER. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I want to ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] what is going to be the policy of this present administration?

Mr. O'CONNOR. The policy of this present administration, as it has always been in Democratic administartions, will be to keep postmasters, the Federal employees, out of politics. In my 25 years' experience in politics I never saw one Federal employee around a Democratic clubhouse or arcund the polling place on election day.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. The newspapers within the last few days have been full of the names of Democratic politicians who hold responsible positions and who are still working actively politically.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Oh, well, that is not in this Post Office Department. They are not the postmasters from Podunk, who make a community center and Republican club out of the post office where the boys could gather and discuss Republican politics.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. If the policy is good in one field, it ought to be good in another.

Mr. DOCKWEILER. Mr. Chairman, I just yielded for a question. When I rose I did not anticipate that what I had to say was popular, but I do say that I am going to propose my bill and urge it in earnestness because I think it will be a great saving to the Post Office Department, which, next year, will show a deficit of about $17,000,000, according to the Post Office report, and I think we can save that $17,000,000 by letting the executives of the Post Office Department take care of the post offices in the manner suggested in my proposed bill.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOCKWEILER. Yes.

Mr. MEAD. The gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] was illustrating the high idealism of the Democratic Party and was interrupted by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN] who brought out the argument that within the last few days Democrats were resigning from membership of the National Committee. Let me say, to verify the statement made by the gentleman from New York, that this Capitol and our committee room were filled with Republican lawyers, lobbyists, who were associated with Republican committees, and they were never interfered with, but the idealism of the Democratic Party has asserted itself and probably for the first time in recent years we are divorcing the organization in power from lobbying activities upon the part of some people high in its official councils.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Not only were they never interfered with, but they have entree to every place in this Capitol, and they also had private keys to the little green house on K Street.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield now to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SWICK].

Mr. SWICK. Mr. Chairman, I have today filed the following petition, bearing the names of 10,264 residents of my district, divided as follows: Beaver County, 4,769; Lawrence County, 3,242; and Butler County, 2,253. The petition was accompanied by a letter of transmittal from the Honorable George T. Weingartner, 504 L. S. & T. Building, New Castle, Pa., a man who has served his county and State as a commissioner and State senator for many years:

PROTEST AND PETITION

To the Congress of the United States of America, greetings:

We, undersigned people of the United States of America, capable of determining for ourselves what we wish to hear broadcast by radio without censorship by the clergy or anyone else, hereby protest to the Congress against certain wrongful interference with our rights.

The Radio Act provides, as we understand, for the broadcasting of that which is in the public interest.

The message of the true God, Jehovah, as expressed by Him in the prophecies of His Word (the Bible), and as now being given to the people of this Nation by Judge Rutherford and others of Jehovah's Witnesses is of interest to us. When broadcast, it is convenient for us to hear it in our homes and is necessary for our welfare. We are entitled to hear and desire to hear that message. We disapprove of every attempt to prevent our hearing it broadcast.

The National Broadcasting Co., the Columbia Broadcasting System, the Roman Catholic hierarchy, and others have wrongfully, by threats, coercion, and other improper influence, prevented many stations from broadcasting this message of truth, thus depriving stations of legitimate income and depriving millions of American citizens of the privilege of hearing what they wish to hear, and against this wrongful action we vigorously protest.

Exercising the right guaranteed to us by the Constitution of the United States, we therefore respectfully petition the Congress to act at once to safeguard the inherent rights of the American people relative to the radio.

Mr. Chairman, I understand that similar petitions have been received by several Members of this House, all of them bearing the signatures of thousands of American citizens. We have heard similar charges of censorship made against the radio companies on the floor by Members of this House. It is certainly evident that something is wrong; we cannot ignore such charges. Each of these petitions have been referred to the House Committee on Merchant Marine, Radio, and Fisheries. I hope the chairman of that committee will recognize the rights of these petitioners and conduct an investigation of the charges, and if these conditions prevail, that legislation is forthcoming that will correct them.

I would be derelict indeed if I failed to present a matter of sufficient importance to have received the signatures of more than 10,000 residents of my district to this Congress. It is of importance to all concerned that this matter be thoroughly investigated at a very early date.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. TABER. Yes.

Mr. BRITTEN. In order that I may ask the gentleman in charge of the committee when he contemplates rising. It is close onto 5 o'clock, and I understand there is a message from the President on the Speaker's table.

Mr. ARNOLD. I want to conserve as much time as possible. There is one other gentleman who wants to speak. I think it proper to rise about 5 o'clock, which is the usual time, and I see no reason to break in at this particular time.

Mr. BRITTEN. The gentleman wants to proceed?

Mr. ARNOLD. Yes.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. CHASE].

Mr. CHASE. Mr. Chairman, I rise to discuss, first, the injustice done underpaid Federal employees by the misnamed Federal "Economy" Act, forced through the House on the 11th of March last; second, that form of legalized graft known as a Federal subsidy.

Quoting from the Democratic platform of 1928, and this is not unfriendly to the committee or the chairman of the subcommittee having in charge this bill:

> Federal employees should receive a living wage based upon American standards of decent living. Present wages are in many instances far below that standard. We favor a fair and liberal retirement law for Government employees in the classified service.

That is the platform pledge of the Democratic Party to Federal employees.

Quoting from column 2, page 11, of the January issue of the magazine The Federal Employee, which is the official magazine of the National Federation of Federal Employees, Senator HARRISON said:

I appreciate that during recent months the cost of living has increased and that the spirit of the recovery movement demands the repeal of that portion of the Economy Act which reduced salaries of Federal employees. In the coming session of Congress, I will favor restoration of this reduction to these employees. I hope to have a conference with the President touching this matter some time before the convening of Congress.

Quoting again from column 2, page 11, of the same issue of the same magazine, Representative BYRNS said:

I believe that the salaries of Federal employees should be restored unless exceedingly imperative reasons exist to the contrary. I favor their full restoration. And I believe that Congress will take that action.

Practically every Member on either side of the aisle is in accord with that statement, yet there was forced through this House a gag rule to prevent Members of Congress from voting their judgment upon the merits of the question itself.

I wish to emphasize today the purpose of that gag rule. It was not to gag the five members of the Farmer-Labor Party. It was not to gag the 115 members of the Republican Party. Its sole purpose was to gag the 313 members of the Democratic Party so that they would have no chance to vote on the merits of that bill. Otherwise the wages of underpaid Federal employees would be put back where they belong.

Mr. GOSS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHASE. Yes; I yield.

Mr. GOSS. Of course, the Membership had a chance to vote on that question when the previous question was ordered. As one of the members of the subcommittee, I asked for the yeas and nays, and the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CHASE. Yes; but the Membership was denied the opportunity of voting on the merits of the bill itself, and it was entitled to that opportunity.

Mr. GOSS. We had a motion to recommit the bill and we also had a vote on that.

Mr. CHASE. Surely we had. You did your best, but Members could not vote "yes" or "no" squarely on the proposition of restoring the 15 percent to underpaid Federal employees. And when the so-called "economy bill" was jammed down our throats, 124,678 Federal employees were receiving an annual wage of less than $1,000, while 56,883 were paid from $1,000 to $1,100 a year, and every one of them had to take the 15-percent cut.

Mr. GOSS. They could if they had voted down the previous question on the rule, which is a matter of record.

Mr. CHASE. I appreciate the gentleman's position. It is well taken. But even his generous excuse does not justify that vicious gag rule.

Mr. DUNN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHASE. I yield with pleasure to the gentleman.

Mr. DUNN. Many Democrats on this side voted to recommit that bill.

Mr. CHASE. I fully realize that. You are entitled to credit for so doing. But where were your leaders? How did they vote?

Some of us would like to support our President. We would like to go along with you on various propositions, but we do wish to vote on the merits of the propositions themselves, and when they are wrong to vote no.

To make our problem clear, I wish to read this afternoon what a distinguished constituent in the State of Minnesota, a professional man, highly respected, in my home State, wired to the dean of the Minnesota delegation after we voted for one of the administration bills:

Be not like dumb driven cattle. Your herdsman, the international bankers, are preparing us for emasculation purposes. Shoemaker was in jail, but I think the whole bunch of you should be there for voting for that banking bill.

Mr. KELLER. Who was it who wrote that?

Mr. CHASE. Dr. D. R. Miller, of Bird Island, Renville County, Minn., a gentleman of the highest standing. I wrote him the next day that I was in exact accord with his telegram. That you gentlemen were in accord also, you proved by coming back 8 days later to force through a second bill in an effort to undo the harm you did through the first one.

The only excuse I have heard in this House on either side of the aisle for our unjustifiable treatment of underpaid employees is the sacred word economy, and I want to know when we are going to begin really to economize.

We hear about the so-called "Black investigation" over at the other end of the Capitol. I quote from column 1, page 3, of the October 31, 1933, issue of Labor, a national weekly newspaper, relative to alleged facts brought out by this investigation:

J. E. Dockendorff, of the Black Diamond line, known to newspaper men as "Little Dockey", told how he milked, squeezed, drained, and extracted profits from his line—all with the help of the Government. In the 14 years from 1919 to 1932, both inclusive, "Little Dockey" drew in salary and expenses $1,576,396, or an average of more than $112,500 a year.

In my home State of Minnesota a disabled veteran serving as janitor in a post office in a little town and drawing a weekly salary of less than $4 has to take the 15-percent cut, while another crippled soldier pays the rest of his living expenses. Who is going to profit from the sacred economy we hear about? Is it the underpaid Federal employee? Is it the crippled soldier? Is it the American taxpayers? Or, is it a lot of "Little Dockeys"?

Mr. WEARIN. All that happened during the course of the recent Republican administration, did it not?

Mr. CHASE. What difference does it make? I am not talking partisan politics. Whether under a Republican or Democratic administration, it is wrong.

Mr. WEARIN. I asked the gentleman when it happened. Did it not happen during the last two administrations?

Mr. CHASE. It did, so far as I know. I am not concealing that fact. The point is that it is wrong.

Mr. ARNOLD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHASE. I yield.

Mr. ARNOLD. May I suggest to the gentleman that the three laws under which subsidies have been granted were passed under a Republican administration. May I further suggest to the gentleman that not a single solitary contract involving subsidies has been entered into since the 4th of March last year. If that is what the gentleman has reference to, certainly this side of the House is not responsible for the legislation that made possible the subsidies, and is not responsible for the contracts under which we are forced to make this appropriation to carry them out.

Mr. CHASE. I thank the distinguished chairman for his observation. He helps to make clear my point, because, before I conclude, I wish to ask him, as chairman of this committee, what he is doing now to cut out this legalized graft?

Mr. ARNOLD. I can answer the gentleman right now.

Mr. CHASE. I prefer to make clear the foundation for the question. As I said, it is not unfriendly to you or to your committee.

Column 2, page 7, of the November 30, 1933, issue of the St. Paul Dispatch contains the following:

Senator BLACK's inquiry into ocean and air mail subventions has mined enough pay dirt already to make it pretty certain the coming session will prune that field of Government aid with a sharp knife.

For instance, had you been lucky enough to be permitted to invest one dollar in Stanley Dollar's venture with the Admiral Oriental Steamship Co. in 1922 you would have had $14,000 in cash and $2,000 in stock by 1930.

Dollar put up $500—no more, no less—to acquire this line, and in 8 years had $7,300,000 net profit and $1,000,000 in stock.

Even without the millions the Government gave him to carry mail his profits would have run around $400,000 or $500,000 a year.

I quote from column 2, page 15, of the October 9, 1933, issue of the magazine Time:

In 1928 Mr. Herbermann procured for his line a 10-year ocean mail contract at $1,044,000 per year. When his new ships began to operate Walter Brown—

I am concealing no names; I am defending no party—then Postmaster General, increased this subsidy to $2,185,000 per year. But Export Steamship was not over burdened with postal cargo. From August 1928 to June 1929 its ships carried precisely 3 pounds of mail, a cost to the Government of $234,980 per pound.

In the name of the underpaid Federal employee I protest against this misuse of public money. [Applause.]

Now, in this bill, unnumbered as yet, appears on page 55 this statement:

For transportation of foreign mails by steamship, aircraft, or otherwise, including the cost of advertising in connection with the award of contracts authorized by the Merchant Marine Act of 1928, $37,500,000.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHASE. I yield gladly.

Mr. GOSS. I call the gentleman's attention to page 27 of the report which shows a total of $40,250,000.

Mr. CHASE. Thank you. Insert that in the RECORD; and then this from page 21 of the committee's report:

The committee has no means of knowing what the right sum to appropriate may be, and until the results of these studies and investigations lead to a sound conclusion the position of standing on the present rate of expenditure is adopted even though it may be arbitrary in character.

* * * * * * *

This service, as in the case of domestic air mail and ocean mail, is definitely on a subsidy basis, the estimated revenues being $1,250,000 and the excess cost or subsidy amounting to approximately $5,750,000.

Again, in the name of the underpaid Federal employees and in the name of those thousands of disabled soldiers we sent to the bread lines by the unfortunate so-called "Economy Act" of March 11, and in the name of the dozens of physically disabled and mentally abnormal veterans who lie today in suicides' graves because of that act and the orders issued under it, I demand that we stop handing out funds of the American taxpayer gratuitously to "Little Dockeys" regardless of whether you call the payment a subvention, subsidy, or graft.

With all respect to this committee and its chairman, I bring up the subject now so that in his own time and in his own way the chairman of the subcommittee may tell us who are financially interested in this particular appropriation, what their interest is, how much of the appropriated fund will be paid out for little or no service, and why the amount should not be withheld to apply toward adequate wages for underpaid Federal employees. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. ARNOLD. I may say to the gentleman from Minnesota that I expect to discuss that question tomorrow. There is not time to do it this evening. I am in full accord with the gentleman as far as these subsidies are concerned; I have always been against them, but my hands have been tied so far as these appropriations are concerned. If the gentleman is present tomorrow I shall try to show him in what way our hands are tied.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ARNOLD. I yield.

Mr. MEAD. I may say that the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads will shortly bring before the House a bill to eliminate postal subsidies in the Air Mail Service and put Air Mail Service on a self-sustaining basis. We hope to have the gentleman from Minnesota with us when the matter comes to a vote.

Mr. CHASE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ARNOLD. I yield.

Mr. CHASE. May I ask the gentleman from New York whether the bill he suggests will apply likewise to ocean mail contracts?

Mr. MEAD. Unfortunately, that is beyond the jurisdiction of our committee.

Mr. ARNOLD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. KENNEY].

Mr. KENNEY. Mr. Chairman, the Congress of the United States met for the first time in the city of New York, March 4, 1789. It had no quarters of its own; there was no place for it to convene provided for by the Congress. The city of New York offered accommodations to Congress; and, accordingly, the Congress of the United States assembled there for the first time.

In order to provide accommodations for the Congress the city of New York undertook to repair and improve its city hall. For that purpose it expended a large amount of money, and when it was completed they finally owed something like £13,000. The city of New York had nowhere to go to collect this money; it was beyond the power of the city to pay. What did the city do in order to meet its obligations? It went to the Legislature of the State of New York and asked for ways and means of providing money it could not raise through ordinary sources of available revenue.

The preamble of the law enacted by the Legislature of New York shows that the city of New York was authorized to raise this money by lottery which could not be obtained from ordinary sources of revenue available to the city. The law itself permitted the city to conduct a lottery to raise the money to pay the deficit incurred in improving the city hall for the accommodation and convenience of the Congress of the United States. Congress knew this. The city of New York applied to the legislature; and the legislature passed a law February 18, 1790, permitting this lottery in New York from which sums were derived to pay for the expense incurred in improving the city hall.

Congress afterward in 1812, I believe on May 4 of that year, passed a law permitting the city of Washington to raise money for important improvements the cost of which could not be raised from ordinary sources of revenue. Congress had before it at the time the question of amending the charter of the city of Washington. The lottery was authorized by the Congress, subject to the approval of the President, which should not exceed in the sum raised by this means $10,000 in 1 year.

Assembled in Congress today we find ourselves confronted by a condition where we cannot raise money from ordinary sources to provide for things we should provide for. We have not been able to provide for our veterans as we did formerly; we have been obliged to curtail the salaries of our Federal employees. Even in the appropriation bill now before the House we are not providing sufficient salaries for many employees of the Postal Service. The regulations that were handed down a day or two ago show that we are not able to provide as intended for the unemployed. The C.W.A. projects have been curtailed; they have been curtailed in my district, made up of small municipalities; the hours have been shortened and the salaries reduced. My people live under conditions that obtain in large cities, and I have urged the Federal Emergency Relief Administrator to deal with them accordingly, and we must raise additional funds to keep our people at work.

To what source may we go to pay for these things we must maintain? Under our present system we must either borrow or tax; but only 2 percent of our citizens pay an income tax today.

If we rely on income taxes to provide the millions that we are appropriating, then we must hit the man of small or no means.

Mr. Chairman, there is a way to get this money that is not available through ordinary sources, and we should adopt it. We should approve a lottery. We can obtain funds throughout this Nation from people of all classes willingly and in a vast sum.

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KENNEY. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. McFADDEN. Do I understand the gentleman is suggesting that we raise money for the support of the Government through a gambling device?

Mr. KENNEY. I would not call it gambling in the strict sense. I would rather regard it as a patriotic contribution to our Government for worthy purposes.

We know we are not taking care of our veterans and their dependents as we wish to take care of them. We are reducing salaries of those in the Government service who can ill afford the reduction. We are faced with the danger of laying off C.W.A. workers throughout the Nation.

Accordingly I have before the House a bill to authorize the Veterans' Administration, with the approval of the President, to conduct a lottery, which is no more than the churches of the land are doing today. Benevolent and charitable institutions are doing the same thing. The practice is wide-spread throughout the country. It is a source of revenue that might be brought into the Government through the Veterans' Administration. Primarily it is for the benefit of the veterans and their dependents, because the bill provides that immediately upon its enactment, if that event should happen, all pensions, allowance, and benefits existing on March 20 last shall be immediately restored.

This is a matter to which we should give serious consideration. It is a source of revenue which France relies upon today, and because of it France has not curtailed the benefits given to her veterans. France estimates its return from the lottery at $500,000,000 annually, and we ought to do as well, and twice as well, in this country. A lottery brings revenue today to many countries of the world. Fully 30 countries are recipients of revenue from lotteries today. It is open and available to us. Not only will it provide for the worthy purposes for which it is intended but will lighten the burden of the taxpayer who cannot provide for them without the greatest of hardship. It will, besides, give the forgotten man a welcome opportunity.

Mr. Chairman, it would give hope to our people. It would thrill the Nation. I ask you to come along. [Applause.]

Mr. ARNOLD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FULLER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill H.R. 7295, the Treasury and Post Office Departments appropriation bill, had come to no resolution thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES—SALE OF ALCOHOLIC BEVERAGES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA (H.DOC. NO. 225)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States transmitting reports from the Attorney General and the Federal Alcohol Control Director suggesting the necessity of amendatory legislation to the act (H.R. 6181) to control the manufacture, transportation, possession, and sale of alcoholic beverages in the District of Columbia, and requesting the Congress to give consideration to the suggestions contained therein, which was read and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia and ordered printed:

To the Congress:

I have approved H.R. 6181, an act to control the manufacture, transportation, possession, and sale of alcoholic beverages in the District of Columbia.

Before approving this act of the Congress, I gave it careful personal study and referred it to the Attorney General of the United States and to the Federal Alcohol Control Director.

The Attorney General and the Director, in written reports given me on January 22, which I hereby transmit to the Congress, suggest the necessity of amendatory legislation. I respectfully request the Congress to give its consideration to the suggestions contained in their reports.

I prefer to approve the act now, in its present form, and to ask the Congress for amendatory legislation rather than delay putting it into effect by returning it to the Congress for amendment, meanwhile postponing approval.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 24, 1934.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. BAILEY, indefinitely, on account of important business.

1784. Also, memorial of the citizens of the United States residing in the city of Long Branch, N.J., regarding the removal of restrictions to immigration as set forth in resolution; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

1785. Also, memorial of the Long Branch Teachers Association, Long Branch, N.J., favoring enactment of Senate bill 1944 as specified in resolution; to the Committtee on Agriculture.

1786. By Mr. SWICK: Petition of George T. Weingartner, 504 L. S. and T. Building, New Castle, Pa., and 4,769 residents of Beaver County, 3,242 residents of Lawrence County, and 2,253 residents of Butler County, all of the Twenty-sixth Congressional District of Pennsylvania, protesting against certain wrongful interference with their rights, under the Radio Act, which provides for the broadcasting of that which is in the public interest. The message of the true God, Jehovah, as expressed by Him in the prophecies of His word (the Bible) and as now being given to the people of this Nation by Judge Rutherford and others of Jehovah's witnesses is of interest to us. When broadcast it is convenient for us to hear it in our homes and is necessary for our welfare. The National Broadcasting Co., the Columbia Broadcasting Co., the Roman Catholic hierarchy, and others, have wrongfully by threats, coercion, and other improper influence prevented many stations from broadcasting this message of truth, thus depriving stations of legitimate income and depriving millions of American citizens of the privilege of hearing what they wish to hear; and against this wrongful action we vigorously protest. Exercising the right guaranteed to us by the Constitution of the United States, we therefore respectfully petition the Congress to act at once to safeguard the inherent rights of the American people relative to the radio; to the Committee on Merchant Marine, Radio, and Fisheries.

1787. By the SPEAKER: Petition of Charles Fornoy, regarding the operation of the National Industrial Recovery Act; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

1788. Also, petition of the Camp Fire Club of Chicago, Ill., regarding the continuance of the Biological Survey; to the Committee on Agriculture.

SENATE

THURSDAY, JANUARY 25, 1934

(Legislative day of Tuesday, Jan. 23, 1934)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

THE JOURNAL

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed a bill (H.R. 7199) making appropriations for the Navy Department and the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the Board of Supervisors of Milwaukee County, Wis., favoring extension of Federal unemployment relief under the Civil Works Administration from and after February 15, 1934, for such length of time as the economic condition of the country may require, and also the making of necessary appropriation therefor, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BARBOUR presented a resolution adopted by the United Women's Republican Clubs of Monmouth County, N.J., favoring the ratification of the World Court protocols, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. DUFFY presented the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

Joint resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States to amend the income-tax law, proving for a deduction of State income tax paid from Federal income tax

Whereas the present system of State and Federal incomes taxes results in double taxation for the citizens of many States; and

Whereas, such a system is not only unjust but unfair to such citizens: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the assembly, (the senate concurring), That the Legislature of Wisconsin respectfully memorializes the Congress of the United States to so amend its income tax law as to provide that all amounts paid for income tax under any State income tax law shall for the same year be deducted from amounts due the Federal Government under its Income Tax Act: Be it further

Resolved, That properly attested copies of this resolution be transmitted to both Houses of the Congress of the United States and to each Wisconsin Member thereof.

C. T. YOUNG,
Speaker of the Assembly.
JOHN J. SLOCUM,
Chief Clerk of the Assembly.
THOMAS J. O'MALLEY,
President of the Senate.
R. A. COBBAN,
Chief Clerk of the Senate.

A bill (S. 2491) granting a pension to Martha E. Burrell (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. STEIWER (by request):

A bill (S. 2492) to amend an act entitled "An act to maintain the credit of the United States Government", approved March 20, 1933 (Public Law No. 2, 73d Cong.), and an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934, and for other purposes", approved June 16, 1933 (Public Law No. 78, 73d Cong.); to the Committee on Finance.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED

The bill (H.R. 7199) making appropriations for the Navy Department and the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

USE OF CONVICT LABOR IN RUSSIAN LUMBER INDUSTRY

Mr. McNARY submitted a resolution (S.Res. 155), which was ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury is requested to transmit to the Senate immediately all information available with respect to Treasury Decision, dated January 24, 1934, which vacates Treasury Decision 44620, in which a finding was made that convict labor is used in the production of lumber and pulpwood in certain areas in European Russia.

AMERICAN BRANCH FACTORIES ABROAD (S.DOC. NO. 120)

Mr. STEPHENS. Mr. President, in response to Senate Resolution 138, adopted in the Seventy-second Congress, the Secretary of Commerce sent to the Senate on June 14, 1933, a report on United States producers with investments in foreign production, and it was referred to the Committee on Commerce. I present certain extracts from that report, and, as the Committee on Commerce have informed me that they have a great many requests for the information, I ask unanimous consent to have them printed as a Senate document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

NATIONAL GRANGE LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, in asking unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the legislative program of the National Grange, I desire to call attention of the Senate, and to urge every Member of the Senate, to give careful consideration to what the Grange has to say as to the needs of agriculture.

The plain fact is, Mr. President, that the relief legislation which we have enacted does not, or at least has not, solved the farm problem. I honestly believe it has been helpful in relieving some of the worst aspects of a situation that was, and to a very considerable extent still is, intolerable and highly dangerous to the future welfare of the country.

It is the announced aim of the Agricultural Adjustment Act to restore to agriculture pre-war purchasing power—frequently it is referred to as pre-war parity.

But right now the purchasing power of farm products, measured by prices received for those products, is only 70 percent of pre-war purchasing power, and at the same time the prices of the things the farmer buys are 115 to 120 percent of pre-war prices. We still have a long way to go.

I do not intend to discuss the farm problem at this time; but I do urge Senators to give it careful attention, and I suggest a careful study of the Grange program, a copy of which I send to the desk with the request for unanimous consent to have it printed as a part of my remarks and appropriately referred.

There being no objection, the matter was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NATIONAL GRANGE LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

1. AGRICULTURAL ADJUSTMENT ACT

The Agricultural Adjustment Act declares it to be the policy of Congress to reestablish and maintain the same price parity between agricultural and industrial commodities which obtained in the pre-war period. However, as the year 1933 drew to a close the average price level of farm products stood at only 71 percent of pre-war, as compared with 117 percent for industrial commodities, making a spread of 46 points to the disadvantage of agriculture. Justice and the national interest alike demand that all arbitrary and artificial price boosting in industry must stop until farm prices are brought to an equality with industrial prices. It is imperative that a sound and workable plan be devised to give financial assistance to the dairy and beef cattle industries during the present emergency.

2. MONETARY STABILIZATION

The Grange stands for an honest dollar, a dollar that will be fair to debtor and creditor alike. We are in favor of expanding the currency to such an extent as to reestablish the 1926 price level. The President has been given the power by Congress to use any one of several methods to bring about a rise in the commodity price level through controlled expansion. If the President's gold policy does not produce the desired results, we favor the adoption of a plan calling for the issuance of non-interest-bearing Treasury notes to the minimum extent of $5 per capita. To get this money into circulation, the Government would pay its obligations in currency until the general commodity price level reached 100. If prices should rise to 103, the currency would be redeemed by the issuance of bonds until the price level dropped back to 100. If it should fall as low as 97, currency would again be issued to bring about a rise in prices.

As an alternative, the Government should issue non-interest-bearing Treasury notes to pay at least a part of the Public Works program, liquidate the sound assets of closed banks, or to retire United States bonds within the $3,000,000,000 limit already prescribed by Congress. In the issuing of Treasury notes, it is essential to make definite provision for the redemption of such currency at a given rate per year.

3. TAXATION

Falsifying of records and juggling of tax statements is causing a large amount of property to escape its just share of the cost of government. We condemn every form of tax evasion, whether it be by the failure to list taxable property, the falsifying of income tax and other tax statements, the shifting of ownership to holding companies, or the common practice of large corporations of making two financial statements, one for taxation purposes and the other for rate making.

We favor increasing the income and inheritance tax rates in the higher brackets, especially upon high and excessive salary incomes and excessive corporation profits. The gift tax should be high enough to prevent evasions of the law. As a means of equalizing the burden of taxation, we favor the distribution of a portion of the proceeds of Federal income and inheritance taxes among the States on the basis of school requirements, or in some similarly equitable manner.

We reaffirm our vigorous opposition to the imposition of a general sales tax because such a tax ignores the principle of ability to pay and is a tax upon the necessities of the people.

We favor the appointment of a Federal commission to make a study of our whole system of taxation, Federal and State, with a view to securing better coordination and greater economy in the assessment and collection of taxes.

4. AGRICULTURAL CREDITS

Ample credit facilities under farmer control are essential to recovery. From the beginning, the farm loan system demonstrated its value to agriculture. The reorganized Farm Credit Administration has increased this service. The Grange advocates:

1. A reduction in interest rates on the part of agencies coming under the Farm Credit Administration.

2. That the Federal Farm Loan Act be so amended as to restore farmer control of the system.

3. That the rediscount privilege be extended to Federal land bank bonds in order to secure a lower interest rate.

4. Amendments to strengthen the local farm loan associations and increase their efficiency.

5. TARIFF POLICY

Following is an outline of the tariff policy adopted by the National Grange:

1. So long as the American protective policy is maintained, we favor such rates of import duty as will insure the American market to the American farmer upon farm commodities which can be produced advantageously in any part of our country.

2. Since it is well understood that producers of surplus crops receive no direct tariff benefits, equality and justice demand that import duties on commodities which the farmer must buy should be fixed at fair and reasonable levels.

3. We advocate that growers of crops of which we produce an exportable surplus shall be accorded equalized tariff benefits such as are proposed under the export debenture system.

4. Because the natural resources of the country should be wisely used and conserved for the benefit of this and succeeding generations, we affirm that it is contrary to sound public policy to impose tariffs for the protection of such resources as cannot be renewed when they are once exhausted.

5. In no case should tariff rates be granted which breed monopoly, enriching the few at the expense of the many, and which encourage inefficiency rather than efficiency in American industry.

6. We reaffirm the long-established policy of the Grange in demanding "tariff for all or tariff for none."

6. IMPORTED OILS AND FATS

It is manifestly unfair and economically unsound to restrict the production of dairy products in this country while permitting the free and unlimited importation of foreign oils and fats entering into competition with the products of American agriculture. We urge Congress and the administration to take the following steps:

1. Limit by law during the continuance of the present emergency the production of oleomargarine, and provide that no imported oil or fat shall be utilized in the manufacture of oleomargarine except where it can be shown that such use is necessary.

2. Limit and control by statute all imports of oils and fats, whether edible or inedible, by licensing such imports; permitting imports only in the case of proved necessity, and imposing an internal revenue tax upon the first domestic sale of imported oils and fats.

7. MOTOR TRANSPORTATION

We approve of the appropriations made by the Federal Government for highway construction. The Grange believes that the time has come when more consideration should be given to the improvement of farm-to-market and post roads. Following is an outline of the position assumed by the Grange regarding various proposals for further legislation to regulate and tax motor vehicles:

1. The interest and safety of the public require enforcement of proper restrictions regarding the size, weight, and speed of all vehicles moving over the public highway.

2. Such regulations should be uniform as between the several States, and there should be reciprocity between the States, based on such uniformity.

3. The power to regulate is a police power lodged with the States. As a basis for regulation, we commend to all the States adoption of the uniform code for the regulation of traffic approved by the American Association of State Highway Officials and the United States Bureau of Public Roads.

4. With respect to highway taxation, each motor vehicle should be taxed its fair share of the cost of the highways which it uses. The State should be the sole taxing agency.

5. Every special tax collected for highway improvement should be conserved for that purpose alone. Consequently no gasoline tax diversion should be permitted.

6. No taxation or regulation of motor vehicles should be permitted which has for its purpose any increase in cost or restriction in use, in order to equalize competition between motor transportation and other forms of transportation.

8. RAILROADS

The Grange believes that economies of operation making possible lower transportation rates can be advanced by further consolidation of railroads. Railroads should cooperate to reduce competitive expenses; unnecessary services should be abandoned; metropolitan terminals should be consolidated, and circuitous haulage should be eliminated. We believe that the railroads should be permitted to engage in motor transportation, and we favor the elimination of some of the restrictions on railroads which were necessary when they had a monopoly of land transportation.

9. INLAND WATERWAYS

We are in favor of the development and improvement of inland waterways, when practicable and economically sound, for the promotion of our foreign and domestic commerce. The Lakes-to-the-sea canal should be built. With the return of normal economic conditions this waterway, as well as other systems of water transportation, will be needed.

10. LAND POLICY

We believe immediate steps should be taken to formulate a more comprehensive policy with reference to land utilization, and we recommend:

1. The remnants of the public domain should not be turned over to the States, but there should be provisions for a better consolidation of Federal and State holdings as an aid to improved administration of public lands.

2. There should be no expenditure of public funds for the development of new irrigation and reclamation projects until there is evident need for additional agricultural land. Sound policy demands that if, under prevailing conditions, new land is brought into cultivation at public expense, the Government should purchase and retire from agricultural production a greater amount of submarginal land.

3. The forestry laws of State and Nation should be so broadened as to permit the purchase of submarginal agricultural land, whether suitable for forest purposes, recreational uses, or game preserves.

4. Erosion, flood control, and kindred problems should be given proper consideration in the development of a program for the better utilization of land.

5. We recommend that increasing attention be given to soil conservation as a permanent national policy, and that a reasonable share of the money expended in connection with the national recovery program be devoted to strengthening the soil survey programs of the Federal Government and the several States.

11. AGRICULTURAL EXTENSION

We favor appropriations that will be adequate to maintain the efficiency of the Agricultural Extension Service. We recommend that the Smith-Lever Act be so amended as to forbid direct or indirect contributions to the Extension Service on the part of private citizens, chambers of commerce, farm organizations, or similar groups, so that extension workers shall be paid entirely from public funds, leaving them free to serve the people without favoritism or discrimination.

12. VOCATIONAL EDUCATION

The Grange believes that the modest appropriations made by the Federal Government for the support of vocational education represent an investment paying substantial dividends, and we favor the continuance of these appropriations.

13. BOVINE TUBERCULOSIS

With a surplus of dairy products on hand the Grange advocates adequate Federal appropriations for the eradication of bovine tuberculosis, both as a measure for reducing the surplus and to protect the public health.

14. RURAL MAIL SERVICE

We believe that the adoption of the contract system, as advocated in some quarters, would be detrimental to the rural-delivery system. We are opposed to such a move, or any other step that would in any way endanger, hinder, or interfere with the regular or efficient distribution of mail to rural communities. We favor restoration of the 2-cent rate on first-class matter.

15. PURE FOOD AND DRUGS ACT

Twenty-seven years of experience in the administration of the Pure Food and Drugs Act have shown its great value, besides disclosing certain inadequacies to control present-day abuses. We favor amending the act in the following respects:

1. Providing penalties for false advertising in newspapers, periodicals, and over the radio.

2. The inclusion of cosmetics. Serious injuries have been caused by the sale and use of harmful cosmetics.

3. Forbidding false remedial claims for drugs and remedies. At present the Government, in prosecuting violators of the act in this connection, is required to prove that the defendant knew the claims to be false, which has naturally been a serious handicap to proper enforcement.

4. Legal standards are necessary for the effective regulation of the traffic in processed foods.

5. Requiring that labels of foods and drugs disclose sufficient facts to enable intelligent buying.

16. CONTROL OF LIQUOR TRAFFIC

The repeal of the eighteenth amendment brings us face to face once more with the difficult and vexatious question of attempting to control and regulate the traffic in intoxicating liquor. The position of the Grange on this question is summarized as follows:

1. We oppose the sale of intoxicants in the immediate vicinity of churches, schools, and colleges.

2. We are opposed to the return of the saloon or the importation of foreign liquors.

3. We oppose the advertising of intoxicants over the radio, in newspapers or magazines, and in moving-picture theaters.

4. The element of profit should be eliminated as much as possible from the manufacture, distribution, and sale of intoxicants.

5. We favor the adoption of adequate measures by the Government to protect dry States from the shipment of intoxicating liquor across their borders from wet territory.

6. We are opposed to excessive taxes on liquor, since excessive taxation would encourage bootlegging, official corruption, and general violation of the law.

7. We recommend that Granges throughout the land join with other organizations in promoting a campaign of education calling attention to the evil effects of strong drink, exposing the fallacy of the idea that any nation can drink its way to prosperity, and emphasizing the truth that decency and sobriety are virtues that bring their own reward.

17. MOTION-PICTURE REGULATION

Federal regulation of the production of motion pictures entering into interstate commerce is necessary in order to protect public morals and establish higher standards.

18. REGISTRATION OF ALIENS

We favor legislation requiring that all aliens be registered by the Federal Government and compelled to pay a registration fee of from $5 to $10. Those who fail to become naturalized within a period of 10 years should be deported. The Grange opposes any weakening of the present immigration laws.

19. CONGRESSIONAL REPRESENTATION

We favor an amendment to the Constitution that will exclude aliens from being counted in determining the basis of population for representation in Congress.

20. BANKING

We approve the provisions of the Banking Act of 1933 providing for the safeguarding of accounts of depositors, regulating interbank control, and forbidding the undue diversion of funds for speculative purposes. We especially favor that feature of the act guaranteeing deposits, and we shall vigorously oppose any movement which may be made for its repeal.

21. TRUTH IN FABRICS

We favor legislation for truth in fabrics, both for the benefit of agriculture and for the protection of the consumer.

22. WORLD PEACE

The Grange earnestly advocates that the Government of the United States should continue to exert its best efforts to promote peace and good will among nations. Since disarmament on a purely national basis is not practicable, we cherish the hope that our Government may use its best endeavors to bring about reduction in armaments on an international scale. In the event of war, we favor the conscription of wealth as well as man power.

23. WORLD COURT

We reaffirm our endorsement of the World Court, with reservations sufficient to assure protection to the rights and interests of the United States.

VETERANS' COMPENSATION—STATEMENT OF EDWARD A. HAYES

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, a few days ago Mr. Edward A. Hayes, the national commander of the American Legion, issued a statement which is of considerable interest to those of us who are dealing with the subject of veterans' compensation. The statement is short, and I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Any impression that the American Legion will discontinue its fight for the service disabled is erroneous.

The first point in our program is that all compensation cuts to actually service disabled be immediately restored.

The Legion warned that the Economy Act would cut the war maimed. Successive admissions by action of Congress and by changes of regulations have made it apparent that "the Economy Act cut too deeply." The Legion has made an intensive study to determine how the benefits taken from the disabled can be restored with justice to the veteran and the Government.

General Hines estimates that changed regulations, issued yesterday, restore $9,250,000 to service-disabled World War victims. This action fails to restore $57,124,000 of the payments made to such victims prior to March 20, 1933. Everyone agreed prior to, at the time of, and after passage of the Economy Act that economies were not required and should not be made at the expense of the service-disabled veteran. Sad experience since March 1933 discloses that such economies were made and that administrative regulations have but partially restored them.

The public should know that the new regulations as issued do not restore to the rolls a single service-disabled World War veteran who was cut off by operation of the Economy Act.

Neither do these regulations restore any hospital treatments not heretofore authorized by administrative instruction.

Therefore the regulations just issued do not adequately cover points 1 and 2 of the Legion's program.

The Legion feels that it should be written into the basic law: That payments to the service disabled must be restored; that this action should not be left to mere regulations, with instructions pertaining thereto hinging upon the judgment of individuals whose interpretation since March 1933 have left thousands of service disabled without deserved payments.

At least 20,000 cases, many of whom are insane or tubercular, are left without payment of any kind as the result of the action at the hands of the special boards of review. For 12 years, in most of those cases, the Government has admitted that their unfortunate condition was attributable to their service in the World War. Veterans' Administration procedure—the instructions interpreting regulations under the Economy Act—left thousands of the most appealing cases in position where they really had no chance for their day in court. Certainly no government to which a defender gave his mind or his lungs should abandon such defender. The Legion believes that every American citizen would agree, if they understood, that these sacred charges should be restored to the rolls immediately and be removed only in the event the Government can show that their condition was not due to their service.

As to hospitalization the regulations issued Friday provide no additional hospital benefits except transportation. This may or may not make possible the use of beds now empty in many existing Federal hospital facilities. Experience discloses that unless written into basic law that empty beds can be used by veterans needing hospitalization unable to provide it for themselves, but those beds may still remain empty.

The new regulations provide nothing for widows and orphans of World War veterans dying of nonservice disability no matter how great their need. The Legion believes that the policy of this Government heretofore adopted and still adhered to as to widows and orphans of other wars should by law apply without discrimination to like classes of World War veteran dependents.

"LEE, THE MAN"—ADDRESS BY SENATOR BYRD

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I ask that a radio address delivered by the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD] on January 19, the anniversary of the birthday of Robert E. Lee, be printed in the RECORD. The address is on the subject "Lee, the Man."

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The National Broadcasting Co. has done me the honor to ask me to speak on Lee, the man, on this the one hundred and twenty-seventh birthday of Robert Edward Lee.

I prefer to speak on Lee the man rather than to speak on Lee the military commander, for, great as he was as a military chieftain, he was nobler as a great gentleman.

Theodore Roosevelt estimated General Lee as the greatest of all the great captains the English-speaking people had produced; but Woodrow Wilson found Robert Edward Lee to be one of the noblest of men. And Wilson distinguished nobility from mere greatness in that a man may be great and yet selfish, whereas he must spend his greatness in unselfish service if he is to win the title of nobility. Said Mr. Wilson, "He is noble in our popular conception only when he goes outside the narrow circle of self-interest and begins to spend himself for the interest of mankind." And it was this very spending of himself for others that Wilson found characteristic of Robert E. Lee.

Let us recall two great decisions of Lee's life that demonstrate his great nobility. One was when he determined to secede with his courageous State at the beginning of the war, and the other was when he decided to suffer with his defeated State at the end of the war.

In April 1861 Robert Edward Lee was a colonel in the United States Army. He had been an honor student at West Point. He had been superintendent of West Point. He had won reputation and glory in the Mexican War. He had married the great-granddaughter of the wife of George Washington, and with her had come to him stately Arlington, seated pleasantly above the Potomac, overlooking the Capital of the Nation. Here was Colonel Lee in the April of 1861, riding each day between the War Department and his Virginia home. His friends were in the United States Army; his deepest loyalties were there; his career and future were there. But Southern States were seceding, one after the other. President Lincoln was determined to prevent their secession, and the red tide of war was floating nearer to the National Capital each day. Lee had to decide, and decide soon, whether he would obey the voice of Virginia when she called him to defend her or whether he would invade her and fight his own kin at the order of the President of the United States; and then in that moment of dire decision President Lincoln offered him command of the armies of the United States.

Handsome, strong, trained to make war, here was an opportunity to lead a great army of a great country to a victory that would make him the appointed and exalted savior of the Union. His fortune would be made, his home would be safe, his family would be prosperous and protected. On the other hand, if he followed Virginia out of the Union, his home, his Arlington he loved, would become forfeit to the enemy. He would be reviled as a traitor. His family must leave home and wander south; and if he lost, both life and reputation might perish in disaster.

But Lee did not hesitate. He had been taught that his first loyalty was to his State. His own father had exclaimed, "Virginia is my country; her will I obey." One of his textbooks at West Point taught the right of secession; and, besides, the chivalrous Lee could not bring himself to wage war on his own people, his own kindred, his own State, even though he opposed among his own people secession to the limit. The decision pressed upon him has been called the choice of Hercules. He made the difficult decision and took the hard road away from Arlington, to Richmond, where he accepted command of Virginia's gathering volunteers, solemnly promised that he would draw his sword only in defense of his native State.

For 4 years war was flagrant. Lee sometimes rode the high tide of victory; again suffered the agony of defeat; shared the tragedy and tears of his people; and came at least with a few ill-fed, exhausted men to surrender Appomattox.

And then again power and riches were offered him, a good salary as the head of a house to promote southern commerce, an estate in England. Tempters offered rewards for the mere use of his name at the head of their businesses. Quietly, he said that his name was not for sale; and so he came at last to Washington College at $1,500 per year. For 5 years he taught the young men he had led in battle to do their duty in peace.

Though he made war magnificently, his Supreme Captain was ever the Prince of Peace; and when that Captain called him, he went to that eternal reward reserved for those who love God; and the trumpets of the angels who welcome heroes proclaimed that a noble gentleman had come home. He died loving the divided sections into peace.

UNITED STATES MONETARY SYSTEM

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 6976) to protect the currency system of the United States, to provide for the better use of the monetary gold stock of the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. HASTINGS obtained the floor.

Mr. LEWIS. I suggest the absence of a quorum and ask for a roll call.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Costigan	Johnson	Reynolds
Ashurst	Couzens	Kean	Robinson, Ark.
Austin	Cutting	Keyes	Robinson, Ind.
Bachman	Davis	King	Russell
Bailey	Dieterich	La Follette	Schall
Bankhead	Dill	Lewis	Sheppard
Barbour	Duffy	Logan	Shipstead
Barkley	Erickson	Lonergan	Smith
Black	Fess	McAdoo	Steiwer
Bone	Fletcher	McCarran	Stephens
Borah	Frazier	McGill	Thomas, Utah
Brown	George	McKellar	Thompson
Bulkley	Gibson	McNary	Townsend
Bulow	Glass	Murphy	Trammell
Byrd	Goldsborough	Neely	Tydings
Byrnes	Gore	Norris	Vandenberg
Capper	Hale	Nye	Van Nuys
Caraway	Harrison	O'Mahoney	Wagner
Carey	Hastings	Overton	Walcott
Clark	Hatch	Patterson	Walsh
Connally	Hatfield	Pittman	Wheeler
Coolidge	Hayden	Pope	White
Copeland	Hebert	Reed

Mr. LEWIS. I am advised that the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] is detained in the State of Louisiana on politically important and official business.

I regret to have to announce that the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS] is still detained by illness. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. HEBERT. I desire to announce that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON], the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF], and the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK] are necessarily absent from the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Ninety-one Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, I should like to request in the first instance that I be not interrupted in my discussion of the pending bill. When I shall have finished, if any Senator desires to ask any questions about what I have said I shall undertake to answer as best I can.

Sometime ago some professor undertook to give to the public a list of persons who, in his opinion, know something about the question of money. My recollection is that the number was something less than 20. That constitutes the ratio of 1 person having knowledge of money to about 6,000,000 who do not know about it. I do not recall that the celebrated list included a single Member of the House of Representatives or of the United States Senate, and, so far as I now recall, it did not include a single person in the Treasury Department. I have no complaint because my own name was not included, because if anybody had confidence in the list it would have been immediately destroyed.

Those of us who are anxious to find out about the bill have read with some care the testimony that was taken before the Finance Committee. The witnesses before that committee, as I recall it, numbered something like 15 who were opposed to the bill to 2 who were in favor of it. An explanation was made yesterday as to the reason for that unusual proportion. The senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] stated:

> It was all brought to the committee largely upon the suggestion of those who either oppose the proposed legislation altogether or who desire to amend it, whereas the proponents of the bill desired to get the bill out on the floor here and did not undertake or desire to delay its consideration in the committee by bringing a lot of witnesses to Washington.

That is the only excuse we have for not having more reason in the record for the passage of the bill. That reminds me of the great care and consideration the bill had in the House of Representatives. From newspaper reports we get the information that the time allotted for the consideration of the bill was but 3 hours. As I thought it over and tried to find out what it was all about it seemed to me that I might say without exaggeration that if there were a proposition before some respectable council of some city of this Nation whereby it were proposed to reduce the dog tax from $1 to 60 cents or to 50 cents it would have received more consideration than the bill received in the House. Certainly if the proposal had been to give to the mayor of that city the right to determine whether the dog tax should be $1 or whether it should be reduced to 60 cents or to 50 cents, depending upon the prevalence of dogs in the community, the city council would have given it more than 3 hours' consideration, because under our democratic form of government we are inclined to discuss important things before we attempt action upon them.

But regardless of the evidence, regardless of how much one may study it—I might illustrate it by saying study it as jurors—we all know definitely that the great judge who has charge of it has already given instructions to return a verdict in favor of the administration. So, as the distinguished senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] said yesterday, "In view of that, what is the use?"

As I proceed to a consideration of the bill I am reminded of that provision of the Constitution that the Congress itself is given the important power of coining money and fixing the value thereof, and in the same identical paragraph is the further provision, "and shall fix the standard of weights and measures." As I tried to find out what this is all about, I may say that while the illustration may be considered somewhat of an exaggeration, it seems to me it is not unreasonable to suggest that the Congress itself might just as well give to the President of the United States the right to change the weights and measures of the land, so as to provide, if you please, that 2 pecks shall constitute a bushel, that 2 quarts shall constitute a gallon, that 50 pounds shall constitute a hundredweight.

I think if it were in time of war it would not be unreasonable to suggest that when that is done by the Congress, one half of all the grain that is measured, all the liquor in the country that is put up in gallons, all the milk that is sold by the quart or by the gallon, shall go to the Government under some such scheme. What would be the excuse? It is not exaggerating because if we assume a condition of war, and if this be a condition of war and it were necessary to conserve the food of the country, we might as well be asked to give to the President of the United States this power and we might at the same time declare that the Government has gotten a great profit because we have reduced the weights and measures by 40 to 50 percent.

But, Mr. President, in connection with this discussion we have heard much about what shall be lost by the Federal Reserve Board if the Government takes all the gold. An argument was had yesterday that the Federal Reserve Board got this money because of the authority it has from the Government which created the Federal Reserve bank, plus its careful management of it. But I am not so much concerned about what happens to the Federal Reserve Board as I am concerned about the poor old woman who has saved some money with which to bury herself. She wanted to be certain she would have the right kind of money, particularly with an administration that was constantly leaving us in doubt as to what kind of money we might have when death comes to her. She has carefully taken this money and put it away from time to time until she has accumulated $200 in gold. What happens to her?

She is ordered under penalty to give it up to the Federal Reserve Board. Why is it to be given up? Because it is said it is needed in trade, it is needed in commerce, it is needed for the purpose of trade and commerce, and so she must give up her gold and turn it over to the Federal Reserve Board. When she takes it to the Federal Reserve Board what does she get for it? She does not get a gold certificate. What she may have had may have been a gold certificate, but she had to give that up. She must give up this gold and take money which ultimately may become real phoney money and not money that has very much of purchasing value.

I am thinking, too, about the boy 15 years old whose grandfather has given him a $20 gold piece every birthday since he was born until he has collected $300 in gold. That has a real value to him more than any value the Government could place upon it because it has a sentiment back of it. But that boy has been ordered, under the penalty of being declared a felon and under the charge that if he does not do it he is not patriotic, to give up that gold to the Federal Reserve Board.

How much did this all amount to between March 6, 1933, and December 31, 1933? We find $831,000,000 of this kind of money being delivered to the Federal Reserve Board. If we are going to take it from the Federal Reserve Board, I say that we must not under any circumstances forget how many thousands and millions of citizens there are from whom we are taking it because of the duress in the Executive orders that compel them to give it up.

But, Mr. President, this bill is here, and we must consider it and pass upon it. I know that nobody expects me to vote for it because it is an administration bill. I hope I may escape the charge of being opposed to it because it is an administration bill.

I desire in the first place to call attention to the fact that this is not an emergency measure. The argument, so often impressed upon us in the last 10 or 11 months, that the administration is in a war with the depression and patriotism demands we give it support, does not apply to this bill. This legislation is not only permanent in character but revolutionary in purpose. It is much more dangerous than the proposal of Mr. Bryan in 1896, and it is proposed by an administration that won its election upon a platform that declared, "We advocate a sound currency to be preserved at all hazards."

Can it be claimed that this bill lives up to that platform? The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] yesterday tried to find out whether or not the bill had inflation as its background, whether there was real inflation in it. He was anxious to find that out, because, as I understood him, if the bill was inflationary in its character, and carried enough inflation with it, he was in favor of it. On the other hand, I am afraid there is inflation in the bill, and I am opposed to it. Neither he nor I knows which is its character, and we did not find out in all of the discussion yesterday.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HEBERT in the chair). The Senator from Delaware said he preferred not to be interrupted during the course of his remarks.

Mr. WHEELER. I beg pardon.

Mr. HASTINGS. What is this bill, Mr. President? It is the same kind of measure and the same kind of policy that has been followed since the 4th of last March, leaving the public and the world in general uncertain as to what is going to happen. When the bill comes here—an important bill like this, prepared by the administration itself—we of the Senate are still uncertain. The distinguished Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], who has had the longest career in the Senate—a great lawyer, known the world over—is uncertain what it means, and he was not able to find out yesterday by his inquiry from the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY].

In my judgment, the bill violates two important provisions of the Constitution, in that Congress undertakes to delegate to the President its own duty and responsibility with respect to coining money and fixing the value thereof; and, secondly, it undertakes to legalize robbery by taking certainly this $813,000,000, if not that which belongs to the Federal Reserve Board; by taking property of our citizens without due process of law, and without just compensation.

In addition to that, it destroys the gold base for our circulating currency, builds up a huge central political banking system within the Government, and gives to one man the complete control of the enormous sum of $2,000,000,000 to be known as a "stabilization fund", a fund clearly intended for use in speculation in foreign exchange. One unfortunate provision with respect to this fund, as I see it, is that neither the President nor the Secretary of the Treasury is required to give any information to the public with respect to it until 3 years and 3 months after the law becomes effective, and that happens to be about 3 months after the present term of the President expires.

CENTRAL BANKING

I think it must be admitted that the present administration has definitely decided to create a huge central banking system which shall be controlled by the Government. In the first place, it seizes all of the gold of the Nation, permitting a small and necessary portion to be used for the arts and sciences, and makes it a part of the Federal assets.

The Federal Reserve bank is to be so crippled by this legislation that it will be of little or no value in the future. Indeed, I anticipate that within a short time we shall have recommendations to abolish it altogether.

But that is not all. Does anybody doubt but that there is great significance in the effort of the administration, through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, to invest huge sums of money in the thousands of banks of the land? The insistence of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation has been so compelling that many banks have felt it wise to sell to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation preferred stock when they had no earthly use for the money it received in return. I am certain that I am not exaggerating when I say that up to within a week or more ago 5,300 banks had sold preferred stock, and the Reconstruction Finance Corporation had invested, approximately $900,000,000 of the public money. Well-informed people who are close to certain members of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation inform me that it is the determination that within 2 or 3 more months there will be 5,000 more banks selling to them preferred stock, and they boast that when this is finished there will be a further investment of the Government funds of $500,000,000. I understand this is about 80 percent of all the banks in the land.

How many of these banks will be under the direct control of the Government no man can now estimate, but all of us know enough about human nature to realize that this huge investment in preferred stock in 80 percent of the banks, gives to the Government a tremendous influence with them, if not absolute control.

But if there be any doubt about these two things being entirely sufficient to centralize the banking of the Nation in Washington, and under the direct control of the Government, let us examine the next important request of the administration. It is proposed by this act:

SEC. 10. (a) For the purpose of stabilizing the exchange value of the dollar, the Secretary of the Treasury, directly or through such agencies as he may designate, is authorized, for the account of the fund established in this section, to deal in gold and foreign exchange and such other instruments of credit and securities as he may deem necessary to carry out the purpose of this section.

Provision is made for establishing a fund of $2,000,000,000, and in the second paragraph we find this further authorization:

The fund shall be available for expenditure, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, and in his discretion, for any purpose in connection with carrying out the provisions of this section, including the investment and reinvestment in direct obligations of the United States of any portions of the fund which the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, may from time to time determine are not currently required for stabilizing the exchange value of the dollar. The proceeds of all sales and investments and all earnings and interest accruing under the operation of this section shall be paid into the fund and shall be available for the purposes of the fund.

It is a little difficult to grasp the meaning of $2,000,000,000. Somebody has recently illustrated it by showing that there has only been about one billion of minutes of time passed since the birth of Christ. I was so impressed with that statement that I calculated to see whether it was correct, and I found it to be, approximately. That means, then, that at one time, in one act, we turn over to one man a sum of money that equals $2 a minute for the past 1,933 years. Does anybody doubt but that this action of ours, turning over the gold to the Treasury, giving to the Secretary $2,000,000,000 to spend for the purpose I have mentioned, and then having the Reconstruction Finance Corporation subscribing nearly a billion and a half dollars for stock in 80 percent of the banks, definitely places in Washington and under governmental and political control the greatest bank centralization the world has ever known?

The danger of such a banking system is well stated in an editorial of the New York Herald Tribune, under date of January 23, the latter part of which I quote as follows:

Apart from the risk of such abuses as those which occurred in France in its post-war inflation period, due to the domination of the bank by the Government, there are other serious dangers in a government-controlled bank of issue. A change in the rediscount rate, for example, or the proposal to indulge in open-market operations, may be calculated to benefit one group and be unwelcome to another. Such operations obviously should be conducted by persons with the interest of the country as a whole at heart; but, if the Government has a controlling influence over the bank, there is always the threat that central-bank policy will be dictated not for the common good but in the interest of the group that is politically most powerful.

It is interesting to note that England, with its acknowledged fine tradition of central banking, has a central bank over which the Government has no control whatsoever. It is equally interesting to note that the only important central banks in the world that are arms of the government are to be found in Communist Russia and in Fascist Italy and Germany.

SMALL INVESTORS

I wonder if it be true, as contended by many, that the act of devaluing the American dollar by reducing the gold content by 50 percent will have no bad effect upon any of us. I have particularly in mind the savings funds, the insurance policies, and widows and others who are living on the income of small investments.

I should like to know what the position is of the Government employee, for instance, who has had his position for 20 to 30 years, but who has never been able to get pay of more than $2,500 a year. It has not been possible for him to raise his family and to save much, if anything, for the future. We find, however, as a comparatively young man he undertook to provide against this situation by taking out a $5,000 life-insurance policy. By careful economy he has been able to pay the premiums, and he paid in premiums what were equal to gold dollars at the time. He is met in the first instance with a reduction in salary and with the determination on the part of the administration to increase the price of the commodities which he buys. One of the purposes of devaluing the dollar, as I understand it, is to make these commodity prices increase more rapidly.

Finally, the time comes for the payment by the insurance company of this $5,000. Has the insured got what he bargained for, namely, $5,000 in gold coins, containing 25.08 grains of standard gold, or has he got a different kind of money, the United States currency which he can transfer, which his widow can use as she sees fit, but which she cannot change for gold? She can invest it and maybe get an annual return of $250 of the same kind of money, but what this man is concerned about is whether she will be able to purchase $250 of the necessities of life, or whether the equivalent will be only $125.

I suppose the answer to that is that sometime during this 20 or 30 years commodity prices have been as high as it is expected this bill will cause them to rise, and therefore the widow will be as well off as she would have been if the man had died during a period of high prices.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, is it the contention of the Senator that the enactment of this bill will result in raising commodity prices?

Mr. HASTINGS. No; it is not.

Mr. NORRIS. Then it seems to me the Senator's illustration does not apply.

Mr. HASTINGS. I am talking about what is contended by the proponents of the bill.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator is talking about the widow and the employee whose money will not be of value afterward because they will have to pay more for commodities.

Mr. HASTINGS. I hope the Senator will not insist upon my getting into a discussion with him about that, because, as I said when I began my address, I prefer not to be interrupted.

Mr. NORRIS. I did not hear the Senator make that request, and I beg his pardon.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, the American people have heretofore believed that there was a stability about the value of the gold dollar that would permit the widow whom I have described to pass through the high-commodity-price period because she had saved something of her small income when the commodity prices were low; but the removal of 50 percent of the basic value of the dollar so that it cannot at any time be worth more than 50 percent in a world market leaves the position of persons who have depended upon their insurance policies and their savings funds to take care of their families in the future in a position where they can never profit and can never save during the period when the commodities are low, because under the theory of this bill there will be no such period again.

This same illustration can be made with respect to the millions of people having deposits in savings banks and the millions of people who are living on the income of small investments.

My recollection of the testimony of Professor Warren is that he said that he knows prices will rise, but that the enactment of this measure becomes necessary to save the insurance company. He gave us an illustration of making an examination of one of his own insurance policies, and the principal reason he gave for being in favor of this bill was that he was afraid that unless we did enact some such legislation his widow would not be paid the $5,000 at all.

As I see it, the social results of this bill are hideous. It is a moral degradation of repudiation of a covenant by the Government with its people. We shall later see the cruel effect of stimulated and sustained speculation by wiser citizens whose plunder comes from the ignorant and the poor. Self-denial and thrift are penalized. The economic effect is just the opposite of what is intended. It concentrates wealth instead of diffusing it. It will ultimately impoverish the whole people. As wages and salaries rise more slowly than prices, these classes will suffer in favor of equity holders of stock. The insurance policy, savings bank, and other bank deposits, and all small investors, which in total comprise the majority of the creditors, will lose. The fact that it will help the debtor, if it be a fact, will not overcome these severe penalties upon others.

GOLD BASE GONE

And I should like to inquire here whether we have not wholly destroyed the basic value of even the new 50-cent dollar? Everybody has felt a certain security about our currency because it had gold and silver for its base. As I understand it, it is contended that the mere transfer of the gold to the Treasury of the United States does not in any sense change the gold base of our currency; I do not see how it may be argued that the $5,000 paid by the life-insurance company is just as valuable as it ever was because it has the same number of dollars in it, when it is remembered that under no circumstances can the owner of that $5,000 have it transferred into gold dollars of even a 50-cent value. The mere fact that gold is held in the Treasury of the United States under a law which prohibits any citizen from getting it does not to my mind add any strength to the currency of the Nation, except as the possession of that much gold adds to the general assets of the Nation. In other words, under this plan, the currency of the Nation is dependent solely upon the credit of the Nation. The only difference between gold as a part of the assets and any other property owned by the Government is that the one has certain value in the world market while the other has not.

Some people apparently get much satisfaction out of this proposed legislation because they assume that it makes the printing of greenbacks under the act of May 12, last, unnecessary and, therefore, the country is safe from the danger and the humiliation of issuing money that has nothing back of it but the credit of the Government. For my part I get no such satisfaction out of it. In the first place, the authority to issue greenbacks is still in the act, and just as certain as we continue to increase our public debt, the President will be compelled to take advantage of the authority thus given him. But, for my part, I cannot see that printing-press money is not as valuable as any other currency will be when this act becomes the law of the land.

Indeed, if we had continued our present monetary system whereby gold was the base for the circulating currency, there was some chance for persons receiving greenbacks to have them ultimately made good, because of the provision in the law for the retirement at the rate of 4 percent annually. If this had been done and we could have confined this inflation to this one act, we could in 25 years retire all of the $3,000,000,000 of printing-press money and have it once more back of us. What we have done now, except for that money which has silver for its base, is to put it all on a par with printing-press money. Those advocating that kind of money can very well declare when this bill becomes a law that "we have met the enemy and they are ours."

I do not see how those persons who believe that merely because an American dollar will purchase a dollar's worth of goods in the American market, and therefore that it is wholly immaterial whether you can turn it into gold or whether you cannot, can at the same time argue that the currency in existence after the passage of this bill is better than the ordinary greenback because the Treasury of the United States has a huge volume of gold bullion in its Treasury. You must either depend upon the gold bullion as a base for our present currency, with an opportunity of the owner of the currency exchanging it when he desires, or you must admit that the value of the currency of the Nation is dependent solely upon the credit of the Nation.

GOLD STABILIZATION

It is proposed by this act to set up a stabilization fund of $2,000,000,000—to deal in gold and foreign exchange and such other instruments of credit and securities as he may deem necessary—

And so forth.

If all the money is not required for that purpose, the Secretary of the Treasury can, with the approval of the President, use the fund for—any purpose in connection with carrying out the provisions of this section, including the investment and reinvestment in direct obligations of the United States.

While this fund is called a stabilization fund, it is not too much to say that to carry it out is to conduct a gigantic form of speculation. The power of the Secretary of the Treasury to speculate in gold, foreign exchange, and other instruments of credit and securities is limited only by the amount of the fund.

That part of the fund that is not used for this purpose may, with the consent of the President, be used for "rigging" the market in Government bonds. Through Senate investigations it has been developed that one of the favorite means of successful speculations is "rigging" the market. Those who participated in it have been roundly condemned by the public press and by the people generally. But right in the midst of it, and before we have forgotten the huge sums of money lost by the poor and ignorant investor by this means of speculation, we are asked to create a fund that will permit the Government itself, through its Secretary of the Treasury, to conduct this sort of gambling. This comes, too, right on the heels of the condemnation by the President of the United States of the "money changers", he having declared with much force "that they must be driven out of the temple."

But aside and apart from what may be considered the morals of the situation, let us view it from a practical point of view and see whether it is likely to be helpful to the average person in America.

I think it may be truthfully said that when a Government goes speculating, it gets the worst of it in every case. We are about to go into the most gigantic speculation on currencies. In that bed are all the private speculators in the world and many other governments. This fund is left in the hands of one man, Mr. Morgenthau, who does not even claim to know the intricacies of that game. Let us see whether this is for the common people or whether it is in the interest of the big speculator.

In my judgment, this is the most gigantic relief of speculators ever known in history. The effect of the use of the stabilization fund to hold relative values at present levels will be that the Government will enable every speculator to realize in cash the profits of his recent speculation in money.

Let me give an illustration of what I have in mind.

Before the 4th of March, every shrewd speculator knew that the President intended to devalue or tinker with the dollar. All of us knew that, and we were afraid. The President's inaugural address reassured no one. This general knowledge resulted in a run of gold and flight of capital. This had much to do with the bank failures. It has been estimated that somewhere between one and three billion dollars in American money is in refuge abroad. Aside from direct flight, exporters have left their money abroad, and interest payments to the United States have been held abroad. This money was mostly in flight or held at relative currency values much lower than at present.

Take the illustration of the speculator who, on January 30, 1933, concluded to invest $10,000,000 of American money in British pounds. The British pound was selling at that time at $3.37, and he, therefore, acquired £2,967,000 for his American money. He would like to bring the money home now when the dollar will still purchase about 90 percent of what it would have purchased last February, but he finds that he is not the only speculator who did the same thing. There are many more of them, the total amount being something over a billion dollars. If they all tried to bring their dollars home, they would overcrowd the exchange and lose part or all of their profit, but if they can get the Secretary of the Treasury to stabilize the exchange for them so that they can get for their pound its present price of $5.10 instead of $3.37, the original cost, the man who invested the ten million can make a profit of $5,131,000.

Why should not such a speculator be interested in seeing this $2,000,000,000 fund created?

What he did in shipping his money abroad in January of last year was performing no service to his country, but, on the contrary, was aiding in the bank panic when he shipped it. If left alone, he is in the position of the bear operator who has to get his money home the best way he can. He became a bear operator against the best interest of his country. He cannot realize a profit until he can get his money back here.

In the name of stabilization, this bill asks us to help him.

In addition to this, does anybody believe Mr. Morgenthau can beat the British at the game of exchange?

And what about the effect this stabilization fund will have upon the bonds of the country? Who will know whether the quoted price for bonds represents the real price or whether it is a price that is being made by this stabilization fund in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury? We shall not be given the privilege of knowing how much of this fund is invested in these bonds. We shall not know whether they are going to sell bonds or buy bonds. To my mind, it makes for confusion and not for stability.

SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY—EXCLUSIVE CONTROL

Let us take another view of this fund and the way it is to be expended and see whether it ought to receive our approval. The bill provides for paying into the Treasury the sum of $2,000,000,000, which shall be "under the exclusive control of the Secretary of the Treasury, whose decision shall be final and not subject to review of any other official of the United States."

There are no checks and balances. There is no provision made for vouchers, and no check of any kind is placed upon the Secretary of the Treasury. So far as I can see in this act, he might draw a check to his own order for the entire fund and the Treasurer of the United States would be bound to draw the money out and pay it over to him. The Treasurer of the United States furnishes a bond for $150,000 because he has partial control of the physical money of the Government. The Secretary of the Treasury, however, is not required to give any bond, and this act does not change the law in that respect.

It is true that under section 10 there is provision for an annual audit of such fund and report to be made to the President. Audit by whom? There is no provision for an independent audit, such as applies to every other fund of the Government. So far as I can see, the Secretary can select his own auditor, a man under his control, and in that way absolutely control the report that is made to the President.

There is, however, another object, that it violates one of the essential principles of our form of government, namely, that the people shall be informed where the money is coming from that defrays the expenses of the Government and how it is being expended. Let me quote the latter part of section 10 (a) of the pending bill:

> An annual audit of such fund shall be made and a report thereof submitted to the President, and a general report on the operation of the fund shall be made by the President to the Congress within the period beginning 90 days before and ending 90 days after the expiration of 3 years from the date of enactment of this act.

I suppose it will be contended that in order to make this stabilization fund effective and accomplish the purpose for which it was designed absolute secrecy must be maintained.

I desire, however, to call attention to the seventh paragraph of section 9 of article I of the Federal Constitution, which reads as follows:

> No money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law; and a regular statement and account of the receipts and expenditures of all public money shall be published from time to time.

One of the very first acts of the First Congress of the United States was to carry out this provision of the Constitution when, by an act of September 2, 1789, this language was used:

> And the said Treasurer shall render his accounts to the Comptroller quarterly (or oftener if required), and shall transmit a copy thereof, when settled, to the Secretary of the Treasury. He shall, moreover, on the third day of every session of Congress, lay before the Senate and House of Representatives fair and accurate copies of all accounts by him from time to time rendered to and settled with the Comptroller as aforesaid, as also a true and perfect account of the state of the Treasury.

The present law imposes the following duty upon the Secretary of the Treasury:

> It shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury annually to lay before Congress, on the first day of the regular session thereof, an accurate, combined statement of the receipts and expenditures during the last preceding fiscal year of all public moneys, including those of the Post Office Department, designating the amount of the receipts, whenever practicable, by ports, districts, and States, and the expenditures by each separate head of appropriation.

The truth is that it has been the practice for a long time for the Treasury Department to furnish daily statements for the benefit of the public as well as the detailed annual statements to the Congress on the first day of its session.

All this is to be changed so far as this fund is concerned, and the public is not to know anything about it until the expiration of 3 years and 3 months from the day this act becomes effective. It is true there is nothing in the act to prevent the President from transmitting to the public a copy of the annual audit submitted to him by the Secretary of the Treasury. There is nothing compulsory about it, however. In this connection it might be well to call attention to the fact that the present term of the President expires just about 3 years from the time this act becomes effective. Unless he succeeds himself, therefore, by the election of the people for another term, there is nothing in this act which compels him to make any report to the Congress or to the public as to what has happened to this fund of $2,000,000,000.

This $2,000,000,000 fund is to be placed in the hands of a political officer. Mr. President, when I comment about the wisdom of placing this huge fund in the control of the Secretary of the Treasury, I hope I may not be misunderstood as in any way intimating a lack of faith in his honesty and his good intentions with respect to this fund, as well as with respect to his general duties as Secretary of the Treasury. I have met him. I heard him before the Finance Committee, and I agreed with other members of the committee that, so far as we could see, he is an upright man, and I hope that nothing I shall say here will be understood as in any way reflecting upon him.

As I have thought, however, about the importance of this matter and about the tremendous amount involved, with no bond of any kind being provided, with authority in the Secretary of the Treasury to draw that money out the next day after it is placed there, I was wondering whether, after all, we know who might succeed him. He may resign. Some other person may come along in whom we may not have the same faith we have in him. But, regardless of how much faith we have in him, I am reminded that in pretty nearly every instance where a bank president or a bank officer has been convicted of embezzlement, we find it stated that he is a deacon in some church, a Sunday-school superintendent, or the leader of a civic organization in his city. So I say that human nature is such that the Congress ought not to go to the extent of putting such a huge fund in the hands of one man without a limit somewhere.

The proposal made by the Finance Committee would afford some check upon this power, but I understand that it is not satisfactory, and we must assume that the bill is to be passed as it came to us from the other House. I submit we ought to give careful consideration to that feature of the measure. I say that we cannot when the next Congress begins a check-up on it. A resolution adopted by the Senate or a resolution adopted by the House directing the Secretary of the Treasury to make a report or requesting the President to make a report will all be in vain; nothing may be done except by a modification of this proposed act itself to enable us to find out anything about it. I should not like to intimate that this period of 3 years and 3 months was placed there for any political purpose, but I do call attention to its significance and to suggest that in the next Presidential campaign the President of the United States will hold it within his own power to give us this information if favorable and to withhold it from us if it be unfavorable.

Let us be as brutally frank about it as the President was said to be when he presented his Budget message to the Congress. Let us find out whether there is any danger of that sort of thing under our form of government. I submit that there is. He is to have absolute control of this $2,000,000,000 fund. It may be said that no provision has been made for giving him help. The question may very well be asked whether or not, under this bill, he can employ experts, whether he can employ somebody who knows more than he about foreign exchange to help him in the administration of this fund. Have we placed in the bill any limitations upon the salaries which he may pay in the administration of the fund?

If my figures are not wrong, I think he could employ 2,000 men at $10,000 a year, and yet it would only take 1 percent income on this fund to pay them, and we will not know for 3 years whether he has done that or whether he has not done it. Who is going to know? Can he employ experts? Can he employ Mr. Bailie, to whose employment as one of the assistants in the Treasury Department on another pay roll so much objection was raised in the newspapers? Oh, here is a great refuge for pay rolls! It does not make any difference in the future whether or not there is any provision made in the appropriation bills for somebody whom the Secretary of the Treasury wants to employ; here is his refuge; here is a stabilization fund which can be utilized to place all the people whom he cares to place. There is nothing in the world to control him but his own conscience; nothing to prevent him from employing Mr. Bailie who, the record shows, was one of the leading members of an investment house that paid $435,000 to the son of the President of Peru in order to get $90,000,000 of bonds of that Government and sell them to innocent people in this country, a fact known to Mr. Morgenthau at the time he employed him; a fact that so impressed the committee and so impressed the public that the general understanding was that Mr. Bailie was compelled to resign or Mr. Morgenthau himself could not be confirmed by the Senate. Oh, what an opportunity there is now for Mr. Bailie, a man whom Mr. Morgenthau said he wanted to sit on the other side of the table from him because he "knew the game"—what an opportunity he has now! Mr. Morgenthau can send him to France, with all the help that he needs, and pay him what he pleases; he can send him to London, if he likes.

I say that if Mr. Morgenthau could be used, which I hope he cannot be, it will be a great refuge for the politically deserving who are applying to Senators on the other side to find them jobs. Here is their opportunity—Mr. Morgenthau with his $2,000,000,000—because nobody will ever know a thing about it, and there is nothing but his conscience to control him. We have more faith in his conscience than we have in the conscience of some other people who could be named in the administration; but I do not even intimate that he will use it; I do not go so far as to intimate that; I do not believe he will; but I want to be in a position when the rumor comes to me to say that I know it is not true; and I will never be in that position unless I know what he is doing; and unless the Congress knows what he is doing, they will not be in a position to know whether such a rumor which may be started is true or false.

Mr. President, there is another point to which I should like to call attention in connection with this money bill. The senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] says of this bill that one of the objects is to obtain $4,000,000,000 profit—$4,000,000,000 "taken out of the air", someone said—and that is a worthy object so long as nobody is robbed; but I should like to ask this question: When the Government shall have taken that $4,000,000,000, and the administration shall be able to brag about the profit it has made, I should like to know what will be the effect on the $10,000,000,000 of foreign debts which are due this country? They will have been cut down to $5,000,000,000, will they not? It may be answered, "No; because the debtor nations have agreed to pay in gold of the present standard of weight and fineness"; but certainly the dominant political party will not make that argument, because they have repudiated such an agreement with our own people and stated, "We will no longer live up to it"; and assuredly if that be true they cannot say to foreign governments, "We expect you to do something which we have refused to do with our own people." What has the present administration done with this $10,000,000,000 of foreign debts at the same time that it grasps and is pleased to take the $4,000,000,000 profit, thereby showing upon the books of the Treasury of the United States $4,000,000,000 more assets tomorrow than appear today before this bill shall have been passed? At the same time that is done, automatically the foreign debts due us are reduced by $5,000,000,000; so, after all, the Government will have lost a billion dollars by this smart thing that is being put over on the people of the country; and that takes into account not at all the $3,000,000,000 due to private investors.

O, Mr. President and Senators, perhaps some day we will get a report as to the use of this $2,000,000,000 fund, and when we do get it my prediction is that it will show that the British Government has got our $2,000,000,000 and probably taken Morgenthau's shirt at the same time. [Laughter.]

Let me inquire whether we have been entirely fair with our own people. At the very time when we were anticipating devaluing the dollar we went into the foreign markets, and we purchased there $111,109,566 worth of gold and paid the foreign owners approximately $33 an ounce for it, which is about $13 more than we paid our own people. That has all happened since October. The foreigners have got their money and are ready to use it in a stabilization fund against us, if you please. We have given it to them. But what have we given our own people at the same time? We have taken $813,000,000 in gold from them, but what did we give them? We did not give them $20.67 an ounce, to say nothing of $33 an ounce, which was the price we gave to foreigners. We have not even given our own people $20.67 an ounce, because we have given the President of the United States the authority to cut down the value of the dollar until gold is worth only a little more than $10 an ounce. Is that loyalty to our own people, and are we going to do everything we can to make foreign governments pay their debts to us on the ground, as alleged, that we do not want to impose further taxes upon our own people? Oh, we argue that position strongly; we write it into our platforms, and then at the very first opportunity we get, without anybody realizing what is happening, we reduce the foreign debts due us from $10,000,000,000 to $5,000,000,000.

Mr. President, what I have said here has to do with the merits of this bill. I propose to discuss one phase of its constitutionality. It seems to me the question of constitutionality as affecting this proposed act is of greater importance than the question of the constitutionality of other bills that are so often brought before the Congress. I realize that it is not worthwhile to argue a constitutional question before the Senate. In the first place, I do not pretend to be an expert upon constitutional law, but I am sworn to support the Constitution, and if I am not satisfied that a proposed act is constitutional, I ought not only to vote against it but I ought to set forth my reasons for the benefit of my colleagues, whatever my views may be worth, as well as for the benefit of the country.

I know that all of us can make what is a very valid excuse with respect to the constitutionality of every act which is proposed. There is but one place where we can definitely find out, and, so far as I know, no one has been able to say definitely beforehand what the decision will be on any particular legislation.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Delaware yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. HASTINGS. I have announced that I did not care to be interrupted.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes; I heard that announcement, but the Senator is constantly asking questions and challenging answers. I suggest to him, if he does not wish to be interrupted, that he discontinue that course and make his remarks.

Mr. HASTINGS. Challenging what? I did not understand the Senator's remarks.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Asking questions and challenging answers. If the Senator declines to yield, of course, I will not interrupt him further.

Mr. HASTINGS. I propose to continue doing exactly that thing. If the Senator from Arkansas should find in my speech sufficient to warrant him in answering it, I should feel complimented beyond measurement, but I do insist that if he cares to answer it he wait until I finish.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Very well; though if I may be permitted in the Senator's time to say so, I think it is a very unusual proceeding for a Senator to ask questions of the opposition, challenge an answer, and then refuse to yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Perhaps the Senator wants to answer them himself.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Of course, I would not be satisfied with the Senator's answer to his own questions. [Laughter.]

Mr. HASTINGS. I have heard the Senator from Arkansas interrupt other Senators in debate, and I do not think there is anything unusual about asking questions and leaving it for somebody who believes the bill ought to be passed to answer them in his own time. I have not asked the Senator from Arkansas any specific question. If I had, of course, I would have given him the opportunity to answer it. I am asking general questions; and, as the Senator from Kentucky said, I may answer them. If the Senator from Arkansas will listen, I am quite certain that in the end he will be greatly enlightened. [Laughter.]

I was about to say—in fact, I think I did say; and that is one of the reasons why I do not like to be interrupted—that no one knows definitely what the opinion of the Supreme Court would be upon any subject until it has handed it down and we have heard the decision read in the Court. But, I repeat, to my mind the constitutionality of this bill ought to be carefully considered before the bill becomes effective, because if it should afterward be declared unconstitutional it would upset the whole business structure of our country to a very much greater extent than would be true with respect to most measures.

I know that it may be said there is some doubt about most of the emergency measures we have passed and that the people of the country are waiting anxiously to know what the Supreme Court of the United States will say with respect to them. But there are none of them, whether it be the N.R.A., the A.A.A., or the various other alphabetical organizations which are in existence, which are of such importance that a declaration that they are unconstitutional will have the bad effect that would follow if this measure should be declared unconstitutional.

In the first place, we find the Government repudiating its promise to pay its own obligations in gold coin. Certainly no thoughtful lawyer can definitely say that the Supreme Court will uphold that act.

After the political campaign of 1896, and in some instances prior to that time, there was written into almost every important contract made between the citizens of our country, in which the payment of money was involved, an obligation to pay in gold coin of the present weight and fineness. The Supreme Court has on more than one occasion held that this was a binding contract, and the particular kind of money mentioned in the contract must be produced in order to cancel the contract.

If this act is declared unconstitutional, think of the confusion in the whole economic life of the Nation upon the two classes of individuals that I have described.

Suppose, for instance, some careful debtor having made that kind of contract occasionally laid away gold certificates from time to time so that he might be able to meet his obligation when it came due. Think what his position is by this legislation.

The act giving the President, because of the depression, authority to prohibit the hoarding and exporting of gold, was passed, and what does the President do under that authority? He issues an Executive order directing all persons holding gold or gold certificates to deliver them up at a certain fixed time to the Federal Reserve bank.

It may be that this act, giving the President the authority to prevent the hoarding and exporting of gold, is, on the face of it, constitutional (unless it be held unconstitutional by reason of the transferring of legislative powers of the Congress to the President). In other words, there may exist in the Congress the power, under certain circumstances, to prohibit the hoarding and exporting of gold. It is now proposed, however, to make valid the Executive order issued under the authority of that act.

Suppose it shall be determined, as I think it will be, that the direction, under threat of being declared a felon, to transfer that gold to a Federal Reserve bank, was not due process of law, and the payment in the currency of the United States was not necessarily just compensation. If that be true, think of the confusion of getting back into the hands of those persons who delivered that gold the just compensation which is theirs under the Constitution.

Carry the suggestion further to the point of taking the gold from the Federal Reserve bank and think what confusion there will be in that connection if this act is declared unconstitutional.

For these reasons I insist that the constitutionality of this act is of much greater significance than any other act that has been presented to the Congress in generations.

VALIDITY OF THE PROPOSED GOLD LEGISLATION

The bill under consideration represents one more step in a unified plan of currency legislation on the part of the present administration that began practically with its inception. Its constitutionality cannot be determined apart from this background and in effect involves a consideration of the entire program regarded as a continuing piece of legislation. This background is as follows:

The President, immediately after assuming office, under the authority of section 5 (b) of the act of October 6, 1917 (Trading with the Enemy Act, 40 Stat. 411, 1917), placed an embargo on gold exports and made certain delegations of authority to the Secretary of the Tresaury. The Federal Reserve Board thereafter directed Federal Reserve banks to forward to it lists of persons who had withdrawn gold since February 1, 1933, and had not redeposited it before March 13, 1933.

On March 9, 1933, Congress passed an act approving and confirming the actions of the President and amending the prior war-time act.

Under section 2 of this new legislation, the President was given the power to regulate or prohibit the export, hoarding, melting, or earmarking of gold or silver coin, bullion, or currency. A fine of $10,000 or imprisonment for 10 years, or both, was provided as a penalty for violating this law.

On April 5, 1933, the President, under this last legislation, issued a regulation prohibiting the withdrawal and withholding from recognized and customary channels of trade, gold coin, bullion, and certificates. This Executive order required the delivery to the Federal Reserve banks or member banks on or before May 1, 1933, of all gold coin, bullion, and certificates, for which there was to be paid an equivalent amount of any other form of coin or currency, coined or issued under the laws of the United States.

Then came the Executive order of April 20, 1933, in which it was provided:

> Until further order the earmarking for foreign account and the exporting of gold coin, gold bullion, or gold certificates of the United States, or subject to the jurisdiction thereof, is hereby prohibited, except that the Secretary of the Treasury, in his discretion, and subject to such regulations as he may prescribe, may issue licenses authorizing the export of gold coin and bullion earmarked or held in trust for a recognized foreign government or foreign central bank or the bank of international settlement.

Then came the Thomas amendment of May 12, 1933, which was an amendment to the agricultural act. Then came the joint resolution of June 5, 1933, whereby we left the gold standard.

On August 28, 1933, an Executive order was promulgated, revoking the previous regulation and merely imposing the criminal penalties sanctioned by the statute for continual hoarding. On December 28, 1933, the Secretary of the Treasury ordered every person to pay and deliver to the Treasury of the United States all gold coin, bullion, and certificates situated in the United States, with certain exceptions, authorizing payment therefor in language similar to that used above, and, on December 29, 1933, instructions were submitted to the member banks of the Federal Reserve System to pay over gold coin, certificates, and bullion at the rate of $20.67 per fine ounce, the Treasury's account with the bank to be charged with the amount of these payments.

On January 15, 1934, the President promulgated an amendment to the prior Executive order of August 28, 1933. Under the terms of this amendment no person was to acquire gold coin, bullion, or certificates except under license, with certain exceptions for purposes of industry, profession, and so forth. On the same date the Secretary of the Treasury fixed midnight of January 17, 1934, as the deadline for turning in gold coin, bullion, and certificates. This order provided that after such date the Secretary might pay for gold such part of the amount previously required to be paid, or none, as in his discretion he might provide.

Mr. President, I desire to digress for a moment with respect to this recent legislation to call attention to the act of Congress of June 28, 1834, in which provision was made for the contents of the gold coins of the United States.

A $10 gold piece, known as an eagle, was to contain 232 grains of pure gold, or 258 grains of standard gold.

The same act provided for the coining of the $5 gold piece and the $2.50 gold piece, each containing the same proportions.

By an act of Congress dated February 12, 1873, being section 3511 of the Revised Statutes, it is provided that the $1 gold piece of the United States, at the standard weight of 25.8 grains, shall be the unit of value; and then it provided for the issue of other pieces.

In the act of March 4, 1900, which act is mentioned by the Attorney General in his opinion to the Secretary of the Treasury, we find this language:

> The dollar consisting of 25.8 grains of gold, nine tenths fine, as established by section 3511, Revised Statutes of the United States, shall be the standard unit of value, and all forms of money issued or coined by the United States shall be maintained at a parity of value with this standard, and it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to maintain such parity.

I have traced this old legislation because the Attorney General, in his opinion, stated that—

> The prevailing price of gold coin and gold bullion in the United States, other than newly mined gold, is fixed by statute. The act of March 4, 1900, prescribes that the weight of the gold dollar shall be 25.08 grains, nine tenths fine, which in turn makes gold worth $20.67 an ounce.

It will be observed from the language of the statute that the Attorney General is in error when he states that the prevailing price of gold coin and gold bullion in the United States is fixed by statute. The price of gold bullion, as I shall show later in this brief which I have prepared, is not fixed by statute, and could not be fixed by statute.

On January 15, 1934, the President submitted to Congress a tentative bill to protect the currency system of the United States, to provide for the better use of the monetary gold stock of the United States, and for other purposes. I call attention to these dates because they are important in considering the present point of law. Section 2 (a) of this act provided in substance that title to any and all gold coin and gold bullion held by the board of every Federal Reserve bank should become vested in the United States, and that payment therefor should be made in equivalent amounts in dollars. For this purpose credits were established in appropriate Treasury accounts. Balances in such accounts are made payable in gold certificates in such form and denominations as the Secretary of the Treasury might determine. The act also provides that any gold withheld or otherwise dealt with in violation of its provisions should be forfeited to the United States.

This act is proposed in contemplation of a reduction, as we understand, in the gold content of the dollar to from 50 to 60 percent of its former content. The resultant increase of the value of the gold in terms of dollars is to be utilized by the Government as a part of the stabilization fund created by the act for the purpose of purchasing gold at home or abroad in an effort to keep the new value of the dollar at a stable figure.

The combination of the above legislation, together with the Thomas amendment which was passed on May 12, 1933, which, among other things, provided for the debasement of the coinage, in the discretion of the President, down to 50 percent, requires all persons to turn over gold in the form of coin or bullion or certificates to the appropriate Federal Reserve bank, title to this gold being vested by proposed legislation in the Federal Government in return for the payment "in equivalent amounts in dollars." This has been interpreted by the Secretary of the Treasury to mean payment of $20.67. At the same time the Government is paying for newly mined gold in the domestic market approximately $34.45 for the same weight. Moreover, with the contemplated reduction in the gold content of the dollar, the paper dollars given in return for gold will be worth between $10.37 and $12.40 for each ounce. The practical effect of this program of legislation and Executive orders is to confiscate all outstanding gold in the United States without the consent of the owners of such gold and at a figure which is fixed by statute—a figure which does not approximate the actual, as distinguished from the legal, value of the metal. Even this figure is chimerical, for the proposed reduction in the value of the dollars given for the gold will mean that a former owner of gold will now have in its stead money worth approximately one third of the value of his gold.

There are two particular respects in which this act violates the Constitution. That which undertakes to delegate power in violation of the Constitution, however, is to be discussed by other Members of this body on this side, and I shall confine my remarks to the fifth amendment, which prohibits the taking of property without due process of law and without just compensation.

The first ground upon which this legislation may be attacked is that it violates the due-process clause of the fifth amendment in that it allows condemnation and acquisition of gold at a price other than the fair value to which an owner of property is entitled upon its seizure by the Government.

It has often been stated that an owner of property which is acquired by the Government in condemnation proceedings must be placed in as good a position as if the property had not been taken from him (Seaboard Air Line Railway v. United States, 361 U.S. 299). In this case the Government requisitioned land under the Lever Act for governmental purposes. The President, through the War Board appraisers, made an assessment as to the value of the land. The owner, not satisfied with the amount so assessed, brought suit to recover a fair value. Mr. Justice Butler, writing the opinion for the Court, states, at page 304:

> The compensation to which the owner is entitled is the full and perfect equivalent of the property taken. * * * It rests on equitable principles, and it means substantially that the owner shall be put in as good position pecuniarily as he would have been if his property had not been taken.

This theory of compensation was further followed out in the case of Phelps v. United States (274 U.S. 341 (1927)). Here again was the requisition of a pier in New York Harbor by the Secretary of War, pursuant to an act of August 29, 1916, and an act of August 10, 1917. The amount of compensation offered did not meet with the owners' approval, and they sued to recover an amount to make up just compensation. Again writing the opinion of the Court, Mr. Justice Butler states at page 344:

> Acts of Congress are to be construed and applied in harmony with and not to thwart the purpose of the Constitution. The Government's obligation is to put the owners in as good position pecuniarily as if the use of their property had not been taken. They are entitled to have the full equivalent of the value of such use at the time of the taking paid contemporaneously with the taking. As such payment has not been made, petitioner is entitled to the additional amount claimed.

In Brooks-Scanlon Corporation v. United States (265 U.S. 106) the court emphasizes that it is the property itself which is protected under the due process clause rather than the amount which the property costs. This case involved the requisition of a ship in the process of construction, pursuant to war-time powers. The question before the Court was: "What was just compensation to be given to the owner of the ship so requisitioned?" Mr. Justice Butler, again writing the opinion of the Court, states at page 123:

> It is the property and not the cost of it that is protected by the fifth amendment.

In view of these above cases, and the quotations from the Court's opinions, it would seem that an excellent argument could be made against the constitutionality of the pending gold bill. In general, these cases would require that when the Government takes private property for public use it must give to the former owner of the property the full value of the property so taken. It must put the owner in as good a position pecuniarily as if the property had not been taken. In computing the fair value, as brought out in the Brooks-Scanlon Corporation case, already referred to, it must consider the property itself and not the cost, which would seem to make the intrinsic value of the property the criterion in determining what will be just compensation.

Under the present legislation and accompanying regulations the Government proposes to pay $20.67 for each fine ounce of gold bullion turned in to the Government; this, when the intrinsic value of gold in the world market is substantially higher and the price to be paid for newly mined gold is approximately $34 per ounce. It is needless to say that there is no substantial difference between newly mined gold and other gold in the form of bullion. In doing so, the Government sets an arbitrary value for bullion and ignores its intrinsic value as a commodity. If the Government, as it proposes, is to take title to this gold, which is private property, it is reasonable to assume that it must be bound by the law regulating the taking of private property. This law requires just compensation measured by the intrinsic value of the property taken, and certainly would not allow an arbitrary and fantastic value to be fixed by a legislative or executive body.

In United States v. Crary (2 Fed. Supp. 870 (1932)), a case which involves the taking by the Government of land for a public purpose, the Court states at page 879:

> Hence I believe that the value of land sought to be taken is the price it would bring if offered for sale by one who desires but is not obliged to sell, and is bought by one who is willing to buy but is under no necessity of buying.

This seems to be the usual statement of the rule for ascertaining the price which the Government must pay. Obviously the price of $20.67 per fine ounce is not a price for which the owner would be willing to part with gold. The Government itself is paying for newly mined gold at a rate approximately $15 higher per ounce.

It might be here argued by the proponents of the legislation that gold is a commodity affected with a public interest and, as such, is subject to regulation without giving full compensation. Such a theory was advanced by the Attorney General in his recent opinion and by Judge Woolsey in Campbell v. United States (New York Law Journal for Nov. 17, 1933), where defendant Campbell was prosecuted criminally on the theory that he was "a hoarder of gold." Such statements, however, seem to beg the question, for the Supreme Court, in United Railways v. West (280 U.S. 234 (1929)), asserts that property affected with a public interest is still private property and cannot be taken for a compulsory price which falls below the measure of just compensation. This was a case involving the valuation of the property of a street railway by a State public-utility commission for the purpose of fixing rates. The Court, at page 249, states:

> The commission fixed a rate of fare permitting the company to earn a return of 6.26 percent on this valuation; and, so far as no. 55 is concerned, the case resolves itself into the simple question whether that return is so inadequate as to result in a deprivation of property in violation of the due-process-of-law clause of the fourteenth amendment. In answering that question, the fundamental principle to be observed is that the property of a public utility, although devoted to the public service and impressed with a public interest, is still private property; and neither the corpus of that property nor the use thereof constitutionally can be taken for a compulsory price which falls below the measure of just compensation. One is confiscation no less than the other.

It is true that there are cases where State governments, in exercising their police power, have run rough-shod over private property rights and have deprived private persons of their property, so that some regulatory measure might be achieved. Such a case was Pennsylvania Coal Co. v. Mahon (260 U.S. 393). In this case the city of Scranton, Pa., passed a regulation providing that in coal mines beneath the city, pillars of coal should be left in order to prevent subsidence and injury therefrom to buildings on the surface. Thus, this regulation deprived the owners of the coal mines of property for which they were given no compensation. It was upheld by the Supreme Court of the United States as being a necessary exercise of the police power.

Similar cases are Bowditch v. Boston (101 U.S. 16); Omnia Commercial Co. v. United States (261 U.S. 502 (1932)); Hamilton v. Kentucky Distilleries & Warehouse Co. (261 U.S. 146 (1919)); see also Sweet v. Rechel (159 U.S. 380 (1895), p. 400).

On the basis of such cases it might be argued by proponents of the bill that the Federal Government may deprive persons of their property rights in exercising its constitutional power to regulate the national currency. In so arguing, they would state that the requisition of gold subserves a legitimate governmental purpose and that it is reasonably necessary for the accomplishment of that purpose that compensation be below the statutory rate of $20.67. To support this contention they might cite the cases above considered.

However, the cases all deal with situations in which title to the property has not been taken from the owner, but its use has been regulated, or with those in which the property involved is considered harmful to the public's health or morals. In none of these cases has property been taken from the owner for the purpose of being used by the Government; rather, its use has been regulated in the hands of the owner or it has been absolutely confiscated for purposes of destruction rather than for the use of the Government on the theory that it presented a danger and menace to society. Where, in fact, pursuant to a power vested in it, the Government has taken title to property to be used for a public purpose, compensation for such taking was required to be made. Such was the situation in Monongahela Navigation Co. v. United States (148 U.S. 310 (1893)). The facts in this case are set forth at length later on in this memorandum, but summarily the Federal Government took possession of a lock and dam in a navigable river pursuant to the power over interstate commerce vested in it by the Constitution. It was required by the court to give fair compensation to the owner of such property. The Supreme Court in this case, at page 471, forcefully states the rule in the following language:

> But like the other powers granted to Congress by the Constitution, the power to regulate commerce is subject to all the limitations imposed by such instrument, and among them is that of the fifth amendment, we have heretofore quoted. Congress has supreme control over the regulation of commerce, but if in exercising that supreme control, it deems it necessary to take private property, then it must proceed subject to the limitations imposed by this fifth amendment, and can take only on payment of just compensation.

Omnia Commercial Co. against United States, heretofore cited, which case involved the requisition of a ship as a war-time measure, clearly distinguishes by way of obiter dictum the distinction between taking property for public use and destruction by lawful governmental action. The Court, at Two Hundred and Sixty-first United States Reports, page 510, asserts:

> If, under any power, a contract or other property is taken for public use, the Government is liable; but if injured or destroyed by lawful action, without a taking, the Government is not liable.

Two cases before the Supreme Court, Mugler v. Kansas (123 U.S. 623 (1887)) and Samuels v. McCurdy (267 U.S. 188 (1925)), might present ammunition for the proponents of this bill. In both those cases, the Supreme Court allowed first the State of Kansas and then the State of Georgia, to take without compensation, under a State statute making possession illegal, liquor acquired before the enactment of the statute. In Samuels against McCurdy, just cited, in discussing the question of compensation to be given to the owner of the confiscated liquor, the Court gave some weight to the difficulty of ascertaining the market value of the liquor, since the ownership and sale of such were prohibited. This argument might be advanced on the theory that the present abnormal gold market makes the determination of the intrinsic value of gold almost impossible and hence the compensation to be given will be that as prescribed by statute. However, again these two cases do not involve the appropriation or taking of property by the Government for its own use, but involved confiscation of property deemed injurious to the public welfare for the purpose of destruction.

It would seem, then, on the basis of the strong language in the Monongahela case, already referred to, where, in fact, the Government in exercising its constitutional powers does deem it necessary to take title to private property, that it must compensate the former owner of such property to its full value.

Up to this point I have dealt solely with the inequity of paying $20.67 per fine ounce for gold, when the intrinsic value of such is higher. There is an additional objection on the ground that the Government demands the surrender of all gold and proposes to pay for this gold in money, the value of which will be reduced by from 50 to 60 percent at the time when the owner receives payment. It is true that the value of property taken over under the power of eminent domain should be determined as of the date of taking, but the whole course of the legislative enactments and the regulations of the Secretary of the Treasury and of the President of the United States show a plan to require the surrender of all gold and to pay therefor, in depreciated money, a value which is approximately one third of the value of the gold itself. The present bill ratifies the previous regulations of the President and the Secretary of the Treasury and, in section 7, contemplates that the weight of the gold dollar shall be reduced. It is not only a connecting link in the plan of the Government but is one of the most vital links in the plan. It would be absurd to predicate the power of the Government to accomplish such an objective upon the mere basis that the taking of the gold is accomplished at one time and the reduction in the value of the dollars given for the gold accomplished at a later time, when this power would be lacking were both these steps to be taken at one and the same time.

Just here I may call attention to the opinion of the Attorney General, in which he gives the prohibition of exporting gold to other countries as a reason why this amount of $20.67 an ounce is a true and correct value, and he argues that because of that there is no way in which a person could get more for his gold than is fixed by the statute.

Insofar as the governmental powers of eminent domain are herein involved the case of Cincinnati v. Vester (33 Fed. 2, 242 (C.C.A. 6, 1929), 57 Harvard Law Review, 479) at page 484 (footnote 25) throws some light upon the unconstitutionality of the proposed legislation. In this case the city of Cincinnati, Ohio, condemned private land for the construction of a roadway. In addition it condemned a small amount of adjoining property which it proposed to sell at a profit and apply the proceeds for the maintenance of the highway. The court refused to allow the condemnation of this additional parcel of land on the theory that it was a condemnation for a nonpublic use and as such was a denial of due process of law.

In the present situation the retention by the Government of the profit resulting from the proposed debasement of the currency is analogous to the proposed sale at a profit of the additional land in the Cincinnati case and, as such, a denial of due process.

However, there is language in the Cincinnati case which indicates that, if the use of the profit acquired by the sale of land was dominantly for a public use and was directly related to the use for which the property was taken, so as to be indispensable to its welfare, in such a case the court might sanction the acquisition of such a profit.

Another objection to the constitutionality of the proposed enactment has been raised by the distinguished senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS]. The price which is to be paid for the gold taken over by the Government is fixed by the statute and the regulations of the President and the Secretary of the Treasury. It has been stated by the Supreme Court of the United States that the ascertainment of the fair value which is to be paid for property taken by the Government is a judicial function (Monongahela Navigation Co. v. United States, 148 U.S. 310 (1893); Seaboard Airline Railway v. United States, 261 U.S. 299 (1922); United States v. New River Collieries, 262 U.S. 341 (1923)).

In the Monongahela Navigation Co. case the Secretary of War was authorized by the statute to purchase a specific lock and dam for a figure not exceeding $161,000, in round numbers, or in the alternative to institute condemnation proceedings to acquire this property. The condemnation proceedings were to conform to those adopted by the statutes of Pennsylvania, the property being located in that State, but the Federal statute provided that the franchise of the corporation operating the lock and dam was not to be considered in assessing the damages to which the owning corporation was to be entitled. In the lower court evidence of the present and prospective tolls was offered, but the court sustained the objection of the counsel for the United States thereto, thus following out the Federal statute in disallowing any value which might have been attributable to the franchise of the corporation. Upon appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States the judgment was reversed and the case remanded with instructions for a new trial. The following language from the opinion of the Court is pertinent (148 U.S. at pp. 324–328):

> The question presented is not whether the United States has the power to condemn and appropriate this property of the Monongahela Co., for that is conceded, but how much it must pay as compensation therefor. Obviously this question, as all others which run along the line of the extent of the protection the individual has under the Constitution against the demands of the Government, is of importance, for in any society the fullness and sufficiency of the securities which surround the individual in the use and enjoyment of his property constitute one of the most certain tests of the character and value of the Government. * * * * * * In this fifth amendment there is stated the exact limitation on the power of the Government to take private property for public uses. And with respect to constitutional provisions of this nature it was well said by Mr. Justice Bradley, speaking for the Court, in Boyd v. United States (116 U.S. 616, 635 (29: 746, 752)): "Illegitimate and unconstitutional practices get their first footing in that way, namely, by silent approaches and slight deviations from legal modes of procedure. This can only be obviated by adhering to the rule that constitutional provisions for the security of person and property should be liberally construed. A close and literal construction deprives them of half their efficacy and leads to gradual depreciation of the rights, as if it consisted more in sound than in substance. It is the duty of courts to be watchful for the constitutional rights of the citizen and against any stealthy encroachments thereon * * *."
> The language used in the fifth amendment in respect to this matter is happily chosen. The entire amendment is a series of negations, denials of right or power in the Government, the last, the one in point here, being "Nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation." The noun "compensation" standing by itself carries the idea of an equivalent. Thus we speak of damages by way of compensation, or compensatory damages, as distinguished from punitive or exemplary damages, the former being the equivalent for the injury done and the latter imposed by way of punishment. So that if the adjective "just" had been omitted, and the provision was simply that property should not be taken without compensation, the natural import of the language would be that the compensation should be the equivalent of the property. And this is made emphatic by the adjective "just." There can, in view of the combination of those two words, be no doubt that the compensation must be a full and perfect equivalent for the property taken. And this just compensation, it will be noticed, is for the property and not to the owner. * * *
> By this legislation Congress seems to have assumed the right to determine what shall be the measure of compensation. But this is a judicial and not a legislative question. The legislature may determine what private property is needed for public purposes—that is a question of a political and legislative character—but when the taking has been ordered, then the question of compensation is judicial. It does not rest with the public taking the property, through Congress or the legislature, its representative, to say what compensation shall be paid, or even what shall be the rule of compensation. The Constitution has declared that just compensation shall be paid, and the ascertainment of that is a judicial inquiry. In Charles River Bridge Props. v. Warren Bridge Proprs. (36 U.S.: 11 Pet. 420, 571 (9: 773, 833)) Mr. Justice McLean, in his opinion, referring to a provision for compensation found in the charter of the Warren bridge, uses this language: "They (the legislature) provide that the new company shall pay annually to the college in behalf of the old one a hundred pounds. By this provision it appears that the legislature has undertaken to do what a jury of the country only could constitutionally do—assess the amount of compensation to which the complainants are entitled." (See also the following authorities: Com. v. Pittsburgh & C. R. Co., 58 Pa. 26, 50; Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Baltimore & O. R. Co., 60 Md. 263; Isom v. Mississippi Cent. R. Co., 36 Miss. 300.)
> In the last of these cases and on page 315 will be found these observations of the court: "The right of the legislature of the State, by law, to apply the property of the citizen to the public use, and then to constitute itself the judge in its own case to determine what is the 'just compensation' it ought to pay therefor, or how much benefit it has conferred upon the citizen by thus taking his property without his consent, or to extinguish any part of such 'compensation' by prospective conjectural advantage, or in any manner to interfere with the just powers and province of courts and juries in administering right and justice, cannot for a moment be admitted or tolerated under our Constitution. If anything can be clear and undeniable upon principles of natural justice or constitutional law, it seems that this must be so."
> We are not, therefore, concluded by the declaration in the act that the franchise to collect tolls is not to be considered in estimating the sum to be paid for the property.

In the above case the statute made provision for the institution of the condemnation proceedings in the district court and therefore met any objection that the amount of the compensation must be fixed by the judicial tribunal. In the present situation the amount of money to be paid for gold has been set by statute as an equivalent amount in dollars. In turn, the equivalent amount in dollars is determined by the act of March 14, 1900 (U.S.C., title 31, par. 314), which sets the weight of the gold dollar at 25.8 grains. This means that for each 25.8 grains of gold taken over by the Government one dollar, which under the plan will represent only about one half that amount of gold in value, will be paid. In effect, since the certificate given in return for the gold surrendered has no value except in terms of its gold content, the proposed legislation, while superficially purporting to give compensation for the property surrendered, really amounts to a confiscation of one half of it. In this respect it differs from all other cases of condemnation of property.

The Monongahela Navigation Co. case has been cited as authority in later cases. Thus, in the Seaboard Airline case, cited above, the Court states (148 U.S. 310):

> Just compensation is provided for by the Constitution, and the right to it cannot be taken away by statute. Its ascertainment is a judicial function.

And in United States against New River Collieries Co., cited above, the Court states (262 U.S. 341):

> The ascertainment of compensation is a judicial function, and no power exists in any other Department of the Government to declare what the compensation shall be or to prescribe any binding rule in that regard.

The last two cases cited involved the requisition by the Government of certain commodities under the Lever Act for the use of the Army and Navy during the war time. The act provided for purchase at an amount fixed by the President. However, the owner of the commodity taken was given the right to object to this valuation, to accept 75 percent thereof, and to sue for the balance in the appropriate district court. Since under the statute the court was to determine the amount of just compensation, the language quoted may be considered obiter dicta, but nevertheless the principles laid down for guidance represent sound constitutional law.

Several cases from the courts of highest resort in the States are cited by the Supreme Court in the Monongahela Navigation case. In Com. v. Pittsburgh & C. R. Co. (58 Pa. 26 (1868)) the Court declared unconstitutional a statute providing for the acquisition of the railroad property, under the terms of which the Governor of the State was to appoint three appraisers, who were to determine the expenditure made in the construction of the defendant road. This amount was to be paid to the road by a corporation thereafter to be authorized to construct a railroad over the same lines. The Court says of the statute at page 50:

> These provisions are altogether insufficient, illusory, and unconstitutional. There is no direction whatever for a valuation of the corporate franchises and privileges attempted to be resumed for the public use. Even in regard to the actual tangible property taken—the lines of railway—the rule of valuation and appraisement is inadequate and unjust.

In Pennsylvania R.R. Co. v. Baltimore & O. R.R. Co. (60 Md. 263 (1883)) the State Legislature of Maryland passed a statute providing that railroads whose lines intersected within the State should be required to permit the intersecting road to use its lines for a distance up to 5 miles from the intersection at a rate not exceeding the rate per ton-mile charged for through rates. The Pennsylvania Railroad sued against the Baltimore & Ohio to recover statutory penalties for failure to comply with this act. The Maryland Court of Appeals affirmed the judgment dismissing the action on the basis of the invalidity of the statute under the State constitution, stating at page 269:

> The legislature, in exercising the right of eminent domain, cannot in the law itself fix the compensation to be paid. Such compensation in case of disagreement between the parties must in this State be awarded by a jury.

It would seem clearly from the cited cases that the present statute should provide for a determination by the judicial body of the fair value of the gold taken by the Government. This question, however, is tied up with the question as to the constitutional meaning of the term "just compensation." For if the Supreme Court should ultimately decide that $20.67 per fine ounce amounts to just compensation, there would be no practical necessity for a procedure by which the value of the gold to be acquired should be determined. The mere possibility that the Supreme Court might find that $20.67 amounts to just compensation does not obviate the objection to the statute, however, inasmuch as it is the fact that the statute does not afford the owner of the gold an opportunity to have the Court determine that it is just compensation, that deprives him of his constitutional rights.

The extent of the power of the Government over the monetary system has not been fully determined by judicial decisions. The three most important cases in point are those of Hepburn v. Griswold (8 Wall. 603 (1870)); the Legal Tender cases (Knox v. Lee and Parker v. Davis, 12 Wall. 457 (1871)); and Juilliard v. Greenman (110 U.S. 421 (1884)). In the first of the cases the first Legal Tender Act was held invalid, the Court being of the opinion that, while Congress had the power to make credit currency legal tender, it could not require the payment of debts payable in fact in gold and silver, in paper money, not redeemable in gold. This case was overruled, however, in the Legal Tender cases by a decision concurred in by 4 justices as against 3 dissenting judges. Much of the language used in the opinions of the majority judges might be used as a basis for the validity of the present legislation. Thus, at page 547 of the opinion of Mr. Justice Strong, it is stated that the Constitution leaves with Congress the power to determine how far the statutory value of money shall correspond with the market value of the material itself; and, in the opinion of Mr. Justice Bradley, at pages 563–564, it is stated:

> When the ordinary currency disappears, as it often does in time of war, when business begins to stagnate and general bankruptcy is imminent, then the Government must have power at the same time to renovate its own resources and to revive the drooping energies of the Nation by supplying it with a circulating medium. What that medium shall be, what its character and qualities, will depend upon the greatness of the exigency and the degree of promptitude which it demands. These are legislative questions. The heart of the Nation must not be crushed out. The people must be aided to pay their debts and meet their obligations. The debtor interest of the country represent its bone and sinew, and must be encouraged to pursue its avocations. If relief were not afforded universal bankruptcy would ensue, and industry would be stopped, and government would be paralyzed in the paralysis of the people.

Such language might be adopted for the purpose of upholding the validity of the present proposed legislation. However, there is some language in the opinion of Mr. Justice Bradley which would seem to result in an opposite conclusion. Thus, at pages 560–561, in speaking of the power to make paper money legal tender, he asserts that the former Legal Tender Act was not an attempt to coin money out of a valueless material, but was a pledge of the national credit. It is a promise by the Government to pay dollars; it is not an attempt to make dollars. Under the pending proposed statute the Government is attempting to make dollars. Such an attempt is outside of the scope of the decision in the Legal Tender cases, and is not authorized by that decision. The same justice, at page 563, asserts:

> A constitutional government, notwithstanding the right of eminent domain, cannot take physical and forceable possession of all that it may need to defend the country, and is reluctant to exercise such a power when it can be avoided. It must purchase * * *.

The specific decision in this case involved the question as to whether the owner of certain sheep could be compelled to accept as damages for their loss under an order of confiscation of the Confederacy the value of the sheep in greenbacks, which at the time were worth less than their value in specie. The jury had returned a verdict for the plaintiff under instructions to the effect that the verdict could be discharged by payment in greenbacks, which had been given the quality of legal tender by statute. The Supreme Court upheld the judgment rendered upon this verdict. The decision upheld the power of the Government to issue paper money not redeemable in gold during war time for the purpose of carrying on the functions of the Government, and that the acts impressing upon these greenbacks the quality of legal tender were valid as applied to contracts made both before and after their passage.

The last of the three above-mentioned cases, that of Juillard against Greenman, involved a similar question, except that the paper money issued at that time was redeemable in gold, and the power of the Government to issue such money was here raised at a time when the United States was not at war. The power of the Government to issue notes and make them legal tender was here held to be included in the power to borrow money and provide a national currency.

The second of these last two decisions is merely to establish the power of the United States to issue paper money and make it legal tender, although the effect of such power may in a given instance mean that a debtor will be able to pay his creditor the amount of the debt in legal tender which is not worth at the time of payment the amount it had previously been worth at the time the contract was entered into. This does not mean that the Government itself may requisition all gold in the country, pay therefor a sum which does not represent the true value of the gold and thereby acquire for its own use the increase in value of the gold which arises from its policy of debasement. Moreover, in the Legal Tender cases the decrease in the gold content of the dollar was for the specific purpose of equalizing the value of the gold contained in each dollar and the value of the then monetary unit, the silver dollar. These decisions are not authority for the constitutional validity of the present bill.

Another possible ground upon which to attack the constitutionality of this proposed bill might be that section 4, in imposing such heavy penalties for failure to comply with the provisions of the bill, would tend to preclude resort to the courts to test its validity. The case of Ex Parte Young (209 U.S. 123 (1908)) declared unconstitutional a statute which proposed such penalties. However, the rule of this case has been used in subsequent cases only as a basis for enjoining the imposition of penalties until a chance has been had to test the constitutionality of the bill on other grounds. (See 57 Harv. Law Rev., 486, note 35.)

In the opinion of the Attorney General under date of January 17, 1934, which sustains the validity of the present bill, great reliance is placed upon the case of Ling Su Fan v. United States (218 U.S. 302 (1910)). In that case the Philippine Commission enacted a law providing as follows:

> The exportation from the Philippine Islands of Philippine silver coins, coined by authority of the act of Congress approved March 2, 1903, or the bullion made by melting or otherwise mutilating such coins, is hereby prohibited, and any of the aforementioned silver coins or bullion which is exported or of which the exportation is attempted subsequent to the passage of this act and contrary to its provisions shall be liable to forfeiture, under due process of law, and one third of the sum or value of the bullion so forfeited shall be payable to the person upon whose information, given to the proper authorities, the seizure of the money or bullion so forfeited is made, and the other two thirds shall be payable to the Philippine government and accrue to the gold-standard fund: Provided, That the prohibition herein contained shall not apply to sums of ₱25 or less, carried by passengers leaving the Philippine Islands.
> SEC. 2. The exportation or attempt to export Philippine silver coin or bullion made from such coins from the Philippine Islands, contrary to law, is hereby declared to be a criminal offense, punishable, in addition to the forfeiture of the said coins or bullion as above provided, by a fine not to exceed ₱10,000, or by imprisonment for a period not to exceed 1 year, or both, in the discretion of the court.

This, Mr. President, is the sole decision cited by the Attorney General in his opinion upholding this proposed law, at least this part of it.

The court held that this statute did not deprive the owners of such coins of their property in the coins without due process of law.

Although the value of the coins as silver metal exceeded their value as legal tender, the decision upheld the power of the Philippine Commission to prevent the wholesale exportation of the silver coins and the destruction of that part of the Philippine currency. Such a situation is not involved in the present case. The purpose of this bill is not to prevent the misuse of coined gold for individual profit but in effect to enable the Government itself to realize the profit upon the difference between the value of the gold coins and of gold bullion as gold and the value of the equivalent amount in depreciated dollars. The decision in the Philippine case is based in substance upon the following language (p. 310):

> Conceding the title of the owner of such coins, yet there is attached to such ownership those limitations which public policy may require by reason of their quality as a legal tender and as a medium of exchange. These limitations are due to the fact that public law gives to such coinage a value which does not attach as a mere consequence of intrinsic value. Their quality as a legal tender is an attribute of law aside from their bullion value. They bear, therefore, the impress of sovereign power which fixes value and authorizes their use in exchange. As an incident, the Government may punish defacement and mutilation and constitute any such act, when fraudulently done, a misdemeanor (Rev. Stat. secs. 5459, 5189).

The distinction between the enactment involved in the Philippine case and the pending bill is that there the Philippine Commission merely regulated the use of silver coins by prohibiting their exportation. The pending measure and the preceding Executive orders do not merely regulate the use of gold coin and bullion but destroy all rights to their use and vest the title to them in the Government. The distinction is that which was involved in the cases I have previously referred to, namely, that the Government, under its police power, may regulate the use of and even destroy property without being required to pay just compensation; but when it actually takes the property from its former owner, to be used for a public purpose, it must pay just compensation.

In addition, the holding of the Philippine case is limited to prohibition of the export of coined money. True, the statute forbade export of bullion made from Philippine coin. Obviously, the purpose of this clause was to prevent evasion of the act by exporting bullion obtained from melting silver pesos.

This clause was not involved under the facts of the case, and it was not discussed either in the decision or in the argument of counsel.

Bullion is not defined by the previous Executive regulation, nor by the pending bill. In Webster's dictionary, 1926 edition, it is defined as follows:

> Gold or silver, considered merely as so much metal, without regard to any value imparted to it by its form. * * * Specifically, uncoined gold or silver in the shape of bars, ingots, or the like, or even in plate or other form. * * *

The most common understanding of the term would seem to be "uncoined gold and silver in the mass." (See vol. 1, Words and Phrases, first series, p. 903.)

The words "gold bullion", as used in the Executive order and the bill before us, may therefore be taken to comprehend all gold in the mass. The term is not used as denoting bars or ingots of gold of the statutory purity and weight, stamped with the official Government mark denoting its weight and finess (see U.S.C., title 31, sec. 325), for the United States statutes provide for the deposit of gold bullion by owners thereof to be formed into gold bars (U.S.C., sec. 327), and for the removal of the baser metal from such bullion where necessary in order that it may be conformed to the prescribed purity (U.S.C., sec. 329). Although an owner of gold bullion could formerly obtain gold coin or bars or even gold certificates (U.S.C., sec. 428) in return for his bullion, and could formerly obtain gold coin or bullion in return for gold certificates, this does not mean that the coin and the bullion are one and the same thing.

Bear in mind, Mr. President, that the Attorney General in his opinion says that the statute of 1900 fixed the value of gold coin and gold bullion. Such a provision cannot be found in that statute; it is not there; and the Attorney General was mistaken when he made that statement.

Gold coins are specifically made legal tender by statute (U.S.C., sec. 457). There is no similar provision in the statutes with respect to bullion. The owner of bullion, even though it is obtained from the Treasury and bears the official stamp of the Government, acquires absolute title thereto, and may deface it or melt it up as he sees fit. This he cannot do in the case of gold coin.

It cannot be said of gold bullion that the law gives it a value aside from the intrinsic value of the gold. Although gold bullion may pass from hand to hand as a medium of exchange, it is by virtue of its inherent worth. To some extent this is also true of gold coins, since they are not required to be accepted at their face value if below the "standard weight and limit of tolerance provided by law" (U.S.C., sec. 457). On the other hand, granting the existence of the power to accomplish what the present bill proposes, with respect to gold bullion, no distinction exists whereby such power should be limited to gold bearing the Government's stamp. The Government might provide for a similar requisition of all gold watches, of all gold ornaments, and similar articles manufactured from gold. It is inconceivable that the Constitution might allow such private property to be so seized and paid for at a price far below the actual worth of the article seized.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Delaware yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. FESS. Before the Senator takes his seat I want to ask him what part of the pending measure caused him to suggest that there will be any trade value in bullion? He said bullion may be transferred from one citizen to another and thereby maintain a trade value. My understanding is that the bullion is to be taken over by the Government and lodged in the Treasury.

Mr. HASTINGS. Perhaps I did not make my statement perfectly clear. I was referring to the situation prior to the things that are being done by the present administration with respect to gold, and not to what the situation is at the present time or what it will be after the bill is enacted into law and that law becomes effective.

Mr. FESS. That answers the question I want to ask another question. The chairman of the committee, the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], on yesterday, in replying to an argument with reference to irredeemable currency, said that we have so much currency in circulation now and took occasion to specify the various kinds of money. He noted the Federal Reserve bank notes and stated that they are redeemable; also the Sherman note or the note of 1890, which has on its face the phrase "paid in coin", which the Treasury did not want to regard as silver equivalent to gold and which, therefore, became the issue in 1898 which led to the repeal of that law. The Senator from Florida said that was redeemable in gold. He also specified the national-bank notes based upon United States bonds and said they are payable in gold. He referred to other kinds of currency and announced that they are redeemable.

Then he argued that this legislation is on a parity with prior legislation, when as a matter of fact the proposed legislation provides for irredeemable currency. The difference between the present currencies under the old law and the currency proposed in the bill now under consideration is as high as the difference between up and down and as wide as the difference between right and left, because what made the present money of any value was the redeemable element, and that element is taken out of our currency by the pending measure.

I have been wondering whether the Senator is holding that bullion still has a value when it is taken out of trade. It seems to me it might as well be dropped in the sea, so far as value is concerned.

Mr. HASTINGS. The Senator evidently did not hear all of my remarks, because I undertook to make it perfectly clear that from my point of view the currency that will be in existence after the passage of this bill will have nothing back of it except the credit of the Government.

Mr. FESS. That is correct.

Mr. HASTINGS. I heard the distinguished Senator the other day make a speech upon the subject, in which he made the remark that so far as redemption in gold is concerned the gold held by the Treasury might be dumped into the sea. As I see it, I would qualify that statement to this extent. There is some value in the world in the gold held by the Treasury, and to the extent of that value the assets of the Nation are increased by the possession of that gold; but in no other way can it be used as an asset, and in no other way does it make any difference whether it be gold or any other commodity.

Mr. FESS. I think the Senator is being led into a condition of delusion there. Upon what were the assignats of France based? They were based upon real estate in the hands of the Government, the best security on earth; but what became of the assignats?

Mr. HASTINGS. I have assumed that if our Government cared to do so it could take its gold abroad and bring home—I do not know just what.

Mr. FESS. Nor does anyone else know.

Mr. HASTINGS. But it would have the same value abroad, and in order that I might be conservative I have stated that the fact that there is gold in the Treasury adds some assets to the Nation's assets.

Mr. FESS. I cannot understand the Senator's position that if we have any fund of any sort in the form of wealth it is not a redeemable element because the law prevents the redemption. Redemption is where the holder of the certificate has the right to demand its redemption. He will have no such right under the pending bill. The Government can redeem if it wants to do so, but if it finds it inconvenient to do so it will not do it. Where is the redemption? Where is the value in a certificate based upon bullion when that certificate cannot be redeemed?

Mr. HASTINGS. I am not making such an argument. I certainly want to make my position clear. I have stated with as much emphasis as I possess that in my judgment when we get through with this legislation there will be nothing back of the circulating dollar except the credit of the Nation.

Mr. FESS. The Senator is right.

Mr. HASTINGS. We are in agreement upon that.

Mr. FESS. The Senator is right.

Mr. HASTINGS. The only difference between the Senator from Ohio and myself is that when he began to calculate the assets of the Nation he left out the gold as having any value.

Mr. FESS. Because it is not in the exchange trade. It is taken out.

Mr. HASTINGS. I think we are not in disagreement.

Mr. FESS. I do not think so either.

Mr. HASTINGS. I merely wanted to be very careful in my statement.

Mr. AUSTIN obtained the floor.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Vermont yield to enable me to suggest the absence of a quorum?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Ohio for that purpose?

Mr. AUSTIN. I do.

Mr. FESS. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Costigan	Johnson	Reynolds
Ashurst	Couzens	Kean	Robinson, Ark.
Austin	Cutting	Keyes	Robinson, Ind.
Bachman	Davis	King	Russell
Bailey	Dieterich	La Follette	Schall

Clark	Hatch	Patterson	Walsh
Connally	Hatfield	Pittman	Wheeler
Coolidge	Hayden	Pope	White
Copeland	Hebert	Reed

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair desires to announce the necessary absence of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON], the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF], and the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK].

Ninety-one Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The Senator from Vermont is entitled to the floor.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator for just a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS] asked not to be interrupted while he was speaking, but stated that he would answer questions when he finished. When he finished a quorum was called, and I had no opportunity to ask the questions. He has now left the Chamber. I simply should like to correct one thing that appears in the RECORD of today. It will take only a minute.

The Senator made the statement that only two people appeared before the Banking and Currency Committee in support of this bill; that all the others he indicated were opposed to it. I desire to draw his attention to the fact that part I of the hearings before the committee shows that the Honorable Robert L. Owen was invited to appear before the committee; and his statement begins on page 44 of the hearings, part I. It will take me only a minute to correct the statement that has gone forth, and I think it ought to be corrected now. I will not take time to refer to other statements.

Mr. Owen said:

> When I received your telegram yesterday, inviting me to come down from New York to appear before the committee, I came in last night and this morning I had the opportunity of reading the bill. I had general knowledge of its contents before. I also saw the opinion of Attorney General Cummings with regard to it.
> I think I understand the purpose of the bill, which is that the Government of the United States should take over the physical possession and ownership of all the gold in the United States, and that that gold subsequently may be devalued by the President of the United States under the Thomas amendment, not lower than 50 and not above 60.

Then he said:

> I approve the purpose of the bill.

Further on in his statement he said:

> I think, therefore, that the bill is thoroughly constitutional. I think the bill is altogether commendable as a means of accomplishing this end.

Senator Owen was at one time a distinguished Member of this body, as the Senator knows, and Chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee, and coauthor of the Federal Reserve Act. He is thoroughly posted regarding these questions, and has been a student of the subject for years; and I think his statement should have value. He went thoroughly into this bill and its principles, and expresses himself admirably; and I submit that his statement, clear and to the point and forceful, is well worth reading by Members of the Senate. It will be found in the first volume of the hearings, beginning on page 44.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, in order that the RECORD may not create a wrong impression on the situation just preceding the statement of the Senator from Florida, I desire to state that the distinguished Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS] completed his remarks while the distinguished Senator from Florida was not present on the floor. I have no doubt that if the distinguished Senator from Florida had been here, he would have had an opportunity to interrogate or interpolate after the Senator from Delaware had completed his remarks.

Mr. President, I oppose the passage of the Gold Reserve Act of 1934, so-called, because Congress thereby abdicates to executive and administrative officers legislative powers and duties included in article I, section 8, clause 5, of the Constitution. It abdicates legislative powers of the highest character to the executive and administrative officers named in it; namely, the power—

> To coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin, and fix the standard of weights and measures.

I shall try to discuss this one ground as briefly as possible, and to limit myself closely, for the purpose of saving the time of the Senate, to memoranda that I have before me.

In this discussion I desire to have it understood that I am speaking of the effect of the whole bill unless I specifically refer to some part of it; and, speaking generally of the whole bill as proposed, I claim that it would accomplish a transmission of some of the exclusive powers and duties which I have just read to the Executive and others acting under him.

There are specific grants of power contained in this provision of the Constitution, as follows:

Section 6 of the Gold Reserve Act of 1934:

> Except to the extent permitted in regulations which may be issued hereunder by the Secretary of the Treasury with the approval of the President, no currency of the United States shall be redeemed in gold: Provided, however, That gold certificates owned by the Federal Reserve banks shall be redeemed at such times and in such amounts as, in the judgment of the Secretary of the Treasury, are necessary to maintain the equal purchasing power of every kind of currency of the United States. * * *

There is more to that provision, but that is all that I care to refer to at this time.

Section 8, of which I read only a part, provides, among other things:

> * * * With the approval of the President, the Secretary of the Treasury may purchase gold in any amounts, at home or abroad, with any direct obligations, coin, or currency of the United States authorized by law, or with any funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, at such rates and upon such terms and conditions as he may deem most advantageous to the public interest; any provision of law relating to the maintenance of parity or limiting the purposes for which any of such obligations, coin, or currency may be issued, or requiring any such obligations to be offered as a popular loan or on a competitive basis, or to be offered or issue at not less than par, to the contrary notwithstanding * * *.

Again, section 9 contains this power:

> * * * and he may sell gold in any amounts, at home or abroad, in such manner and at such rates and upon such terms and conditions as he may deem most advantageous to the public interest, and the proceeds of any gold so sold shall be covered into the general fund of the Treasury: Provided, however, That the Secretary of the Treasury may sell the gold which is required to be maintained as a reserve or as security for currency issued by the United States only to the extent necessary to maintain such currency at a parity with the gold dollar.

Meaning, of course, this rubber dollar, the flexible measuring stick hereafter referred to.

> SEC. 10. (a) There is hereby created a Foreign Exchange Board for the purpose of administering the stabilization fund hereinafter provided for. * * *
>
> (b) For the sole purpose of stabilizing the exchange value of the dollar in relation to the currencies of foreign governments the Board, directly or through such agencies as it may designate, is authorized, for the account of the fund established in this section, to deal in gold and foreign exchange and such other instruments of credit and securities as it may deem necessary to carry out the purpose of this section.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. What the Senator is now reading is not in the bill up to this time. It is simply an amendment reported by the committee. That amendment has to be acted upon by the Senate. I hope the Senate will reject it.

Mr. AUSTIN. Very well, Mr. President. I assume that the whole bill will have to be acted upon, as well as the amendment; and I am considering the bill in the light most favorable to its proponents—that is, considering it with these modifying amendments included. The remarks which I intend to make addressed to this subject matter would apply with more effectiveness if I dealt with the bill without the amendments; but I am giving the proponents of the bill the benefit of the advantage of considering the bill as modified. The whole matter is in issue here, however, and I shall try to discuss fairly the whole matter, construing the whole bill together, with these proposed amendments included. I do not understand that they have been rejected. They are still pending, are they not?

SEVERAL SENATORS. Yes!

Mr. AUSTIN. Section 11:

The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to issue, with the approval of the President, such rules and regulations as the Secretary may deem necessary or proper to carry out the purposes of this act.

The existing law, by virtue of the provision of an appropriation act giving power to the Executive to inflate the currency, remains in force, excepting as it might be modified by the adoption of this gold bill and by section 12 thereof; and if it were so amended I conceive that it should be read like the following, and I will state that the first paragraph I am about to read is taken from the existing law:

By proclamation to fix the weight of the gold dollar in grains 0.9 fine and also to fix the weight of the silver dollar in gains 0.9 fine at a definite fixed ratio in relation to the gold dollar at such amounts as he finds necessary from his investigation to stabilize domestic prices or to protect the foreign commerce against the adverse effect of depreciated foreign currencies, and to provide for the unlimited coinage of such gold and silver at the ratio so fixed, or, in case the Government of the United States enters into an agreement with any government or governments under the terms of which the ratio between the value of gold and other currency issued by the United States and by any such government or governments is established, the President may fix the weight of the gold dollar in accordance with the ratio so agreed upon, and such gold dollar, the weight of which is so fixed, shall be the standard unit of value, and all forms of money issued or coined by the United States shall be maintained at a parity with this standard, and it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to maintain such parity, but in no event shall the weight of the gold dollar be fixed so as to reduce its present weight by more than 50 percent.

There ends the part taken from the present law. I continue with the proposed addition to it:

Nor shall the weight of the gold dollar be fixed in any event at more than 60 percent of its present weight. The powers of the President specified in this paragraph shall be deemed to be separate, distinct, and continuing powers, and may be exercised by him from time to time—

It will be remembered that that was one of the controversies over that act—severally or together, whenever and as the expressed objects of this section, in his judgment, may require, except that such powers shall expire 2 years after the date of enactment of the Gold Reserve Act of 1934 unless the President shall sooner declare the existing emergency ended, but the President may extend such period for not more than 1 additional year after such date by proclamation recognizing the continuance of such emergency.

These provisions ostentatiously magnify the powers of the Government under which we are temporarily living to the coining of money, regulating the value thereof and of foreign coin, and fixing the standard of weights and measures. The powers to legislate by regulations what currency of the United States shall be redeemed in gold, as stated in section 6; to fix the times and amounts of redemption of gold certificates owned by the Federal Reserve banks, as stated in section 6; to purchase gold in any amount, at home or abroad, with coin or currency of the United States at rates determined by the Executive and Secretary of the Treasury, notwithstanding any law relating to the maintenance of parity of coin or currency to the contrary, as stated in section 8; to sell gold at home or abroad upon their own terms and at their own rates, in any amount excepting the gold required to be maintained as a reserve or as security for currency issued by the United States, as stated in section 9; to sell even that gold so reserved if they are of the opinion that it should be sold to maintain such currency at parity with the gold dollar—that is, the dollar fixed from time to time at perhaps various standards of gold content, as stated in section 9; and the power to legislate rules and regulations to carry out the purposes of the entire act, as set out in section 11—all these powers are not limited in time.

That is, that policy fixed from time to time through a complete reconstruction of the exercise of government by the Legislature of the Government—the Congress—so that an entirely different department of government shall for all time, and until the law is repealed, divest the Congress of the power to do these vital things so important to the very nationality as well as the prosperity of the Government.

The powers I have enumerated are not confined to an emergency. These great powers are granted permanently. They can be exercised many times and at any time. Time is fixed in the case of every one of them, to be not at the discretion of the representatives of the people in Congress, to whom was granted the power, as well as the duty, of ascertaining the time when these things should be done. The fixing of the time is turned over entirely to the Executive and the administrative officers under him.

This other power, the power to fix the weight of the gold dollar at not less than 50 percent and not more than 60 percent of its present weight, provided by section 12, and the power to employ a stabilization fund of $2,000,000,000 to deal in gold and foreign exchange and other instruments of credit and securities would be limited, if this bill were enacted as proposed to be amended, to a temporary period by the Senate amendments, as provided by sections 10 and 12. The period would be temporary to the extent of 2 years, at any rate, with the possibility of it being 3 years. I believe there are those within the sound of my voice who would not call that temporary, but I choose to debate the question, taking it in the light most favorable to the proponents of the bill.

These powers, together with the vesting of the title to and possession of all monetary gold within the boundaries of the United States in the Government, marshal all responsibility for the control of credit conditions and all power to regulate the value of money and of foreign coin in the United States into the judgment and authority of a few men who were never intended by the people and who were never authorized by the people to promulgate the people's primary policy respecting this vital necessity of social, economic, and political welfare.

Congress was charged with that specific duty. By this measure we are about to transmit that duty and that power to some person, a thing the people never contemplated.

By this proposed act credit authority and fiscal policy are directly exposed to political pressure and are united, whereas they ought to be separated. The independence of the banking system of this country from political agencies of the Government, which was a theory of the Federal Reserve Act, is broken by the act.

Regulation of the value of money and of foreign coin is a primary function.

There is the point of controversy between me and the distinguished junior Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], who cited a delegation of authority by Congress to another body in the interstate commerce cases.

I repeat, regulation of the value of money and of foreign coin is a primary function. Once that fact is established, the controversy is as to whether this act of ours is unconstitutional or not.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GEORGE in the chair). Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. Since the Senator mentioned the discourse of the junior Senator from Texas, I am going to take the liberty of asking him a question.

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. Does the Senator contend that by the passage of the pending measure Congress would part with its power to regulate the value of money? Can it not amend it or modify it or withdraw it at any time?

Mr. AUSTIN. Just as long as this remained the law, Congress would have abdicated that duty and power. Of course, Congress may repeal the law, but what I claim is that Congress may not amend the Constitution of the United States by the simple act of passing through the two Houses of Congress a bill or a resolution by a majority vote; and if we are about to enter upon the transfer of these exclusive powers to an executive department, let us submit the matter to the people. It is a primary legislative function which they have delegated in the Constitution to the Congress, and we have no right to transfer it in the way proposed.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. AUSTIN. Certainly.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator says that as long as this act remained in existence, unmodified, unrepealed, Congress would have abdicated its power. Is not that true of any act we pass? When we legally enact a measure and it becomes a law, is it not the law until Congress modifies it or changes it?

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I am trying to express the opinion that an attempt to delegate a constitutional power is ineffective. If a measure passed by the Congress is within the Constitution, it becomes the law, and will remain the law until repealed, of course.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield once more? I will then not further bother him.

Mr. AUSTIN. Certainly; I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Constitution says—

> The Congress shall have power * * * to coin money * * *.

Is it the Senator's view that we have to coin it here in the Senate Chamber ourselves, or can we delegate the coinage to the mint or to the Treasury?

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, that is just the trouble in distinguishing between the cases which were referred to yesterday by the Senator from Texas and the present case. I have before me a fairly large number of instances where powers have heretofore been delegated by Congress, and where the action has been approved by the Supreme Court of the United States for the reason that the delegations of power did not involve a primary function of the legislature. Congress has the exclusive power to determine primary and fundamental rules for the governing of future conduct. This power may not be devolved upon any other agency whatever; but, having exercised this power by promulgating a primary principle, Congress may then transmit to agencies created by it, or existing already under the Constitution, the function of administration, even the function of legislation in matters of subordinate degree relating to the primary rules, in order that they may be carried into effect.

Those powers are very clearly distinguished in the various cases to which I refer. The powers which have been held to be justifiably transmitted are those reposed in the Interstate Commerce Commission, for example, to require railroads to keep accounts in the manner specified by the Commission and to institute a lower rate for a longer than shorter haul; also the power of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to make regulations pertaining to sale of unbranded oleomargarine; the power of the Federal Reserve Board to permit national banks to act as trustees, and so forth; the power of the Interstate Commerce Commission to suspend rules as to car service, and to make such reasonable regulations in regard thereto as would best promote the interest of the public and commerce.

Of course it needs no argument to demonstrate clearly that all the powers exercised by the Interstate Commerce Commission are incidental to the great power of regulating commerce.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. Let me ask the Senator if he does not think that the Congress delegated power to the Federal Reserve banks when it gave them the power to conduct open-market operations, by the sale of Government bonds in the open market? As a matter of fact has not the Congress always delegated its power to coin money and fix the value thereof?

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, that double-barreled question cannot be answered in one word. There are two questions asked by the Senator. I will say no to the first one. Congress did not delegate and abdicate. This bill, if passed, would be a complete act of abdication.

Answering the second question, I would say no; Congress never has tried before to delegate its power to regulate the value of money. What I am trying to demonstrate is that the regulation of the value of money is a primary function of Congress. Why is it a primary function of Congress? Because of the extent of that power; because of the effect of that power upon the vitality of the Government, upon the very existence of it in time of peace and in time of war. In order to emphasize the contention that this power is a primary one, I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that it is absolutely necessary to pass legislation and exercise this power in order to exercise the sovereignty that is necessary in time of war.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. BONE. I wonder if I understood the Senator aright when I thought I understood him to say that he regarded it as an abdication on the part of Congress for Congress to enact the Federal Reserve Act?

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I am not aware that I made any such statement.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, I understood that is what the Senator meant when he said Congress abdicated its powers.

Mr. AUSTIN. If I did make such a statement, I will retract it instantly. I had no intention of making such a statement. I must have misunderstood the question of the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WHEELER. What I asked the Senator was, if he did not think that the Congress had delegated its power to coin money and regulate the value thereof to a private institution when it passed the Federal Reserve Act.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, my answer to that would be, no; it has not.

Mr. WHEELER. Would the Senator say that the effect of the Federal Reserve Act was not to regulate the value of the money of the United States?

Mr. AUSTIN. The value fixed in the act itself?

Mr. WHEELER. No; the value fixed by the operations of the act. I should say the effect of the Federal Reserve Act, when the Federal Reserve banks can contract by their open-market operations the currency of the United States or expand the currency of the United States, is to regulate the value of that money with reference to commodities in the United States of America.

Mr. AUSTIN. I take the position, Mr. President, that the transmission of the power to regulate the value of money is unconstitutional; and if the act described by the Senator from Montana has that effect, I should think it was an unconstitutional act on the part of Congress, because that power is a primary power with which the people invested the Congress.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator another question?

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes.

Mr. WHEELER. I take it that what the Senator thinks should be done is for the Congress of the United States to establish a bank of issue of its own. Is that correct?

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I have not discussed anything of the kind, and in the answers I have made heretofore I have assumed that the Senator from Montana realized that the value of the dollar was fixed when the Federal Reserve bank was created, fixed by law and act of Congress.

Mr. WHEELER. I did not catch the whole of the Senator's statement. Does the Senator say that the value of the dollar was fixed.

Mr. AUSTIN. The value of the dollar was fixed by act of Congress.

Mr. WHEELER. Does the Senator take the position that the amount of currency in circulation does not fix the value of the dollar with reference to commodities and other things in this country?

Mr. AUSTIN. If I understand the Senator from Montana, he is talking about credit rather than fixing the value of money.

Mr. WHEELER. No; I am talking about money, not credit.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Vermont yield to me?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. FESS. The Federal Reserve Act permits the issuance of Federal Reserve notes upon the basis of a certain reserve. That reserve is in gold and assessable securities. The amount of gold in a dollar, which fixes its value, is provided under law which the Federal Reserve has no authority to modify in any degree. The mere fact of issuing more money or less money, giving it more or less purchasing power, is not fixing the value of the dollar. The value of the dollar is fixed by the act preceding the Federal Reserve Act.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I appreciate the contribution of the learned Senator from Ohio.

Mr. WHEELER. If the Senator from Vermont will further pardon me, I will say that if we issue more currency it does have the effect of fixing the value of our money. It cannot be otherwise. The contention has been made on the floor of the Senate that, because of the inflation of the currency of Germany, it cheapened the value of their money; and there is not any question about it. When France issued more currency before devaluing the gold franc, it cheapened the value of French money; they cheapened the French franc before they ever devalued it. They cheapened it to the point where the franc was worth only something like 2 or 3 cents, and then they revalued it upon a basis of about 4 cents; in other words, they depreciated it 80 percent by the revaluation of the gold content of the franc; but previous to that time, by issuing more currency, they had cheapened the price of their currency without changing the content of the gold franc in any degree whatsoever.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, continuing the subject which I was discussing, I repeat that the regulation of the value of money and of foreign coin is a primary function, and I wish to demonstrate that upon that power turns the question largely whether this proposed act is constitutional in respect to this function. I claim that it is so, because such regulation is necessary to the proper functioning of sovereignty. The experience of the Government in all wars, for example, evidences the dependence of the effective military forces upon money and the control of these powers which are vested expressly by the Constitution in the Congress of the United States; indeed, the experience with this power during the Revolution for Independence proved it to be so great that the triumphant liberty was dependent upon it.

In the Legal Tender cases, Mr. Justice Bradley, concurring in the majority decision, gives us this very interesting account, to be found in Twelfth Wallace, at page 557:

> * * * In this country the habit had prevailed from the commencement of the eighteenth century of issuing bills of credit; and the Revolution of Independence had just been achieved, in great degree, by the means of similar bills issued by the Continental Congress. These bills were generally made a legal tender for the payment of all debts, public and private, until, by the influence of English merchants at home, Parliament prohibited the issue of bills with that quality. This prohibition was first exercised in 1751 against the New England Colonies, and subsequently, in 1763, against all the Colonies. It was one of the causes of discontent which finally culminated in the Revolution. Dr. Franklin endeavored to obtain a repeal of the prohibitory acts, but only succeeded in obtaining from Parliament, in 1773, an act authorizing the Colonies to make their bills receivable for taxes and debts due to the Colony that issued them. At the breaking out of the war the Continental Congress commenced the issue of bills of credit, and the war was carried on without other resources for 3 or 4 years. It may be said with truth that we owe our national independence to the use of this fiscal agency. Dr. Franklin, in a letter to a friend, dated from Paris in April 1779, after deploring the depreciation which the Continental currency had undergone, said: "The only consolation under the evil is that the public debt is proportionately diminished by the depreciation, and this by a kind of imperceptible tax, everyone having paid a part of it in the fall of value that took place between the receiving and paying such sums as passed through his hands." He adds: "This effect of paper currency is not understood this side of the water. And, indeed, the whole is a mystery even to the politicians, how we have been able to continue a war 4 years without money, and how we could pay with paper that had no previously fixed fund appropriated specially to redeem it. This currency, as we manage it, is a wonderful machine. It performs its office when we issue it; it pays and clothes troops and provides victuals and ammunition." In a subsequent letter of October 9, 1780, he said: "They [the Congress] issued an immense quantity of paper bills to pay, clothe, arm, and feed their troops and fit out ships; and with this paper, without taxes for the first 3 years, they fought and battled one of the most powerful nations of Europe." The Continental bills were not made legal tenders at first, but in January 1777 the Congress passed resolutions declaring that they ought to pass current in all payments and be deemed in value equal to the same nominal sums in Spanish dollars, and that anyone refusing so to receive them ought to be deemed an enemy to the liberties of the United States, and recommending to the legislatures of the several States to pass laws to that effect.

Again this distinguished jurist says, at page 563:

> It is absolutely essential to independent national existence that government should have a firm hold on the two great sovereign instrumentalities of the sword and the purse and the right to wield them without restriction on occasions of national peril. In certain emergencies government must have at its command not only the personal services—the bodies and lives—of its citizens but the lesser, though not less essential, power of absolute control over the resources of the country. Its armies must be filled and its navies manned by the citizens in person. Its material of war, its munitions, equipment, and commissary stores must come from the industry of the country. This can only be stimulated into activity by a proper financial system, especially as regards the currency.

And again he says, as shown at page 567:

> I do not say that it is a war power or that it is only to be called into exercise in time of war, for other public exigencies may arise in the history of a nation which may make it expedient and imperative to exercise it. But of the occasions when, and of the times how long, it shall be exercised and in force, it is for the legislative department of the Government to judge.

That is the whole point of my argument. I could not equal that argument with anything that I might write upon the subject. It is for the legislative department of the Government to judge. This is a primary function of government, delegated to Congress, vested in the Congress. It is a primary function which cannot be devolved upon any others.

Mr. President, the great sacrifice of the people of this country in the provision of money through Liberty bond purchases brings the fact home most intimately. The levy and payment of taxes, the making of contracts, the support of life—every activity of society—persuades the national mind that the powers granted to Congress by article I, section 8, clause 5, of the Constitution and abdicated by this act, are strictly legislative—legislative in the highest sense. Such primary or fundamental rules for the governing of future conduct may not be devolved upon any other agency by an act of Congress.

Chief Justice Marshall held in Wayman v. Southard (10 Wheat. (23 U.S.) 1), at 42 (6 L.Ed. 253 (1825)), cited with approval in United States v. Guinand (220 U.S. 506 at 517, 55 L.Ed. 563 (1911)):

> It will not be contended that Congress can delegate to the courts, or to any other tribunals, powers which are strictly and exclusively legislative.

This premise is important, as shown by the colloquy between the distinguished Senator from Texas and myself, because Congress, having promulgated the primary principle, may delegate authority to establish policies subordinate to and consistent with the congressional pronouncement.

The great expounder of the Constitution made this apparent by the holding in the Wayman case (ib. 43):

> The line has not been exactly drawn which separates those important subjects, which must be entirely regulated by the legislature itself, from those of less interest, in which a general provision may be made and power given to those who are to act under such general provisions to fill up the details. To determine the character of the power given to the courts (in this debate the Executive) by the Process Act (in this debate the Gold Reserve Act of 1934), we must inquire into its extent.

Such inquiry here proves that this authority is not limited to forms and modes of administration. It is not confined to powers which could not be efficaciously exercised by Congress. It is not the mere power to determine some fact or state of things on which enforcement depends, or else the process of government would be stopped. It is not the execution in detail of the legislative power to coin money, regulate the value thereof and of foreign coin, and fix the standard of weights and measures.

The authority here granted is to determine the fundamental rules themselves for governing the future conduct of the fiscal affairs of this country.

Hereafter permanently—not for the period of an emergency—shall gold certificates owned by the Federal Reserve banks be redeemed? Section 6 says that policy will be determined, not by Congress, but by the Secretary of the Treasury. This affects the purchasing power of every kind of currency of the United States. This section expressly admits the vast scope of this power by the words—

> In such amounts as, in the judgment of the Secretary of the Treasury, are necessary to maintain the equal purchasing power of every kind of currency of the United States (act, p. 11, lines 12 to 15).

Now let us test this question again. Shall currency of the United States be redeemed in gold? That takes us right back to the fundamental question of whether we are on or off the gold standard, that great general policy which affects the welfare of every person in the United States of America. Shall currency in the United States be redeemed in gold? Who ought to answer that question under the Constitution? There is but one reply, and that is that the Congress of the United States shall determine whether currency shall be redeemed in gold. But what does this measure, this gold-reserve measure of 1934, provide? Section 6 gives the answer. Yes; currency of the United States shall be redeemed in gold if the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, says so; but "no" if those two men do not say so. There is no time lock on that extraordinary power in this bill. It cannot be justified as an emergency proposition. It is permanent.

At this point I invite attention to the fact that the bill also temporarily gives this power, namely, that the weight of the gold dollar for the next 2 years can be reduced 16 percent or it can be lifted 20 percent, at the will of the President, depending upon whether the President fixes 60 percent or 50 percent of its present weight. This is legislative power of the highest magnitude. This is practically regulating and manipulating the value of money.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. FESS. I have been somewhat confused as to the effect of this particular measure on the act in which we gave authority to the President to devalue the dollar 50 percent, but not beyond 50 percent. The pending measure provides that he cannot devalue above 60 percent. The maximum limit is fixed. It does not say he cannot go below 50 percent. Other parts of the bill repeal certain existing statutes where it is provided "notwithstanding" so and so. It is an open question that has been discussed pretty generally. Will the effect of fixing the maximum above which he cannot go remove the minimum of the present existing authority that he has not yet exercised?

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, this is the first time that particular question has come to my attention. I would not be so intemperate as to endeavor to answer it upon my feet without studying the wording of the section and its setting in the bill. I will confess that I have the clear impression that the law which will be created by the passage of this bill, relating to the power to regulate money by the President, would be in addition to the law which was enacted at the last session, namely, paragraph D–2 of section 43, title III of the act approved May 12, 1933, Public, No. 10, Seventy-third Congress, and that the powers here granted are separate. It may be construed either as separate or in conjunction with those powers and therefore that they do not affect, other than to create a top limit, the power of the President to increase or diminish the percentage.

Mr. FESS. If the Senator will permit me, it seems to me that probably would be the ordinary construction of the language, that the present existing law does not fix any maximum limit, but it does fix a minimum in that he cannot go below 50 percent, while the proposal is to fix the maximum; that is, he may go to 50 percent, but he cannot go above 60 percent. The question with me is whether that provision removes the minimum of the existing law? I think it is quite important.

Mr. AUSTIN. I am not competent to answer that question at this instant. I am very glad to have it brought to my attention and I shall certainly investigate it.

Proceeding upon the thesis that the clause conferring upon Congress the power to coin money and regulate its value, as well as to regulate the value of everything coined, creates an exclusive power of primary magnitude; I wish to invite attention to just a few cases.

Here is the case of United States v. Marigold (4th Howard, 560, 567), in which there was the following holding, among other things:

> But the twentieth section of the act of Congress of March 3, 1825, or rather those provisions of that section brought to the view of this Court by the second question certified, are not properly referable to commercial regulations, merely as such; nor to considerations of ordinary commercial advantage. They appertain rather to the execution of an important trust invested by the Constitution, and to the obligation to fulfill that trust on the part of the Government, namely, the trust and the duty of creating and maintaining a uniform and pure metallic standard of value throughout the Union. The power of coining money and of regulating its value was delegated to Congress by the Constitution for the very purpose, as assigned by the framers of that instrument, of creating and preserving the uniformity and purity of such a standard of value; and on account of the impossibility which was foreseen of otherwise preventing the inequalities and the confusion necessarily incident to different views of policy, which in different communities would be brought to bear on this subject. The power to coin money being thus given to Congress, founded on public necessity, it must carry with it the correlative power of protecting the creature and object of that power. It cannot be imputed to wise and practical statesmen, nor is it consistent with common sense—> that they should have vested this high and exclusive authority, and with a view to objects partaking of the magnitude of the authority itself, only to be rendered immediately vain and useless, as must have been the case had the Government been left disabled and impotent as to the only means of securing the objects in contemplation.

Note that language—

I omit at this point, and continue:

> Whatever functions Congress are, by the Constitution, authorized to perform, they are, when the public good requires, bound to perform; and on this principle, having emitted a circulating medium, a standard of value indispensable for the purposes of the community, and for the action of the Government itself, they are accordingly authorized and bound in duty to prevent its debasement and expulsion, and the destruction of the general confidence and convenience, by the influx and substitution of a spurious coin in lieu of the constitutional currency.

What language can be conceived that would more clearly show that this power, so definitely expressed in the Constitution, is a power of the highest degree, a power that cannot be devolved by Congress upon any other agency of government?

Again, as further evidence that this is a legislative power of the highest magnitude, I call attention to those great cases known as the Legal Tender cases, in Seventy-ninth United States Reports (12 Wallace), 457.

Mr. Justice Strong, delivering the opinion of the Court, held, as shown at page 545:

> * * * Whatever power there is over the currency is vested in Congress. If the power to declare what is money is not in Congress, it is annihilated.

And again, at page 547:

> * * * The Constitution does not ordain what metals may be coined, or prescribe what the legal value of the metals, when coined, shall correspond at all with their intrinsic value in the market. Nor does it even affirm that Congress may declare anything to be a legal tender for the payment of debts. Confessedly the power to regulate the value of money coined, and of foreign coins, is not exhausted by the first regulation. More than once in our history has the regulation been changed without any denial of the power of Congress to change it, and it seems to have been left to Congress to determine alike what metal shall be coined, its purity, and how far its statutory value, as money, shall correspond, from time to time, with the market value of the same metal as bullion.

And again, at page 554:

* * * The questions involved are constitutional questions of the most vital importance to the Government and to the public at large.

Mr. Justice Bradley, concurring in that opinion so ably expressed by Mr. Justice Strong, says among other things, as follows, at page 562:

* * * Currency is a national necessity. The operations of the Government, as well as private transactions, are wholly dependent upon it.

Understand, my thesis is a very simple one; namely, that this function is a primary function, a purely legislative function, which cannot be delegated.

Again, at page 564:

* * * What that medium shall be, what its character and qualities, will depend upon the greatness of the exigency and the degree of promptitude which it demands. These are legislative questions.

And again at page 564:

These views are exhibited, not for the purpose of showing that the power is a desirable one, and therefore ought to be assumed, much less for the purpose of giving judgment on the expediency of its exercise in any particular case, but for the purpose of showing—that it is one of those vital and essential powers inhering in every national sovereignty and necessary to its self-preservation.

Just what I am trying to show here—

Again he says, at page 565, after discussing the English law:

* * * Subsequent acts of Parliament fixed the standard of purity and weight in the coinage of the realm, which has not been altered for a hundred and fifty years past. But the same authority which fixed it in the time of Queen Anne is competent at any time to change it. Whether it shall be changed or not is a matter of mere legislative discretion. And such is undoubtedly the public law of this country.

These two opinions are from the majority of the Court; and I call attention to the significant fact that the dissenting Justices agreed with the majority upon the primary character of this power.

The Chief Justice was one of the dissenting Justices. At page 585 he said:

* * * Mr. Webster expressed not only his opinion but the universal and settled conviction of the country when he said: "Most unquestionably there is no legal tender and there can be no legal tender in this country, under the authority of this Government or any other, but gold and silver, either the coinage of our mints or foreign coin at rates regulated by Congress. This is a constitutional principle perfectly plain and of the very highest importance."

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator accept Mr. Webster's view that both gold and silver are the money of the Constitution, and neither one of them can be destroyed constitutionally?

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I do not accept that view.

Mr. BORAH. I suspected the able Senator would not follow Webster all the way.

Mr. AUSTIN. No; I am quoting from the opinion of this distinguished Chief Justice of the United States to afford evidence of the high character and the extent of the power which this bill, the Gold Reserve Act of 1934, purports to transmit from the Congress to the Chief Executive and others under his control.

Mr. Justice Clifford, another one of the dissenting Justices, expressed the same sentiment in this way, as appears at page 587:

Power to fix the standard of weights and measures is evidently a power of comparatively wide discretion, but the power to regulate the value of the money authorized by the Constitution to be coined is a definite and precise grant of power, admitting of very little discretion in its exercise. * * *

Again, at page 602:

Interests of such magnitude and pervading importance as those involved in providing for a uniform standard of value throughout the Union were manifestly entitled to the protection of the national authority, and in view of the evils experienced for the want of such a standard during the War of the Revolution, when the country was inundated with floods of depreciated paper, the members of the Convention who framed the Constitution did not hesitate to confine the power to Congress not only to coin money and regulate the value thereof but also the power to regulate the value of foreign coin, which was denied to the Congress of the Confederation.

And, again, at page 622:

Exclusive power to coin money is certainly vested in Congress. * * *

And, again, at page 633:

Constitutional powers of the kind last mentioned—that is, the power to ordain a standard of value and to provide a circulating medium for a legal tender—are subject to no mutations of any kind. They are the same in peace and in war. What the grants of power meant when the Constitution was adopted and ratified they mean still, and their meaning can never be changed except as described in the fifth article providing for amendments, as the Constitution "is a law for rulers and people, equally in war and in peace, and covers with the shield of its protection all classes of men and under all circumstances."

Mr. Justice Field dissenting, at page 653, quotes Daniel Webster as follows:

* * * "We all know", says Mr. Webster, "that the establishment of a sound and uniform currency was one of the greatest ends contemplated in the adoption of the present Constitution. If we could now fully explore all the motives of those who framed and those who supported that Constitution, perhaps we should hardly find a more powerful one than this."

Again, at page 675, we find this:

* * * The power to coin money, as already declared by this Court, is a great trust devolved upon Congress. * * *

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Vermont allow me to interrogate him along the line of one of the decisions to which he has referred? I find myself interested in the suggestion made by the Senator from Vermont that Congress, and only Congress, as he would have it, can prescribe the matter of measuring the value of the money. Assuming that to be true, I will ask the able Senator, conscious of his ability as a lawyer, recognized as such throughout this country, when Congress has acted and chooses an executive officer, say the Secretary of the Treasury, to carry out the provisions that it may ordain, would not the Senator regard that an act of Congress? May I ask the Senator whether he recalls the Supreme Court of the United States decision in an oleomargarine case arising in Massachusetts? He being an eminent New Englander will recall that in that decision the Supreme Court of the United States held, it being an oleomargarine decision, if I am not in error, that where Congress enacted a law and transmitted to the Department of Agriculture or to an executive officer of the Government the carrying out of the act and the fulfilling of the act, that was an act of Congress. I might ask the Senator whether he concurs in that, and whether his mind still opposes the granting to the Secretary of the Treasury, or some other official of the Government, the power here sought to be delegated. If it is done by Congress, would not that be an act of Congress, as has been proposed in the pending bill?

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, as I understand the question of the learned Senator from Illinois, whose memory I believe is extraordinary in its precision and power, he must refer to the case of First National Bank of Bay City v. Fellows (244 U.S. 416; 37 Sup. Ct. 734; 61 L.Ed. 1233). If he does, that case hold substantially as he has mentioned, and I understand it to mean simply this, that where the Commissioner of Internal Revenue was authorized by Congress to make regulations pertaining to the sale of unbranded oleomargarine, the court upheld that delegation as one within the minor and incidental powers of legislation. There is that distinction. It is the line of demarcation between those powers which can be delegated and those powers which cannot be delegated. It depends on the extent. The Court has drawn that line of demarcation in every case, and, of course, handled every case upon its own merits and with respect to the individual facts.

It would be intemperate for me, I believe, to undertake to lay down a general rule by which we would draw the line. Therefore, I have attempted to discuss the pending bill with reference to its extent. What is the extent of the power undertaken to be granted by the bill? Is it one of those minor powers which was upheld in the oleomargarine case, or is it a primary power which is exclusive and which no other agency of the people can exercise but the Congress of the United States? To that thesis I have directed all that I have said, recognizing, of course, the principle enunciated by the learned Senator from Illinois. I am trying to bring out the distinction between what is attempted to be done by the proposed gold act of 1934 and what was done by Congress with respect to the regulation of the trade in oleomargarine.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McGILL in the chair). Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. FESS. Does the Senator make no distinction between the oleomargarine case and the bill before us? This bill would delegate to the President discretionary power. He is not to be told specifically what he is to do; he is to be given a leeway; there is to be discretion, and he can devalue between a maximum and a minimum. What will be done is wholly to be determined by him. It is a question purely of the exercise of discretion. Is that on a par with the oleomargarine case?

Mr. AUSTIN. I think not, Mr. President. In the one case, the oleomargarine case, there is a delegation of incidental power, a mere filling up of details, the lesser functions of administration. In this case there is a determination of that great question of whether the currency of this country shall be redeemed in gold or not. There is the entire subject of the regulation of the value of the money placed in the hands of a board, who have a right to speculate with $2,000,000,000, and run it up and run it down by means of that tremendous power and authority which money to that extent possesses.

Mr. FESS. The feature of our Government which differentiates it from every other form of government is that we have three coordinate departments, and they are equal. If Congress delegates to a subordinate the doing of an act, it may be considered the same as Congress doing it. If Congress should delegate to an equal coordinate power, such as the President, the power to do this thing, would the President, when he does it, say that it was Congress doing it, or would it be the President doing it?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator from Vermont yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. I will yield to the Senator from Arkansas after answering the question of the learned Senator from Ohio. I should say there is a very marked distinction between an administrative board created by Congress to execute a primary policy which has been declared by the Congress, such as the board which undertook to regulate the traffic in oleomargarine, and a coordinate department of government. Of course, there is a tremendous distinction. I am trying to consider the problem from the standpoint of recognizing that we are dealing here with a national government, federal in its character, in which these great powers have been separated for very obvious purposes.

I now yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator does not contravene what seems to me to be the well-established doctrine that as to any power conferred upon us by the Constitution the Congress may choose its agent and delegate to him its authority, provided it defines the rule to govern its agent. Is that not a correct statement of the holding of the authorities?

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I cannot assent to that, unless the governing rule is defined. I make the claim that Congress has the exclusive power to determine primary or fundamental rules for the governing of future conduct with respect to our currency and our credit, and that this power may not be devolved upon any other agency. Of course, if that power should be exercised and the great policy declared, Congress could, of course, do the thing which the learned leader of the majority has mentioned, and delegate the filling in of details and the performance of administrative functions, and even legislating upon minor matters.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Will the Senator yield to a further question?

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I have been confused during the course of the Senator's remarks by an apparent distinction, but to my mind not a clear distinction, between the power conferred on the Congress to coin money, and so forth, and other powers expressly conferred on the Congress. Is it the Senator's contention that a different rule with respect to delegation of authority applies to the power "to coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin, and fix the standard of weights and measures", than that which applies to other powers of the Congress?

Mr. AUSTIN. Not at all, Mr. President.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Then, insofar as Congress can delegate its power, it may delegate to the same extent and in accordance with the same principles that it may delegate, for instance, the power to raise and support armies, or the power to borrow money on the credit of the United States, or the power to lay and collect taxes, and so forth?

Mr. AUSTIN. Oh, no; I could not answer that question in the affirmative. Every test applied to the question must involve——

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I cannot hear the Senator, and I am doing my best to hear him. I have been unable to hear either the Senator from Vermont or the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I regret that that is so, but I have been trying to make myself heard, and I will try harder.

The test of whether the specific power under consideration is one that must be executed exclusively by the Congress and may not be devolved upon another is, What is the extent of that power? What will be the effect of that power upon the sovereignty of this country, upon the welfare of its people? That test must be applied to every one of the powers which the learned Senator has mentioned. They cannot be gathered up by the handfuls and compared at all. Every one of them should be taken separately and examined carefully. My discussion has been thus far to make the law premise—I intend to call attention to the fact premise in a moment—the law premise that the power to coin money and fix the value thereof is a power of the highest magnitude, purely legislative in its character, which cannot, which may not be devolved upon the President or any other agency of government whatsoever.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I now think I understand the Senator, but I do not understand his last statement with reference to his answer to my first question. The Senator then does distinguish between the power to coin money and other express powers conferred by the Constitution on the Congress with respect to the right of the Congress to delegate its authority? The Senator does not contend, of course, that the Congress cannot delegate its powers under certain conditions and within certain limitations? Does he contend that there can be no delegation of authority with respect to coining money and regulating the value thereof?

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I think I have already discussed that question at length. I contend that minor powers may be delegated to another agency to carry out, to fill in detail, or where they cannot efficaciously be executed by Congress alone or to meet an emergency. There are numerous decisions to which I have already called attention, upholding the delegation of an inferior power.

The point I am making is that the particular power involved in the pending bill is one which has been held by the courts to be of the highest magnitude. In every instance the test must be the extent of the power. We cannot take a handful of different powers; they must be taken out singly and each one of them put to the test, What is the extent of this power? Is it the promulgation of a rule of conduct that shall govern the future of this country with respect to a primary thing, or is it the creation of rules and regulations relating only to some detail, or the creating of an agency to carry out and perform and administer that rule? There is the line of distinction. I have pointed out a case where the court held that there cannot, on account of the complex nature of this problem, be a line drawn generally which can be laid down between the several powers.

I now proceed, Mr. President, to consider very briefly——

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. As I understand the Senator's position, it is that Congress cannot delegate legislative power to the President?

Mr. AUSTIN. A purely legislative power cannot be delegated.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Has anybody made the suggestion that it is competent for Congress to delegate purely legislative powers?

Mr. AUSTIN. That is the suggestion in this bill. That is the defect of this bill.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I understand that the Senator raises an objection to the bill on the ground that, as he contends, it does constitute an invalid delegation of legislative power. Nobody questions that under some circumstances the Congress may delegate its authority, if it defines the rules and fixes the proper limitation on the power of its agent. It may select any agent it chooses. But what I cannot understand is the relevancy of a declaration of a principle of law commonly accepted that Congress cannot delegate its legislative authority to the President. We all understand that the executive, the legislative, and the judicial departments are separate. Their functions are separate. But the courts have held, over and over again, that the Congress can choose an agent for the administration of the authority conferred by it, fix the rules of the conduct of the agent, and when it does so it is a valid delegation of authority. The real question, I take it, is whether this proposed legislation constitutes a valid delegation of legislative authority.

Mr. AUSTIN. Certainly. I am undertaking to lay before the Senate the evidence which appeals to my reason, attempting to show that this is not a valid delegation, for the reason that it undertakes to transmit the function of passing upon and creating the rule of conduct of this country with respect to the value of money, one of the most vital functions of legislation which we have set.

I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. As I understand the Senator's position, it is that we cannot delegate legislative power, and that this is a delegation of legislative power to the President.

Mr. AUSTIN. That is my position.

Mr. BORAH. Has the Senator in his discussion referred to the decision of the Supreme Court in the case where we delegated, as I conceive, the taxing power to the President of the United States in the flexible tariff law.

Mr. AUSTIN. I am not conscious that I have done so. I have a collection of cases here to which I have referred and which I intend, at least, to put in the RECORD.

Mr. BORAH. It has always seemed to me, with all due respect to that great tribunal, that when we created the Tariff Commission and gave it its power, together with the President, to deal with the tariff, that we were delegating legislative power, and with reference to a subject equally vital to that of coining money, to wit, raising taxes. In the light of that decision no one can define the delegation of legislative power, if some pretended rule is laid down for the exercise of the power delegated.

Mr. AUSTIN. There is where the point of controversy would arise. I am maintaining with respect to this power that it is of such magnitude that it cannot be constitutionally delegated. I am not discussing the power to regulate the amount of tariffs between certain limits. I have not examined that question for this purpose. I believe that I have referred to that case, however, and that it will be found in the RECORD.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a suggestion?

Mr. AUSTIN. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. REED. I might suggest that the rule is that the legislature can delegate its power in the sense that it can authorize its agent to act for it in a particular way under a particular combination of circumstances. In other words, it furnishes a rule of action. The fixing of rates upon railways is a legislative act, and the delegation of that power to the Interstate Commerce Commission would not have been valid had we not furnished a rule of action to control the fixing of the rates by the Commission. The same was true of the delegation to the President in the case of the flexible tariff, and that is why the Supreme Court sustained the delegation there.

The trouble with the proposal in the pending bill is that power is delegated, but no rule of action is prescribed.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. That is the point of controversy. We take the position that the rule is prescribed.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. It seems to me that the rule of conduct here is quite as accurate and quite as well defined as it was with reference to the creating of the Tariff Commission. It will be recalled that the framers of the Constitution were very particular to designate that measures relating to taxes should originate with a particular body of the Congress, and yet with no other rule than that which we have here—that is, between certain limits—they were given authority to really establish tariffs.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I am not attempting to argue from this case over into some other case. I intend to adhere as closely as I can to the problem which is right in hand. I might on some future occasion be glad to discuss the tariff question.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a further question in pursuance of the thought that was in my mind when I first interrupted the Senator?

Mr. AUSTIN. I am glad to yield further to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I had in mind the power vested in the Congress to coin money, and so forth, the power to levy taxes, imposts, and excises. I had in mind the course that has been taken with respect to the imposition of tariff duties, the changes that may be made, and the manner in which they may be made. What I should like to know is whether the Senator thinks, in the rule with respect to the delegation of power, there should be made any substantial distinction between the power to coin money, and so forth, and the power to levy taxes, and so forth? Would the same rule apply to both those powers?

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, there is not in the line of reasoning I am following. To sustain my thesis it is not necessary to say that the delegation of some other power under some other law or for another object and purpose may be found to be unconstitutional in order to find this one so. There is no difficulty, however, in laying down the general distinction between those powers which may be delegated and those which may not be delegated. I have done that in a long discussion here, for which I apologize, for I fear that I have already taken too much of the time of the Senate; but, briefly, I would summarize in a few words——

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me before he makes his summary?

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes; I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. STEIWER. I very respectfully submit that the real question is not the difference between two of the constitutional powers of Congress, but the real question is whether any of these great powers may be delegated to the President or to any other agency. It seems worth observing that the courts of the country at no time have said that Congress can delegate its taxing power. In the tariff cases, to which reference was made just now by other Senators, there is not even a suggestion that Congress may validly delegate its taxing power. It was held in the Hampton case—which I think is one of the cases to which reference was made, although I believe it has not been identified by name—that, so far as the flexible provision of the tariff act was concerned, when Congress laid down a rule, namely, that the tariff rate should represent the difference between the cost of production at home and abroad, and established a procedure for the ascertainment of the fact, that did not constitute a delegation of the taxing power; and it was upon that ground, and not upon the ground that it was the taxing power that was under consideration, that the act of Congress was sustained.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. STEIWER. May I go just a little further, and then I will be glad to be interrupted, with the consent of the Senator from Vermont? In that decision a majority of the Court founded its case, in part, at least, upon the earlier decision which involved, I think, the tariff law of 1890. I am referring to the case of Fields against Clark. It was there held, in language so plain that I do not see how anyone can misunderstand it, that, although Congress could not delegate this important legislative power, if it prescribes a rule of policy, and merely leaves to the Executive the administrative duty of finding a fact, that the Executive may find that fact and may by proclamation put the rule into effect. In that case the foundation of the favorable decision was not that the Congress could delegate any part of its taxing power, but the case proceeded upon the theory that the Congress had not, in fact, delegated any part of its legislative power, but had merely authorized the Executive to perform an administrative function.

So here the question is not whether the Congress may delegate its power to coin money and to regulate the value thereof, but the question is whether the Congress lays down a policy—a definite legislative policy—to which the Executive may adhere. If in this proposed law there is a policy laid down, then, in my humble judgment, the measure will be held constitutional. If in this bill, however, there is a failure to set forth a policy, then, by every decision upon every branch of legislative delegation to the President, the measure must fail as being an invalid delegation of powers which are exclusively reserved in the Congress.

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator mean to contend that if Congress merely declares a policy that, then, it may devolve upon any agent it chooses the duty of carrying out that policy?

Mr. STEIWER. No; and if I was so understood, I should like to make myself a little more definite. Of course I do not mean a general governmental policy; I mean a legislative policy translated into definition upon the particular subject of legislation. That was the case with respect to the flexible provision of the tariff law.

Mr. BORAH. The Tariff Commission and the President, when they came to establish a rate, exercised exactly the same function, the same judgment, the same discretion that the Legislature would exercise in fixing that rate; to wit, they inquired what is the cost of production at home and abroad, and all of which involved the exercise of opinion and judgment.

Mr. STEIWER. That is a question of fact, if I may make the suggestion to the Senator, and not a question of legislative policy.

Mr. BORAH. I suggest in arriving at the fact the Commission and the President exercised the same faculties of mind as would the law-making body.

Mr. STEIWER. I hope judgment does enter into it, for our country is in a sad plight if it does not.

Mr. BORAH. If it does enter into it, then it is a legislative act, and not the mere ascertainment of a fact.

Mr. STEIWER. With the highest regard for the opinion of the Senator, I feel that that is not a legislative judgment. The courts have held that it is not a legislative judgment.

Mr. BORAH. I understand what the courts have held, but I am saying now that the Tariff Commission and the President in fixing a rate reached that rate in exactly the same manner as would the Congress of the United States.

Mr. STEIWER. That is true, but within the limits of the legislative formula.

Now, if the Senator from Vermont will indulge me just a moment further——

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield to the Senator from Oregon, and I am very glad to have this interruption.

Mr. STEIWER. I will conclude after one more observation. In any inquiry with respect to the constitutional validity of the question which is before the Senate in the pending bill, it occurs to me, if we are to be sure that the powers delegated by this bill are to be sustained, that it is absolutely essential that there be a more definite declaration of the purpose to be attained; and that if the bill is left in its present form, yielding to the judgment of the Executive as to what the governmental policy is or ought to be, and leaving it to him to determine the value of money by the various processes which are set forth in the measure, then I believe that the measure is unconstitutional and never can be sustained.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I appreciate the interpolations in my remarks; they have brought out in bold relief, I think, quite clearly what I have been trying to put before the Senate. They have certainly brought out the proposition that men may differ upon the question of the scope of the law, and whether it is of primary importance and declares a rule of conduct for the future generally or whether it is a mere detail; and if this discussion has done that, it has accomplished one of the purposes of my argument.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, may I ask a question of the Senator?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. VANDENBERG. As a layman, I am much awed by this controversy between the lawyers of the Senate. For whatever illumination it may throw upon the subject from a layman's standpoint, may I ask my learned friend from Vermont where the Congress got the power to permit the Secretary of Agriculture to lay processing taxes on the country and to distribute the proceeds to anybody he sees fit?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator from Vermont permit a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. REED. Assuming that the Senators who agree that the bill will not stand the test of constitutional inquiry are correct, I wish the Senator would go further and tell us what, in his judgment, would be the use of such a test case or the use of taking it to the court, for if we pass this bill the President undoubtedly will act under it promptly, and by the time a test case could be brought to the United States Supreme Court the fat would be in the fire, and a decision then that the act is unconstitutional would not save the currency system of the United States.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, in discussing the premise of my argument, I had intended to call attention to what I believe has been demonstrated by the very able arguments of the learned Senators who have preceded me, and I thought I would recapitulate in a brief way the facts tending to show the extent of this power by the evil effects which might follow its use.

In that connection, I might answer the question of the learned Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED], but before passing to that I wish to complete the answer which I started to make to the question of the learned Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON].

I call attention to the fact that on occasions when the various cases which have been alluded to have come up to the Supreme Court for consideration and the test has been applied, which I have brought out here of the extent of the powers which Congress had granted to some other agency, we find that this has been the experience. On occasions the Court has sustained the legislation on the finding that there was no delegation. Frequently a sort of delegation was admitted, but it was usually said to be a delegation of a mere administrative duty, or something equally unsatisfactory, and at times the Court has seen fit to avoid the use of the word "delegation" and to uphold a statute on the ground that similar acts of Congress had been previously sustained. Nevertheless, there have been decisions by the Court, which I have put in the RECORD and from which I have quoted, which establish clearly the rule that Congress has exclusive power to determine primary or fundamental rules for the governing of future conduct, and that this power may not be devolved upon any other agency.

Let us take up the cases alluded to. Having exercised this power, as Congress did in those cases by promulgating a primary principle, Congress may then confer upon some executive or administrative officer or body the authority to establish policies subordinate to and consistent with the congressional pronouncement.

There have been certain classes of these cases where such power has been delegated and its delegation has been upheld. I will try briefly to state what they are: In the first place, there are those cases in which Congress enacted a law the enforcement of which was to depend on an act or a finding of some other officer. In the second place, there are those cases where Congress supplies the general provisions and the executive or administrative agency furnishes the details. Third, there are those cases where the delegation of legislative power was necessary to the efficacious carrying out of the will of the Congress. Here, however, this bill turns over absolutely, lock, stock, and barrel, the function of legislating respecting the value of our money, the function of saying whether it shall be redeemable in gold or not redeemable in gold, and the power of saying what the standard of value shall be.

On the final test whether this power is a power of great and vital extent to the Nation I concur in what has been said by those who have discussed the question from the minority point of view. I shall not repeat their arguments.

With the farmer paying a higher price for those things which he must have and which he does not raise—a price that has proved in the past always to rise faster than the price rises for the things that he sells—what will be the effect of this bill? Will not the extent of this measure reach every hillside and valley in the land? May it not attain that extent where it will determine the ownership of their homes or the loss of their farms, the difference between prosperity and utter poverty?

What about the man who has no goods to sell and sells nothing but his services? We have heard the very able address of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS]. That part of it which referred to the workingman, the man upon a fixed salary or upon wages, to me is sufficient to absolutely convince the rational mind that the extent and effect of this measure is Nation-wide and reaches the very foundation of society. In fact, with the debtor—I am talking about the ordinary man, not the extremely wealthy man, not the great corporations who owe huge sums of money. I will admit that they, the great debtors of the country, would be the great beneficiaries of this measure. But I am talking about the moderate man, the man who owes a debt representing the purchase price of his home. What about him? With the price of everything he has to buy going up and more money used by him in the purchase of the necessities of life, will he be able to retire his debt? Will that debtor be benefited or will he be harmed? If he is harmed, what about the extent of the effect of this measure? Is it not a major piece of legislation?

The creditor—not the extreme creditor, the small class of creditors, but the great body of people who have their savings invested in small modest bank accounts, that enormous army of thousands and millions of men and women who are dependent upon life insurance companies for their protection against the disaster of all time—they are the creditors who will suffer if this bill is passed. They are the ones whose property, humble as it is, will be cut in two by this measure. Is not that evidence of the extent of the legislation and its effect?

Referring to industry generally, let me ask this simple question: With the possibility staring industry in the face of manipulation of the value of money, 20 percent in its range, manipulation by all the devices in the world that men have yet thought of for making money fluctuate, what industry will enter upon the bidding to build a post office for the Federal Government, for example? In what single enterprise or contract will industry dare engage with this type of money staring it in the face? What would be the value of a contract which involved an investment of a considerable capital?

No one knows. Everyone would abandon industry and go into the business of speculation, a speculation which has always attended inflation, but in this case a speculation encouraged and led by the Chief Executive of the United States and the Secretary of the Treasury under the authority of the gold reserve bill of 1934 giving them $2,000,000,000 with which to play the game.

Is there any further evidence needed to show that the extent of this legislation is Nation-wide and that it affects the welfare of the country as no other legislation can?

With employment growing more and more dependent upon a charitable and munificent Government creating jobs, and a less and less certainty of engagement in private enterprise, what about the general welfare of the United States of America?

To me these tests are absolutely convincing that the pending bill transmits a primary power, not an incidental power.

If it were effective, the injury to this Nation would be very great, because that transmission of power would be of the kind which is spoken of and forbidden in the case of Fields v. Clark (143 U.S. 649) and quoted with approval in United States v. Guinard (220 U.S. 506), at page 521 of which this trite sentence appears:

> That Congress cannot delegate legislative power to the President is a principle universally recognized as vital to the integrity and maintenance of the system of government ordained by the Constitution.

Ah, there is the rub! The real question here is whether the Congress shall willfully, with eyes wide open, undertake the transformation of our system of government by means of a simple act of Congress, without submitting it to the people, whether the Congress shall undertake to change a fundamental law which distinctly separates the power of legislation and invest it in Congress and abdicate it and turn it over to another coordinate department of the Government. The question goes right to the very heart of the situation in this country.

Mr. President, I am concerned to preserve the system of government ordained by the Constitution. The time is here now for American citizens who believe in the declarations of the Bill of Rights, who desire to preserve the Federal system of checks and balances between three coordinated branches of Government, and who are devoted to a more perfect union of the several States, without depriving them of their independent sovereignty over local affairs and their relative dependence on the Federal Government, for the insurance of a republican form of government in every State and a uniform interpretation and application of national laws to them. The time is here now to protect and preserve the Constitution for Americans who would preserve the capitalistic system from subtle transformation into collectivism and maintain a social economy in which individual opportunity, incentive, and responsibility will excite the highest endeavor and the greatest service of men, for all who would preserve us from that backwash of war and Asiatic and European propaganda which has for its objective the destruction of private ownership, the erection of public ownership, and the sinking of individualism to a common level, for all who would maintain the system of government ordained by the Constitution, as expressed in the opinion of the Supreme Court to which I have just referred.

Believing that the Constitution is an organic force which has always bowed to the wind of emergency—and is now bent appallingly—and which has always hitherto sprung back again erect to the sun of creative and constructive periods of our history, I object to this proposed Gold Reserve Act of 1934 which tends to prostrate completely such a necessary provision of it as the exclusive duty of Congress to legislate those great rules, those primary policies by which our nationality itself as well as individual rights are preserved.

If our purpose is to bend the Constitution permanently in a vital function of government and transfer to the Executive an important duty of Congress, let it be done only with the consent of the people, expressed by their legislatures or by conventions in three fourths of the several States.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, I have tried and I hope to support the President of the United States in every way that I can to bring recovery to the American people; but the bill before us transfers all the currency of the United States practically from a gold basis to a fiat basis.

This is the first time in the history of the United States since Alexander Hamilton was Secretary of the Treasury that the holder of a piece of currency of the United States could not go and find out what he could exchange that piece of currency for in gold or silver.

All during the Civil War, in every port of the United States, duties levied against imports were payable in gold, and therefore the merchant in any one of these places could buy gold in the open market with the currency of the United States and determine exactly what his currency dollars were worth in gold.

In one of the campaigns for sound money Robert Ingersoll held up a dollar bill and said that he wished everybody who saw that dollar bill to know that "his redeemer liveth." I go a step farther and say that when someone holds up a dollar bill of currency I want not only to know that its redeemer liveth but that that redeemer can be obtained from the Treasury of the United States.

I have before me a table I have made out which shows who will gain by this legislation and who will lose by it. It is as follows:

THE LOSERS—ALL CREDITORS

(These become poorer credit risks)

1. All lenders of dollars, such as:
   (a) Holders of bonds (particularly good ones).
   (b) Holders of notes (including war debts of certain governments held by the United States of America).
   (c) Holders of mortgages.
   (d) Holders of preferred stocks.
   (e) Holders of fixed-income securities and other obligations.
2. Sellers on credit of property, viz, goods, commodities, houses, gold, etc.
3. Holders of dollars, such as bank deposits and paper currency.
4. Holders of life-insurance policies.
5. Thrifty, conservative savers.
6. Receivers of wages, salaries, rents, interest, taxes, freight charges, fixed fees, and similar items.
7. Municipalities, etc., on taxes.

THE GAINERS—ALL DEBTORS

(These become better credit risks)

1. All borrowers of dollars, such as:
   (a) Issuers of bonds.
   (b) Issuers of notes (including war debts, foreign governments issue to United States of America).
   (c) Issuers of mortgages.
   (d) Issuers of preferred stocks.
   (e) Issuers of fixed-income securities and other obligations.
2. Owners and buyers on credit of property, viz, goods, commodities, houses, gold, etc. (including United States Government as heavy gold and silver holders).
3. Holders of foreign currencies, foreign internal securities, and foreign property (including obligations payable in gold values).
4. Holders of industrial common stocks and other equities (particularly those with large inventories and big debts).
5. Speculators for a rise in prices (particularly those borrowing to do so); persons, corporations, and municipalities heavily in debt, and luxurious spenders.
6. Payers of wages, salaries, rents, taxes, interest, freight charges, fixed fees, and similar items.

I show by this table that we are injuring every holder of a life-insurance policy in the United States; that we are robbing every man and woman who has set aside some protection for their old age; that we are robbing every man and woman who has set aside something that can be used for the education of their children; that we are robbing and probably making it impossible for the great universities of the country to go on, who are dependent upon the endowments left by generous citizens for a century past; that we are robbing the churches, the hospitals, the libraries, and every form of public institution which heretofore our people have been generous enough to subscribe to and endow. This may mean a boom in Wall Street for the speculator, but it also means misery and distress for millions and millions of the best citizens in the United States, who are those who have denied themselves in order to lay up capital for themselves in their old age and their children after them.

Of course, a fall in currency means raising the tariff, and this may stop our imports and may aid our shipping abroad, and it may become of benefit to the United States in that way; but the taking of the gold deposited in the Federal Reserve banks, perhaps, may be decided against the Treasury Department because of confiscating the gold from the Federal Reserve banks, for Professor Warren, in testifying before the Banking and Currency Committee, testified that the present value in the United States of an ounce of gold is $34.45, and the Treasury proposes to take this gold from the Federal Reserve banks at $20.67. So we may be laying up in this bill trouble for the Government in a suit which may lie by the holders of the stock of the Federal Reserve banks.

On the 4th of last March, when a banking holiday was declared, it was the belief among the people of the United States that the Government was going off the gold basis; and this caused a withdrawal of gold for hoarding by holders of Federal Reserve notes. It was this demand upon the Federal Reserve banks that caused the banking holiday, and nothing else.

I have offered an amendment here to try to put the stabilization of the dollar at between 65 and 70 cents. I offered that amendment on the ground that that was about what the dollar had been depressed to. With every effort made by the United States to depress the dollar through encouraging Americans to ship their money abroad, encouraging buying gold abroad, and in every other way trying to depress the dollar, it has not been gotten down to 60 cents. The lowest it has been is something like 63 cents. If that pressure is once withdrawn, the dollar will immediately rebound, and the consequence is that we are placing too low a value on the dollar.

What is the consequence of placing too low a value on the dollar? We are creating a fund of $2,000,000,000 to try to steady this dollar at the low point. I think we are going to face the fact that we are going to contribute this $2,000,000,000 to Great Britain, which I oppose and against which I wish to raise my voice, because we will not be able to maintain the dollar below 60 cents; and in trying to do it she will euchre us in the exchange markets, so that we will lose that $2,000,000,000 in about 2 years.

That is my objection to the clause in the bill which says "from 50 to 60 cents." It should say, in my opinion, and in the opinion of many experts, that the stabilized figure should be at least 66⅔ percent, and not from 50 to 60 cents.

Mr. BARBOUR obtained the floor.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to make a statement before he begins his remarks?

Mr. BARBOUR. I shall be very glad to yield for that purpose.

Mr. REED. I had given notice that I expected to speak on this bill today; but in view of the lateness of the hour I shall not do so, but will speak tomorrow as soon after 12 o'clock as I can obtain recognition.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania need not consider me as any obstruction in that respect, because I shall take only about 4 or 5 minutes.

Mr. President, I am in agreement with the objectives of the gold reserve bill, in that I favor devaluating the dollar at this time to meet a world-wide situation; and I feel that it is obviously proper to give the resultant profits of this devaluation to the United States Treasury.

I also recognize that it is vitally necessary—temporarily, at least—to seek, through a stabilization fund properly administered and properly safeguarded, to stabilize the dollar. It remains, therefore, to see how these, the objectives of the legislation, are to be brought about and administered; for it is this practical phase of the problem that is obviously the most important. Going about the right thing in the wrong way never works.

A very fundamental American principle is involved in how the Federal Reserve banks are to be compensated for their gold—not that portion of the gold which constitutes the profit due to devaluation but that portion of the gold which, after the devaluation, everyone admits belongs to the Federal Reserve banks. In reality, these banks receive no compensation; for while they do receive so-called "gold certificates", not redeemable in gold, however, on the basis of which they can issue paper money, this new breed of greenbacks, in reality, is redeemable in absolutely nothing; and, obviously, if the certificates were really as valuable as gold itself, the Treasury would not insist on taking the gold.

Next, it is intended to vest this gold so taken from the member banks of the Federal Reserve System in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury as a single individual, to manipulate and operate this huge sum as he sees fit, without even reporting or accounting to anyone except the President, and to him only, as far as this new law is concerned, as I understand it, once each year, and for years to come without limit. In other words, these $2,000,000,000 would be vested, as I have said, in the Treasury alone, which powers would be exercised entirely independently of the powers which still would remain in the Federal Reserve System.

As the former Secretaries of the Treasury point out, grave danger, to say the least, of confusion and conflict may result from such a dual arrangement, however conscientiously these two agencies may be managed. One quite possible outcome is that the Federal Reserve System, divested of its gold reserve without in reality compensation, may collapse; and certainly, if this should result, everyone knows there is no machinery in the Treasury Department to function in the stead of the Federal Reserve System.

For many reasons I should like to vote for this administration measure. I realize that to do so would be much more popular than to vote against it. I am convinced, however, that if we are going to execute such a drastic reversal of banking policy, we should give it much more study than has been possible in the few days since the President submitted his plan and demanded its adoption, especially as I feel that the dangers likely to follow will affect the small wage earner more quickly and more greatly than those of larger income.

I desire to point out that I feel there will be, in all probability, markedly favorable reactions following the passage of this measure; but I honestly believe that this will be but temporary, with later reactions in quite the opposite direction that will bear out my belief that the administration should have proceeded with less haste and more care toward the same ends, to be sure, but along better understood and more carefully thought out and planned lines.

I, of course, like everyone else, particularly in these times, want to help the President in any way I possibly can, and realize that it is my duty to do so; but I do not consider it either helpful or loyal simply to go along on any and every measure the administration may suggest, whether or not I, myself, in the position of public trust I hold, believe they are destined to success or failure.

If time proves that I am wrong in this instance—and I can say in all sincerity that I hope this will be the case—I shall be the first to admit my error; but I am still too fearful of being justified in my contention that in the end the whole undertaking, so hurriedly planned, is more likely to prove harmful than helpful.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I desire to read into the RECORD an editorial which is appearing this afternoon on the front page of the Chicago Daily News, of Chicago, Ill.

While I would not undertake to say that we should live under government by newspapers, nevertheless newspaper comment in reliable journals has its significance, and I feel that this particular journal does try to speak the mind of the great Middle West. Its editor and publisher is the very well-known and highly esteemed Col. Frank Knox, who has credentials as a citizen and as a Republican which are well known throughout the Nation.

Under all of these circumstances it seems to me that these observations from the Chicago Daily News, which are being emphasized, I repeat, this afternoon on the front page of the Chicago Daily News, have substantial bearing upon our problem, and I desire to submit these comments for what they may be worth. I read it.

The editorial is entitled:

Good policy must be honest policy.

I now quote:

President Roosevelt's monetary proposal, which has passed the House by an overwhelming majority and is now pending in the Senate, did more to reestablish confidence in business and financial circles than anything that has transpired since the bank crisis last spring. This confidence arose from the fact that the President's proposal foreshadowed approximate stability for the dollar by indicating the upper and lower limits of devaluation. It also disclosed an intention ultimately to return to the gold standard. In this fashion the President laid the ghost of the so-called "commodity dollar", which nobody understood, and gave the business world a degree of certainty of the future value of the dollar.

I interrupt the reading at that point, Mr. President, to say that these views have substantial justification. It occurs to me that all of the able constitutional argument which has been made this afternoon against the pending bill applied with even greater force against the so-called "Thomas amendment" 1 year ago. If the pending measure is guilty of the weakness ascribed to it, constitutionally, by my able colleagues whose views I deeply respect, then the fundamental right under which this currency program is proceeding is itself unconstitutional; and that measure was concluded in the Congress 1 year ago.

There is no question about where I stood in respect to the original action. I voted "no". I did not believe in it. I do not believe in it now. I think Congress should possess and retain its power over money. That, however, is a closed book. There is no way that I know of in which the Congress can overtake the situation of last spring, except by an action of repeal, which is neither pending nor contemplated. The gold dollar has already been devalued. Probably it has had to be devalued. I do not invade that field at the moment. Neither do I discuss preferable methods of doing it. Nor do I discuss my belief that this program will not accomplish the contemplated results. It is the President's program, and he must proceed with it to his planned conclusion. We are proceeding into a gold-devaluation program regardless of what Congress does in respect to the pending measure.

Facing the realities of the situation, it seems to be that our choice is between the pending measure, which I conceive to be a step in the direction of stabilization, or, after the defeat of this measure, a continuation of the existing authority of the President under the Thomas amendment, which would bring about a far greater degree of uncertainty and instability than would exist under the pending measure. So that when the pending measure is adopted, if it is adopted, it will be, to my view, a step in the direction which I believe to be essential. That does not mean, I repeat, that it represents a currency philosophy upon which I would embark if I were a free agent to choose my course; but I insist upon being practical in the face of the situation, and my practical view is that this is a substantial improvement upon the situation which would exist if the legislation were not passed.

Furthermore, it is my firm conviction that this measure will assist the President in standing against a type of uncontrollable inflation which I believe would be utterly ruinous to America; namely, unlimited printing-press money. It is my view that this legislation builds a wall against that recourse, so far as the Presidential purpose is concerned, and for that reason I consider also that it is a step in advance. Because I agree with the sentiment of this editorial that the essential thing in America today is the restoration of confidence, the restoration of confidence being a relative thing, from the standpoint even of those who disagree with this monetary policy I submit that relatively there is an invitation to greater confidence under the pending program than there would be under the existing relatively unlimited powers of the Thomas amendment. The President will proceed upon a program which he believes will attain useful and justified confidence. This comment is predicated entirely upon the assumption that his program will not be shattered by additional amendments.

I now desire to continue reading the editorial.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for just an observation?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. STEIWER. In keeping with what the Senator just said with respect to the idea that the pending bill takes us away from instability back to a basis for business confidence in this country——

Mr. VANDENBERG. Relatively.

Mr. STEIWER. Well, relatively, as the Senator now interjects—I think it worthwhile to point out that although the Thomas amendment, in paragraph 2 (a) thereof, I believe, which is a part of title III of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, provided that the President was permitted to reduce the gold content of the dollar to the extent of 50 percent if in his judgment he saw fit to do so, there was one stabilizing element in the law as it then existed, and that was that when the reduction was made it became the standard in this country.

Against that rather final effect of the Thomas amendment we have substituted in the pending bill a proposal to give to the President, within narrower limits of range, it is true—that is to say, between the points of 50 and 60—a continuing power to bring about daily fluctuations, if he may desire, to accomplish that object. The only redeeming thing that I can see in aid of that proposition is the fact that the Committee on Banking and Currency put upon that continuing power to bring about a continued instability in our country a limitation in time of 2 years, or within the limits of a Presidential proclamation, the ultimate limit of 3 years.

So I say to the Senator that although we gain in one direction in behalf of stability in our currency system, we decidedly lose in another; and I very much doubt if editorial writers have taken that factor into consideration when they reach the conclusion that there is anything to breed confidence in this bill.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I think the Senator's analysis has much to justify it technically; but again I insist upon facing the reality. The reality is that if this measure were to be defeated, and the original power were to remain, I am quite confident that this one use of the devaluation power to which the Senator refers would not be exercised, for the very reason that it would be final, and we should find ourselves endeavoring to obtain stability in spite of the existence of a 50-point range respecting the value of money, a range which absolutely precludes any possibility of confidence or of stability.

Mr. President, the editorial from which I am reading is not a one-sided appeal to the Congress and I am particularly anxious to read the remainder of the appeal. I submit, with particular emphasis to Senators upon the other side of the aisle, that the appeal comes in good faith, in view of the initial paragraphs which I have already read. I submit, therefore, that it is entitled to very serious consideration; it is not to be lightly brushed aside. I continue to read:

A further detail of the President's gold plan contemplated the creation of a $2,000,000,000 equalization fund to be employed, like the British equalization fund, in the foreign exchange market to preserve the dollar's value within the limits set up. It is to this particular feature of the proposal that we wish to call attention. This bill, as it was received from the President, provides that the employment of this huge fund shall be exclusively at the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, and it also provides that it may be employed for several other purposes, notably the purchase of Government securities.

We believe the President falls into a tactical error in insisting that this great fund be handled by one official, the Secretary of the Treasury, rather than by a committee of five made up of the Secretary of the Treasury, the Comptroller of the Treasury, the chairman of the Federal Reserve Board, and two members to be appointed by the President. Insistence that this great power be left in the hands of Henry Morgenthau alone is a blunder, because it detracts from the feeling of confidence in the business world which the President is attempting to build. Morgenthau is recognized by the country as an admirable young man with very limited business experience and no banking or financial experience whatever. To leave the management of the equalization fund in Morgenthau's hands alone is tantamount to imposing this additional duty on the President himself. No doubt, if the President could devote most of his time to a detailed study of the international exchange situation, and keep himself fully informed of the daily changes in that situation, he could employ this fund most admirably and skillfully. But with the manifold and innumerable demands upon his time, this is manifestly impossible. Therefore, it is wholly in the President's interest, as well as in the public interest, that this task, the successful discharge of which involves familiarity with the intricacies of modern finance, constant study of the changing situation in international exchange, adequate appreciation of the effects of buying and selling foreign exchange upon the domestic price level, be intrusted to the hands of competent men of the President's own selection, men in whom he has complete trust and who can devote to the problem the time it will require. The proposal to substitute a board of five for the Secretary of the Treasury alone as managers of the equalization fund is in thoroughgoing harmony with the President's announced and wholly admirable purpose.

I desire to interpolate at that point that I again most emphatically agree with these observations, which are appearing this afternoon upon the front page of the Chicago Daily News. I think they constitute an incontrovertable statement in logic and sanity and safety and American principles of government. Nor do they vitiate the President's purposes. They strengthen them.

The use of this stupendous fund involves the invasion of the field of international banking; that is inevitable. We all know the suspicion which attaches to international banking, and, regardless of whether that suspicion is justified or not, any invasion of the field of international banking is bound to have attached to it prejudice and, sooner or later, inevitable scandal.

In the creation of $2,000,000,000 worth of opportunity to deal in that sort of a difficult treacherous field I submit that, from the viewpoint of the President himself, there ought to be a well-defined partnership of responsibility, and that anything short of identified responsibility is calculated to weaken the efficacy of this adventure.

Manifestly, there must be secrecy in respect to the actual operation of a fund of this character. The very fact that it must be secret in its operation only emphasizes and multiplies the necessity that the wellsprings of the authority that are used in respect to its management should be utterly and forever beyond impeachment. In the face of a challenge of that character I cannot understand any reason why there should be a moment's hesitation in following the judgment of the Banking and Currency Committee or, at least, the majority of it, in establishing what they believe to be this protective influence.

If it be said that this power must be mobile and malleable and answerable to a prompt impulse, I reply that every man on the board proposed by the committee is under the direct responsibility to the President of the United States. The members of the board can be removed by the President; they can be made absolutely responsible to the President with respect to any failure to operate.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. VANDENBERG. I will yield in just a moment. We are not, I insist, invading the Presidential prerogative in undertaking thus to protect the situation. I now yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. It seems to me the Senator's explanation of the functions of this board and their responsibility to the President nullifies his prior argument entirely. If they are responsible to the President and removable by the President, he can remove them any time he pleases. The President would have to know something about what he wanted to do; but the Senator has argued with great force that he cannot be expected to know all about it. Now, the Senator says it is the President's board after all; he can throw them all out of office if they do not obey what he says. So in the end it is the responsibility of the President, after all, whether we have the amendment or whether we do not.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I entirely agree with the Senator that, in the final analysis, it is the responsibility of the President. If we do not have a board as proposed by the committee, at the very least we should amend the bill so that the Secretary of the Treasury may operate this stabilization fund only with the direct approval of the President.

Mr. NORRIS. That is in the bill, is it not?

Mr. VANDENBERG. That is not in the bill.

Mr. FLETCHER. He must report to the President.

Mr. NORRIS. Whether it is stated in so many words or not, everybody knows that the Secretary of the Treasury is himself an appointee who can be removed at any time. I think the Secretary of the Treasury would never act, anyway, without the direction, perhaps, of the President.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Let me pursue that thought for a moment. Everyone says, the Senator from Arkansas has said, that, of course, the Secretary of the Treasury would have to enlist experts to sit in the management of this fund; and, of course, the President has not the time to give it his personal attention; and he would have to enlist the services of experts. Very well, Mr. President, that settles, then, the proposition that we are to have experts. I submit to the Senate that if we are to have experts—and evidently we are going to pay some attention to these experts—the country ought to know who the experts are, because it makes a great deal of difference who does the experting in many of these situations.

The Senate has directly insisted upon some occasions that Treasury officials shall disappear from the picture. Why? Because the Senate and the country has not trusted them. The Senate in other situations has indirectly required that certain gentlemen connected with the Treasury shall disappear from the Treasury picture. Who is to say whether the experts who deal in secret with this $2,000,000,000 stabilization fund are or are not of the character which the Senate heretofore has indicated its belief should not be connected with the administration of the Government's fiscal affairs?

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLARK in the chair). Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I will yield in just a moment.

Why is it not more necessary, in connection with the administration of a great secret enterprise of this character, that the Senate should advise and consent to the type of experting which is to be related to it than in any other of these Treasury functions where we would not think for a single moment of permitting subordinate officials to be employed without the advice and consent of the Senate?

I yield now to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. Does the Senator believe that the publication from time to time of the proceedings and activities of a board or of a single executive in the operation of this fund would in any way contribute to the success of the enterprise?

Mr. VANDENBERG. It is the Senator's opinion that since this is an undertaking which reaches for public confidence, a maximum of public information which does not interfere with the actual operation of the fund itself directly helps the objective which we seek.

Mr. BARKLEY. In other words, the Senator thinks, I suppose, logically following out his argument, that the more information foreign nations can get about what we are going to do with this fund, the more successful we will be in manipulating against them as a weapon of defense with reference to our own exchange.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator cannot put any such words as that in my mouth. I have specifically stated that obviously the stabilization fund must operate in secret, or it cannot reach its objective. But is it necessary that the identity of the managers of the fund must also be secret? If that is true, then that means that the identity of the managers will foretell the nature of the management of the fund; and if the personnel is of that importance, I submit that it emphasizes the point I am making, that the personnel is absolutely vital.

Mr. BARKLEY. The only nation that so far has established this weapon and has used it against us has not taken that view of it.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I understand that.

Mr. BARKLEY. Nobody knows who they are, nobody knows who the experts are. We cannot identify them. I am told that even two out of the three do not know what the other one is doing. Ought we to put on the spot, day by day, in live publicity, the men of this country who are using that similar weapon in dealing with another country?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Does the Senator from Kentucky recommend to the United States a system in respect to this currency and monetary adventure in which one man in the Treasury does not know what the other is doing?

Mr. BARKLEY. No; I do not recommend any such thing; but I do think—in view of the fact that in the adventure, or whatever it may be called, of engaging in the purchase of gold in the markets of the world in order to depreciate the value of the dollar as compared to gold, the President of the United States, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Chairman of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation determine the price of gold in the foreign market—that certainly no one of them would be disposed to make public his deliberations or his contemplated actions prior to the opening of the markets; yet the newspapers are from time to time full of statements that somebody in London knew in advance of the opening of the market here what the price would be, as offered through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, for gold on that particular day. If it is so difficult to keep a thing like that secret, I do not see how a board of this kind would be able to keep secret any vital information which it did not desire to get into the hands of our competitors.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator has referred to the fact that the only country which has conducted a stabilization fund, to wit, England——

Mr. BARKLEY. I said the chief country.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Very well; the chief country—has done so with a secret board. That is correct. But I invite the Senator's attention to the fundamental difference between the political system under which England operates and under which we operate. At any time that the British Parliament is dissatisfied with the British Government, there can be an immediate challenge to the continuity of that Government. Under our system we continue under definite auspices to definite periods of referendum and review. I submit that the very distinction which exists between these two types of systems makes it all the more essential that anything that the United States does, particularly in respect to such a tender thing as currency, in respect to international exchange, should be done so far as humanly possible with a responsibility that cannot be evaded in any sense of the word.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator, of course, knows that the fact that we have a different type of government and a different system of government makes no change in the law of economics, if there is any law of economics that can be described as exact. It might be interesting to know that a few days ago in the Parliament of Great Britain a representative of the Government was interrogated by a member of Parliament as to the operation of this fund, as to who controlled it, as to manipulations or policies or deliberations or considerations that entered into its transactions, and the representative of the Government declined to answer or give any information on the ground that it would not be in the interest of the public for the information to be divulged.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I am not asking for the divulgence of any information whatsoever respecting the operations of the fund.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. In just a moment. Let me finish this thought.

I decline to concede that the known identity of the responsible advisers to managers of the fund involves in any degree whatsoever malignant publicity in respect to the operation of the fund itself.

I yield now to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. In connection with the experts to whom the Senator from Michigan referred, perhaps some light could be thrown by an article which appeared in the Washington Star of January 23, day before yesterday, written by Paul Mallon. I quote the following for the Senator's benefit:

> Morgenthau knows little about banking, Government finance, and foreign exchange. But he is smart enough to know he is no expert, and he hires men who are.
>
> For instance, Earle Bailie is supposed to have gone back to New York. His resignation as Assistant Secretary took effect legally on January 15. Actually, he has not given up his job at all. He knows how to handle Government financing, and Morgenthau is secretly keeping him around for that purpose.
> Bailie sat in at the Reserve Board governors' meeting on that subject, although he was legally a private citizen.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I thank the Senator.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I assume that Mr. Bailie probably will remain here secretly, and that he very probably will have much to do with managing this large stabilization fund. The hope of all of us is that if he does manage it, he will not manage it as he did the Tricontinental matter, where he made everybody bankrupt, and that he will not resort to bribing officials and the sons of officials of other governments, as he is charged with having done in the case of the son of President Leguia of Peru.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, although I decline to enter the field of personalities, it is a fact that the Senator from Indiana personifies and illustrates the precise point that I am submitting to the Senate; and I do it with the most profound conviction. I think I have already demonstrated my willingness to treat this subject in the broadest possible nonpartisan light.

Nothing of that nature is involved in my appeal, but under any American governmental situation it must be conceded that the less secrecy involved the better. Secrecy is the bane of republican institutions. There must be, we all admit, an element of secrecy in the operation of a stabilization fund of this character, but I cannot for the life of me understand why in the same breath it is necessary to argue that there must be secrecy respecting the identity of the men upon whom the Treasury and the American people are dependent for the views which it translates into the public policy of the Nation.

The Senator from Indiana identifies an official of the Treasury in whom, rightly or wrongly, the Senate does not believe. Let us just take the naked fact that the Senate does not believe in Mr. Bailie, without respect to the justification of that attitude. I decline to pass upon the justification, because I do not have the facts. That being the Senate's attitude in respect to Mr. Bailie, would the Senate be satisfied to have Mr. Bailie one of the advisers of the Secretary of the Treasury in respect to the operation of this fund? I think the Senate would not; yet I submit that under the terms of the bill as drawn, except as the committee amendment is adopted, Mr. Bailie can be exhibit A in respect to these devices.

It is true that he still could be upon the staff even though the committee amendment were adopted; but I submit that if the major personnel is publicly identified, we have at least done our duty in respect of the situation regarding secrecy.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. HARRISON. I am sure the Senator from Michigan will regret to get the information, because he and the Senator from Indiana will then be deprived of making speeches against Mr. Bailie, but——

Mr. VANDENBERG. I am making no speech against Mr. Bailie. I know nothing about Mr. Bailie.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator has just O.K.'d what the Senator from Indiana has said, which is full of insinuations against Mr. Bailie.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I O.K.'d nothing of the sort respecting the charges. I do not want to be misunderstood.

Mr. HARRISON. I merely wanted to give the Senator this information so that he could find another topic to talk about.

Mr. Bailie this morning came to my office. It was the first time I had met him. He told me that he was leaving either tonight or tomorrow night and severing his connection with the Treasury. Now, I hope the Senator from Michigan will find something else to talk about, and the same hope is expressed as to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator from Michigan cannot find something else to talk about in respect to the problem he is submitting in good faith to the Senate. Neither can the able Senator from Mississippi, who is the most agile switchman that I know of in America, turn me from the proposition I am laying down at the bar of the Senate, namely, that whether it be Mr. Bailie or anybody else, the American people are entitled to know who it is upon whom the Treasury is depending for its expert advice in respect to such a stupendously important thing as the management of a $2,000,000,000 stabilization fund which is to operate in secrecy itself, necessarily. I submit that whether it be Mr. Bailie or anybody else—and I have used the name of Mr. Bailie only abstractly because he happens to have been mentioned—no matter who it is, the American people are entitled to know who it is upon whom the Government is thus relying; and it does not answer the situation to say that even though this committee were appointed, there would be other advisers whom we do not know. That does not answer the situation, because at least we would have identified, so far as we are concerned, those upon whom we want the Government to lean in respect to its expert advice. If we leave the bill without the Senate amendment, necessarily the experts must be anonymous—must be as secret as the operation of the fund itself.

I submit that it is untenable for the Senate and the Congress to create a situation in which the advisers of the Government must be secret.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator makes the complaint that the Secretary of the Treasury is not an expert in foreign exchange. Frankly, I do not know whether he is or not. I do not know whether anybody really is an expert in international exchange or anything else. Somebody not long ago described an expert as a man who knows less and less about more and more; but that is only a facetious reference. What I had in mind was this:

If the Secretary of the Treasury is not an expert in international exchange, and therefore will have to employ experts within the Treasury—which seems to be the policy pursued across the water—and if we might assume that even the Comptroller of the Currency is not an expert in foreign exchange, and that the Governor of the Federal Reserve Board is not, and that the 2 men appointed by the President to make up the board of 5 are likewise not experts in international exchange, would not the board of 5 be compelled to employ experts who are familiar with international exchange to the same extent as the Secretary himself would be required to do it if the power were given to him alone?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Well, Mr. President, if this attenuated premise is correct, the conclusion is justified; but, at any rate, we would have created a primary identification of the men who are to carry the partnership responsibility for this stupendous enterprise. I submit again that as a matter of elementary precaution in representative government, the committee amendment should stand as urged in the editorial from which I have been reading. At least the Congress will have thus discharged its own responsibility.

Now just let me conclude the reading of the editorial, and I shall have finished my observations:

To employ this equalization fund in order to control or influence the price of Government securities is open to serious objection. Such a procedure is the precise practice indulged in in Wall Street and other financial centers to rig the market for privately owned issues of securities. Neither in morals nor in fact is there any distinction between the Secretary of the Treasury's going into the bond market secretly to purchase the securities he is issuing himself, in order to maintain an artificial, fictitious price level, and the practice of financial speculators who in boom times secretly purchased their own securities in order to maintain those securities at an artificially high level. When an investor buys a bond, whether it be a Government bond or the bond of a private corporation, he is entitled, as a mere matter of common honesty, to know what the actual demand for the bond may be. If the demand is fictitiously stimulated, he is the victim of deception, and it is just as wrong to practice deception in the public interest as it is in private interest. We believe the President to be a man of nice discrimination of honor, and we feel sure he has not given this phase of his proposal the study and consideration it deserves. There can be no possible objection to complete secrecy and confidence concerning the employment of an equalization fund in foreign exchange, but there are indisputable reasons why such secret employment of such a fund is neither honest nor right when it is used to raise the price of Government bonds in which the public is asked to invest.

I heartily concur in these observations, and I think they urge upon the Senate the adoption of the pending committee amendments.

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, I ask leave to insert in the RECORD some of the testimony taken by the Senate Banking and Currency Committee and other statements apropos of the bill now under consideration. Being neither a banker nor an economist, I can only arrive at a decision on this bill from my own experience and by the exercise of judgment based on what I know and hear on the subject in question. I therefore ask leave to set forth in the RECORD such statements by recognized authorities as I deem consistent.

As I see it, this is just another bill in line with the policy of this administration of experimenting with remedies to cure the depression and of concentrating governmental power in a central authority.

"If it doesn't work", says the administration, "we'll try something else", although this bill is the most far-reaching of all bills in relation to human welfare in 70 years.

Says the administration: Here is a bunch of fungi. They look like mushrooms. Eat them. If they kill you, that is too bad. If they do not, they are mushrooms, and we will henceforth known they are good food for the human family. What a chance to take! What a price to pay when an application of known science would avoid such destruction!

One of the witnesses before the committee, Mr. Stewart, said that no country in the world has ever attempted an experiment similar to this bill, and he thought that the administration lacked an understanding of proper credit administration.

In the American Mercury for the month of February 1934, the editor, Mr. Henry Hazlitt, referring to the well-known economist, John Stuart Mill, whom this administration has quoted as an authority but who was in reality opposed to experiment in economics, says:

It must not be supposed that Mill has stood alone in rejecting the method of experiment in economics as practically valueless. His conclusion is substantially concurred in by Cairnes, Senior, Wagner, Bagehot, Marshall, John Neville Keynes, Morris R. Cohen—by practically every distinguished economist or student of scientific method who has thought carefully about the matter.

The general purposes of the bill, as set forth by the committee report, are as follows:

This bill is designed to enable the administration to restore a fairer price level, to arrive eventually at a less variable dollar, and to improve our financial and monetary system. It gives the United States Treasury possession of all the monetary gold stock in the United States, part of which now rests in private or quasi-private control. In this way the Government gains complete control over this metal and at the same time provides a permanent metallic reserve upon which to build a currency system which will be both sound and adequate in the future. * * * The bill, therefore, transfers to the United States all gold now held by the Federal Reserve bank as a substitute for their present gold stocks in issuing currency. * * * The gold coin which was a part of the older system will now be withdrawn from circulation and melted into bars for use in adjusting the balance of foreign trade.

The bill specifically states that the future currency of the United States shall not be redeemed in gold, except as authorized by the Secretary of the Treasury and the President of the United States, but the parity of the gold certificates which now come into possession of the Federal Reserve bank will be maintained by redeeming them at such time and in such amounts as the Secretary of the Treasury deems necessary. * * *

In the matter of transferring the gold to the United States Government, I quote from the testimony of Prof. E. W. Kemmerer before the committee (pt. 2, p. 148):

* * * I would take all the profit that the Government will realize out of stabilization—I think it should all go to the Government—and I would pay it to the Federal Reserve banks in order to pay off the two billion four hundred million and odd dollars of indebtedness of the United States Government to the Federal Reserve banks, represented in the form of the certificates of indebtedness and other Government debt held by the banks. That would make them free. I would not under any circumstances permit an inflation on the basis of that profit. I think if we use that $2,000,000,000, or whatever it may be, as a basis of inflation, as a basis of currency and credit expansion, or as a basis for making a market for Government bonds, we will smash any valuation we attempt. * * *

I think that any plan of stabilization would make stabilization operations desirable, but I would have those operations carried on by the Federal Reserve authorities, and I would have them get the best expert help they could get for a stabilization committee. I would operate through the Federal Reserve banks, just as England, as I understand, operates through the Bank of England. I would not make it a Government matter, but a Federal Reserve matter. * * *

In the matter of currency-redemption rights, I quote from the testimony of Mr. Stewart before the committee:

The theory which underlies this bill, that the gold should somehow be treated as collateral to notes rather than as a fund of redemption, seems to me to completely lose the purpose which gold should have. The function of gold is to test the currency and to test a credit policy. No body of men will ever be wise enough to determine how much credit a country should have. It is a matter of trial and error and experiment, but the test finally comes whether the value of that currency can be maintained by its convertibility either into gold or into a currency of another country. * * *

The House bill establishes a stabilization fund of $2,000,000,000 to be used by the Secretary of the Treasury, under his exclusive control, for the purpose of stabilizing the exchange value of the dollar. The Senate committee adopted an amendment providing, instead of having the Secretary of the Treasury administer the fund, that a foreign exchange board be established for that purpose, consisting of the Secretary of the Treasury, the Comptroller of the Currency, the Governor of the Federal Reserve Board, and two members appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

I think that the amendment is a big improvement over the House bill. Professor Kemmerer has well stated the dangers. It seems to me that we are helping along the idea of a dictatorship by giving even the board such powers, as the board will be under the domination of the Secretary of the Treasury. Giving the authority to even such a board to determine the value of money gives it the power to determine the relative value of all things and the power almost of life over every man, woman, and child in the country. Our whole economic life will be at the mercy of a Washington bureaucracy deadened by its own weight and darkened by its own ignorance. As Father Coughlin says, "Congress should retain its control over money", and adds:

America is in no mood to transfer the control of the dollar to a one-man dictator not elected by the people.

Let me quote from Mr. Stewart before the committee:

It (House bill) seems to me to shift fundamentally the responsibility from the Federal Reserve System to the Treasury in the only matters in which the control of currency and credit really matter, and that is with reference to the convertibility of the currency into gold or in foreign exchange, and to set up a competing influence in the operation of the stabilization fund that is equivalent to an open-market operation. In those two respects it seems to me to nullify, if not to scrap, the Federal Reserve System. * * *

It not only lodges these powers with the Secretary of the Treasury, or a Secretary of the Treasury, but it increases those powers. The administration of the Federal Reserve System or of any central bank where it is on a gold standard has its actions tested because the currency is convertible. The moment you remove the convertible features or lodge the decision with someone as to the conditions under which the currency is to be convertible, you are greatly exceeding anything that any monetary system that I am familiar with has ever done, and you have consequently exposed it to that additional risk. * * *

Inasmuch as under the Senate bill there are no redemption rights, it occurs to me that the above objections will in a large degree still prevail, even with a board where the Secretary of the Treasury is a member and, in all probability, the dominating influence.

Another aspect of the stabilization fund is that we may lose it altogether through investments in foreign exchanges. This is a possibility, according to Mr. Stewart. If we depreciate our dollar too low, then in order to keep it down we shall have to buy foreign exchange until we may eventually lose the whole fund. We can ill afford such a risk when we have had to take $400,000,000 from our ex-service men and 15 percent of the wages of our Federal employees to balance our Budget. Maybe if we save this fund, the country can afford to restore the rights of both of them, as surely they are as much entitled to their pay and pensions as is the Government to establish a fund to deal in foreign exchange, with a strong chance of losing the whole fund unnecessarily. If we need stabilization, let the Federal Reserve System take the risk. We need protection from imports. Why not use the tariff as an embargo?

Anyway, if we win in the foreign-exchange manipulations, chances are it would only lead to further retaliating tariffs or embargoes. And our foreign trade amounts to only 6 percent of our entire trade. We lost money loaned to Europe by a Democratic administration, and now another Democratic administration is trying to relieve Europe from paying a small portion of the loan which they proposed and we accepted, amounting for a full settlement only to a small rate of interest over 62 years of the actual loan. The President has recognized Russia, and now Ambassador Bullitt informs us that we must be cautious in our loans to Russia for trade purposes, as, if we want to sell her a lot of goods, we shall have to take a lot of goods in return. In other words, it is a question of swapping goods for goods; and that is practically true of all foreign trade.

Our country is self-sufficient from an economic standpoint; it has goods other countries want, but other countries have not the money to pay for them with, or, if they have, they put on an embargo that prohibits us from selling to them. The only way we can sell goods to Europe is to loan them the money to buy with, and the result of that is that we lose both money and goods.

Another point to consider in the matter of letting the Secretary of the Treasury handle the fund—yes, even a board, where in all probability he will be the dominating influence—is that he will, in effect, be competing with the Federal Reserve System

He is about to arrange to finance 10 billion for the Government, which will make our national debt 32 billion or more, and he is anxious to keep up the value of Government bonds. He will try to use his fund in such manner as to keep up their value regardless of the amount of credit he issues to do it. The Federal Reserve System buys and sells Government securities in the open market to regulate the amount of credit necessary. Mr. Young testified as follows before the committee:

At the moment there is a great desire on the part of all for an expansion in the use of our currency and credit. That has led many to think that the enlargement of the volume of currency and credit would expand its use. Our experience in the past year does not justify such an assumption. The Federal Reserve has increased the excess reserves of the banks of the country to over $900,000,000, giving a base for eight or nine billions of additional credit; but that credit has lain dormant. Under such circumstances you will say, "Why fear an increase of bank reserves of three or four billions more?" My answer is that if there were any way of securing adequate contraction and control when such vast funds begin to be used I would not fear it, but the difficulty is in the control. The Federal Reserve System has something like billions of Governments now which they could sell in the market and thereby accomplish contraction of credit which might result from the expenditure of this gold profit; but after that were done the Reserve System would be without influence to contract the credit market except through a discount rate which would probably be ineffective. Thereafter the only control of credit volume would be in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury * * *.

When the influence of the credit volume of the country passes from the Federal Reserve System to the Treasury, then the Federal Reserve System is practically abolished. It will remain only, if retained at all, as an administrative agency of the Treasury.

I should say that the whole use of the Federal Reserve System lay in its power to influence, perhaps, rather than to control—largely to influence—the volume of credit in our monetary situation. * * * It (influence) is diminished because you have established practically another bank of equal size having the same power to operate in the market, with no coordination between the two * * *.

Whatever your objective may be, the result is that you have two great forces functioning in the credit market. They may offset each other. They may work accumulatively and you have provided, so far as I can see, in this bill no way of insuring that team acting together. One may go in one direction and the other in another direction; and if the Federal Reserve—now I will come back to the final point—if the Federal Reserve, feeling that credit should be contracted due to the operations of the Treasury, sells its Government bonds in the market in the effort to secure that contraction, then it has lost the only weapon that it has to deal with credit volume except the discount rate, which, under such circumstances, I should think would be ineffective.

* * * You see the problem before the Reserve banks is to try to adjust the volume of credit appropriately to the needs of the country and to the needs of its business. That may result in their buying Governments; it may result in their selling them. When it buys, it may artificially affect the price of Governments; when it sells it may depress the price of Governments. But the Reserve banks should never think what happens to the price of Governments. Their job is to fix the volume of credit. * * *

That is one reason why it is extremely unfortunate to have the Secretary of the Treasury operate in the credit market, because he is interested in two things: He is interested on the one side in the price of Governments, and on the other side he is affecting tremendously the volume of credit. He would hesitate to contract credit if it depressed the price of Governments, notwithstanding that the interest of the country would require and ought to have a contraction of the credit. * * *

The bill authorizes the President to fix the weight of the gold dollar from time to time between 50 and 60 percent of its present weight.

Professor Kemmerer submitted the following view on the question of stabilization to the committee:

Any stabilization plan to be successful must inspire strong public confidence. There should be no qualifications, no "ifs" or "ands" about it. It should be definite, positive, and permanent. If the Government can stabilize de facto, it can even more easily stabilize de jure, because the public will not have full confidence in any stabilization plan if it sees that the Government itself is wavering and is not willing to take the responsibility of committing itself positively and permanently to carrying the plan through.

The frequently heard talk about waiting until a currency reaches its natural level before stabilization is a fallacy. It has been my privilege to assist 11 different countries in stabilizing their currencies on a gold basis, and in every one of them there was talk of a natural level, but no one has ever shown, so far as I am aware, just what the natural level of prices is under a depreciated paper-money standard or how it is to be determined. In the days of our depreciated greenback standard, when there was much discussion of the time for resuming gold payments, there arose a popular slogan, for which Salmon P. Chase was apparently responsible, that "the way to resume is to resume." A slogan which might well be adopted today is, "The way to stabilize is to stabilize."

The only spot of light in this bill if it carries is the Senate committee amendment limiting it to 2 years or less if the President so desires, or he can add 1 year if he deems necessary. It is unfortunate that the time is not shorter. Once granted, the tendency will be for the White House to want to retain the power and to work to that end, and it will.

Owen D. Young testified thus before the committee:

So my first suggestion would be that it is highly important, I think, to retain the bill throughout as an emergency bill, and then if we need modification of our monetary program and mechanism, we ought to take that up with ample time to give it careful consideration, because, after all, we spent a great many years, Senator GLASS, in getting the Reserve Act. When passed we adapted, so far as we could, the best there was in the whole monetary experience of the world to our needs. We have had 20 years of experience with the Federal Reserve System. It has made mistakes. All human institutions do. Some of the mistakes are, I think, attributable to the legal set-up; some of them were mistakes of human judgment. The first you can cure; the second will always exist wherever you put your authority. So I would hope that we would not permanently change that system without careful consideration and careful study. * * *

Many progressives throughout our land seem to have a mistaken idea that inflation is part of their program. Let me cite what Oswald Garrison Villard, of the Nation, a man who endorsed in his paper and who actively supported Norman Thomas for President in 1932, has to say about inflation:

[From the Nation, Dec. 6, 1933]

But no one must believe that this inflation danger is a new one and that we have never faced it before. The attack upon a sound currency has come again and again and always from the West, but never with a better excuse than at present. The farmers are in a desperate condition, and it is not to be wondered at that they are lured by the idea that you can run the printing presses until you have created a large amount of greenbacks and then with them pay off the entire bonded debt of the United States. Indeed, some of them wish to go further and so do some men in high office in Washington. They actually want to establish a great program of public works and to pay for these not by bond issues but by printing the additional amount in greenbacks. They do not ask what will become of the greenbacks. They have forgotten the story of the Confederacy and how its unsecured currency was debased until you had to pay $600 or $800 for a pair of shoes. They have forgotten that even on the northern side the debased paper money was called "shinplasters." * * *

I am not a bit impressed by the talk of controlled inflation. I do not believe that the Warren plan of changing the gold content of the dollar will satisfy the western inflationists * * * the demand for inflation has been beaten every time so far, and it cannot be said that we have done so badly by so doing. * * * At the same time we have had a sound currency, and have paid our debts honestly—at least until recently.

This is what the American Federation of Labor has to say on the subject in its report on business in the New York Times for January 8, 1934:

The surest way to raise prices now is by putting men back to work in production industries, where they will create wealth and earn incomes to buy goods, and the surest way to increase industrial activity is to give business men confidence that their dollars will not depreciate in value.

For as long as there is fear of currency depreciation, business executives will hold their activities to the lowest possible levels; they will hesitate to borrow money to increase production, and investors will hesitate to lend.

In the last 2 months the Government has made an effort to raise prices by progressively reducing the gold value of the dollar through its gold-buying program. This method did not prove to have immediate lasting effect on the general price level. Prices rose at first, then dropped back.

After 2 months of the program, the general wholesale price average was 70.4 (Dec. 23) compared to 70.4 the week of October 21, and farm prices had made no lasting gain—54.2 to 54.8. Undoubtedly the results of this readjustment will appear over a period of months when basic changes have had time to take effect.

Taking the year as a whole, we find that since the United States left the gold standard in April, the general price average has moved upward 10 points toward its predepression level but is still below that level by 30 points.

While this gain is helpful, we have not been able to restore relationships between different prices, and this is a problem of the greatest importance.

Farm prices, which fell further than others in depression, are still 15 points lower than the general average, while cost of living, which kept above the general level by 8½ points even at its lowest, has risen also. Farmers' prices will rise when workers' buying power creates a demand for their products.

If the Government as a next step in its price-raising program takes measures to restore confidence in the currency and get workers back to productivity in industry, it is safe to predict that 1934 will see considerable progress in restoring prices.

President Green expressed similar objection to inflation in a speech before the American Federation of Labor convention in Washington on October 2, 1933.

In spite of the declared intent of the bill to restore fairer price levels, the price-lifting program has not helped the farmer. According to a report from the Bureau of Labor Statistics in last Sunday's Washington Star, January 21, farm prices are falling. I quote:

Decreases were reported, the Bureau announcement said, for 179 items, increases for 170, and in 435 instances there was no change.

Of the decreasing items, 90 were farm products and manufactured foods. Hogs dropped 19 percent, eggs 16, butter and cheese 14, lard 13, meats 4, and sugar and flour 3 percent.

Referring again to the administration's delight in making a laboratory for experimenting out of 127,000,000 American citizens, and its efforts to raise the price level by means of this bill, let me quote from Henry Parker Willis before the committee:

The general theory of prices which at present, I believe, is accepted, regards the price level as the outcome of a very large group of factors, supply and demand of commodities being the most important one of all; and I submit, with all due respect, that there is nothing in recent statistics or statistical experience in this country or abroad to show that the changing of the price of gold would also change at the same time, or shortly, the price of commodities. I believe that the expectation that this kind of a stabilized dollar will bring a higher level of prices is entirely unwarranted, and I say with the utmost earnestness that I believe those who look forward to that will be seriously disappointed in the results. I do not deny that we may have under the legislation a very much higher level of prices than we have now, but if that should come it will, I think, be much more likely to be the result of changes in trade and the general destruction of wealth on the farms and elsewhere, the abolition of human labor under the National Recovery Administration, and other things which tend to produce scarcity, than it will be due to the raising of prices growing out of a change in the amount of gold appropriate to the dollar but not actually used in any actual business transaction.

In other words, the administration is carrying on so many experiments that it will not be able to determine which one is which or which has done or not done any good. One thing we know, that the farmer is getting worse off every day due entirely to one of the administration's experiments, one of the administration's poisonous fungi which we are compelled to eat willy-nilly, otherwise known as the "N.R.A." or the "National Racketeering Act." This act has brought about and is bringing about the ruin of small business and the independent operator. Through the intricacies of its combinations, it is strangling everything in the United States deserving the name of competition.

Its object is to capture and place under one head and one price every profitable business in the United States—oil, coal, steel, food, everything. Three or four packing houses not only fix the price of every critter but of every pound of meat in the United States. As a result of this "National Ruin Act," we have today presented the wonderful spectacle of meat raised and sold by the farmer at an actual loss, while meat in our great cities is as dear as when an American dollar was worth 34 cents. What will it be when our present 60-cent dollar has still further depreciated?

Speaking of the various classes and the effect of inflation on each, Professor Kemmerer before the committee said that the largest class to benefit from this bill, if it works, would be the stockholders in the corporations, especially those in corporations with the largest bonded indebtedness and industrials, as against public utilities, for public utilities could not raise their rates.

Speaking of the classes that would suffer, Professor Kemmerer stated to the committee that—

In the first class, namely, the class representing savings and incomes that do not rise appreciably as the dollar depreciates, inflation imposes a permanent loss on creditors. In this class are such credits as life-insurance policies, of the amount outstanding in the United States today is over $100,000,000,000; bonds and mortgages, namely, the forms of securities in which are invested much of the endowments of our colleges, hospitals, public libraries, research laboratories, and other public welfare institutions, and of our savings banks; also practically all pensions and annuities. The owners or the beneficiaries of such credits are the creditors whose capital and income would be permanently reduced by a reduction in the value of the dollar, for these obligations are payable, principal and interest, in a fixed number of dollars, regardless of the value of the dollar. They do not rise like the price of commodities, of real estate, and of common stocks as the dollar depreciates. * * *

The second class that would suffer heavily from such reduction in the value of the dollar is our great laboring class, including both skilled and unskilled labor, and our so-called "white collar" working class.

Both economic theory and numerous experiences with monetary depreciation in this country and abroad show and show emphatically that when the currency depreciates wages lag behind prices and the cost of living on the rise, and until the price adjustments to the new and depreciated monetary unit have been completed and the laggardly wages have finally caught up to prices, which usually takes several years of time, the laboring classes suffer. * * *

REGULATION OF BANKING IN THE DISTRICT

Mr. KING. Mr. President, a very short measure, but one of some little importance, has been reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia affecting a few banks that are in process of reorganization. It is desired that they be relieved of the provision with respect to double liability. The Secretary of the Treasury has recommended that such action be taken, and this bill merely accomplishes that result.

Mr. FLETCHER. I have no objection if the bill does not involve displacing the unfinished business.

Mr. KING. Oh, no; not at all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill, the title of which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 2465) to amend the act of March 4, 1933, relating to the regulation of banking in the District of Columbia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I should like to inquire if the bill is made necessary by the proposal to consolidate two or three banks in Washington in order that the stockholders shall not be liable under the double-liability provision in both institutions.

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. Or does it, with reference to the proposed consolidated institution, relate back to the double liability affecting the individual banks?

Mr. KING. It is in futuro.

Mr. BARKLEY. I know; but would it affect the conditions growing out of the closing of the banks?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I inquire whether this bill is on the calendar.

Mr. KING. No; I reported it today.

Mr. McNARY. Is the Senator asking for its immediate consideration?

Mr. KING. I am.

Mr. McNARY. I think it had better go over until tomorrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon objects, and the bill will go over.

REFINANCING OF FARM DEBTS—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. FLETCHER submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 6670) to provide for the establishment of a corporation to aid in the refinancing of farm debts, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 35, 37, and 38, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 11: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 11, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the Senate amendment insert " but the rates of compensation of such agents, officers, and employees of the corporation shall not exceed the rates of compensation prescribed for comparable duties by the Classification Act of 1923, as amended "; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 36: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 36, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the Senate amendment insert on page 11, line 4, of the House bill after " and " a comma and the following: " with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, to "; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 34: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 34, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the Senate amendment insert " the Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation, either in cash or in bonds of the corporation at his election, but no such loans shall be made by him after February 1, 1936, except for the purpose of refinancing loans previously made by him under this section. Not to exceed $600,000,000 of the bonds and proceeds thereof "; and the Senate agree to the same.

DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
ROBERT F. WAGNER,
PHILLIPS LEE GOLDSBOROUGH,
JOHN G. TOWNSEND, Jr.,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

MARVIN JONES,
H. P. FULMER,
WALL DOXEY,
CLIFFORD R. HOPE,
J. ROLAND KINZER,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. FLETCHER. I move the adoption of the report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

HOUR OF MEETING TOMORROW

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its business today it take a recess until 11 o'clock a.m. tomorrow; and I will state in that connection that I have consulted the Senator from Oregon——

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I do.

Mr. McNARY. Early in the afternoon the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] gave notice that he would speak upon the unfinished business tomorrow at 12 o'clock. Has the Senator asked if it would be agreeable to him to have the hour changed?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator from Pennsylvania was advised of the intention to recess until 11 o'clock, and said that he had no objection to it.

The reason for making this request is that while no assurance can be given that the bill will be concluded tomorrow, there is a desire on the part of a number of Senators who would like to vote on the bill to leave town tomorrow evening; and if the bill is disposed of tomorrow it is expected that a recess or adjournment will be taken over the week-end.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas further yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I do.

Mr. McNARY. I do not indulge the hope which has been expressed by the Senator from Arkansas that we can conclude the unfinished business tomorrow. In the event we do not finish it tomorrow, is it the intention of the Senator that we shall adjourn over from tomorrow until Monday?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Oh, no; if this bill is not concluded tomorrow, Mr. President, it will be necessary to continue in session on Saturday, and to quite a late hour, perhaps, until the bill shall be disposed of.

I repeat my request for unanimous consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas asks unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its business today it take a recess until 11 o'clock tomorrow. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. STEPHENS, from the Committee on Commerce, reported favorably the following nominations:

Maj. Elroy S. J. Irvine, Corps of Engineers, United States Army, to be a member of the California Debris Commission provided for by law, vice Lt. Col. Henry A. Finch, Corps of Engineers, relieved;

Nathanael H. Engle, of Washington, to be Assistant Director, Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce; and Henry Russell Amory, of California, to be Assistant Director, Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reports will be placed on the calendar. If there be no further reports of committees, the calendar is in order.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Walter M. W. Splawn, of Texas, to be Interstate Commerce Commissioner for the term expiring December 31, 1940.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, the Chairman of the Committee on Interstate Commerce not being present, I suggest that the first and second nominations on the calendar be passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the first and second nominations on the calendar will be passed over.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I inquire if the nominations passed over are nos. 113 and 114 on the calendar?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. They are.

Mr. McNARY. I have no objection.

CHIEF OF WEATHER BUREAU

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Willis R. Gregg, of New York, to be Chief of the Weather Bureau.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

THE JUDICIARY

The legislative clerk read the nomination of John D. Clifford, Jr., to be United States attorney, district of Maine.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Clinton R. Barry to be United States attorney, western district of Arkansas.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

FARM CREDIT ADMINISTRATION

The legislative clerk read the nomination of George M. Brennan, of Illinois, to be Intermediate Credit Commissioner.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

CUSTOMS SERVICE

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Stephen M. Driscoll to be collector of customs, collection district no. 2, St. Albans, Vt.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

That completes the calendar.

RECESS

Mr. FLETCHER. I move that the Senate take a recess.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 36 minutes p.m.) the Senate took a recess, the recess being, under the order previously entered, until tomorrow, Friday, January 26, 1934, at 11 o'clock a.m.

CONFIRMATIONS

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate January 25 (legislative day of Jan. 23), 1934

UNITED STATES ATTORNEYS

John D. Clifford, Jr., to be United States attorney, district of Maine.

Clinton R. Barry to be United States attorney, western district of Arkansas.

FARM CREDIT ADMINISTRATION

George M. Brennan to be Intermediate Credit Commissioner.

CUSTOMS SERVICE

Stephen M. Driscoll to be collector of customs, collection district no. 2, St. Albans, Vt.

CHIEF OF THE WEATHER BUREAU

Willis R. Gregg to be Chief of the Weather Bureau.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, JANUARY 25, 1934

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Most gracious God, Thou who dost prefer before all temples the pure and upright in heart, we praise Thee. With gratitude that cannot be expressed, we thank Thee for Him who knew no harshness and grieved over no bitterness though His earthly life began in a manger. O God, may the darkness of all lands fade before His glorified cross. When this day is done and gray grows the dawn, and the old sun begins to lurk behind tomorrow's door, be with us, blessed Lord. Keep alive the voices of our souls—the voices of memory, of childhood's haunts, loves, and longings. O sound again the chords of a mother's love and call back the tone of a father's, vocalized in prayer, hymn, and in benediction, and how sweet shall be our rest and how we shall thank Thee, our merciful Father. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

THE ROAD TO SOCIAL JUSTICE

Mr. SWEENEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a radio address delivered by me on December 31, 1933.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. SWEENEY. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address delivered December 31, 1933, over station WGAR, Cleveland, Ohio:

And now, my friends, by a magical movement of a little switch at Radio Station WGAR, we are at this moment joined by the vast invisible audience of the air. To them, this last quarter of an hour is dedicated.

This has been a wonderful afternoon. The old year is ending today, but with its passing is born here and now an intensive movement to insure in this great Nation of ours the eternal permanency of all the economic and political reforms launched in the travail and suffering of the year, which tonight will be no more.

We have seen and are seeing a bloodless revolution, the like of which no mortal eye has ever seen before. The citadels of privilege are tottering to the ground. From the brazen hand of gold there is being torn its scepter of power with which it has ruled the world for countless ages, and in the place of that scepter there is being fastened to its arms, the manacles of service so that henceforth gold will be the servant and not the master of man.

To two men above all others belongs the credit for these stupendous accomplishments. The one is our beloved, our fearless President, whose name this league proudly bears, Franklin D. Roosevelt.

The other is that glorious crusader of the air, that priest of God, who has brought to his Shrine of the Little Flower, countless millions of eager listeners each Sunday afternoon—Father Charles E. Coughlin.

And as my humble tribute to the eloquent cleric of Royal Oak, Mich., there will be rebroadcast, over a powerful public address system, in this auditorium every Sunday afternoon from today on, the splendid radio sermons delivered by him, so that the poor and the lowly, though they have no radio sets of their own, may hear his wonderful voice and his message of hope.

Every Sunday afternoon, preceding Father Coughlin's discourse, some speaker of note, interested in the great battle being waged for social justice, will discuss with you a particular phase of that battle in which he is versed. Occasionally, I will take the liberty of discussing with you and reviewing the activities of the Congress of the United States, reporting to you, first-hand, the historical actions of that body and my own participation therein.

This is to be the People's Forum, the first of the activities of the Roosevelt League for the Advancement of Social Justice.

My friends, you must not only be hearers of the word, but you must be doers of the word, and that is the purpose of this new Roosevelt League.

This afternoon there have been sounded in this hall the clarion notes of Assembly, and there have been opened to the supporters of Franklin D. Roosevelt and the admirers of Father Coughlin in Cuyahoga County, the enlistment rolls of a new Army of the Republic—the Roosevelt League for the Advancement of Social Justice.

I know this is but the inception of a national movement that will weld into a single effective, overpowering unit, the followers of President Roosevelt and Father Coughlin.

This movement is unique in political action. It is to be the movement of those who toil, either by manual labor or mental effort. Its guiding star shall be principle, rather than political preferment. Its goal shall be permanent benefit for the many, rather than political plunder for the few.

It shall be the soldier of social justice, rather than the paramour of privilege.

It shall be the scourge with which not only will the money changers be driven out of the Temple, but also the Pharisees will be driven from the high places in the party of the President.

It will be the torch that shall rekindle in the hearts of Clevelanders, the flame of civic righteousness that was snuffed out by the hand of privilege when death ended the vigil of its ardent guardian, Tom L. Johnson.

It will be the sentinel of the people, warning them of invasions of their rights and the destruction of their privileges through legislative action.

It will be the people's lobby.

These are the ideals of this organization and its ultimate objective.

Two weeks ago an intimate apostle of our revered President prepared and promulgated in the magazine called "To-day", of which he is its editor, a most damning indictment of the local leaders of the Democratic Party. After describing the unselfish public efforts of Tom L. Johnson and the reign of exploitation and promoting by the Van Sweringens that followed it, the author, Raymond Moley, says:

"Ultimately the domination of the Van Sweringen's idea in the city came to be so real a factor, that to fail to conform to it was to lose the badge of respectability. Political parties conformed. The great law firms conformed. Most of the press applauded.

"The cynical enemies of Johnson, the field marshals of the new empire, were aided by those of the Johnson regime who, losing faith in the democratic ideas of Johnson, came to feel that his vision, which they had seen, had been a flickering mirage.

"Eloquent voices—and there were great ones—that years before had spoken Johnson's language now uttered the sophistry of the new Gospel of Promotion."

Those are not the words of Martin L. Sweeney; those are the words of an ardent disciple of the new deal and the new leader.

The faithless leaders so scathingly indicted are still in power and in high place in the local organization of the Democratic Party. They are rendering to Franklin D. Roosevelt and his philosophy of social justice the same lip service they rendered to Tom Johnson in the zenith of his career, while in their pockets still jingles the price of their betrayal of Tom Johnson's principles.

Are such men to remain in power during the fight which is yet to come?

Is the indictment of treason to lie dormant or are the indicted to be prosecuted?

The Roosevelt League for the Advancement of Social Justice has the answer. We will prosecute the faithless. We will drive the Pharisees from the altar. We will purge the party of such leadership.

Already the local leadership has cost the party dearly. Its espousal at Chicago of the cause of a god with feet of clay, the clay of whose feet I discovered, thanks be, before the Chicago convention, and their selfishness and arrogance in local affairs, so destroyed the confidence of the local electodate that, like the electorate of New York, they determined to turn the party, controlled by faithless and selfish leadership, out of power in municipal affairs.

That lack of confidence, justified by the indictment prepared by Mr. Moley, threatens, if the faithless leaders are continued in power, to drive the President's party out of office in this county and even in the State.

The Roosevelt league proposes that no such leadership shall be tolerated.

During the late primary campaign I charged that the then incumbent had completely dissipated the city's cash and the city's credit for political patronage, in an effort to maintain himself in office and the present leaders of his party in power. These charges of mine contradicted the claim made by the then mayor that he had operated the city economically.

The facts disclosed since Mayor Miller left office fully corroborated every charge that I made in this regard, and in addition thereto the very startling fact developed that there was a secret understanding between the then mayor and the chamber of commerce, whereby the true condition of the city's financial affairs was not to be disclosed for fear of affecting, prejudicially, the city's credit.

The using of city funds to window-dress bank statements, the efforts of the chamber of commerce in the last city administration to cover up the city's bankruptcy, and many other similar hook-ups between big business and the President's party here in Cleveland, demonstrated that the Democratic Party, as well as the Republican Party, were handmaids of big interests and special privilege.

The day of such hook-ups is over, and the quicker that condition is remedied here in Cleveland the sooner will this great metropolis find itself in harmony with the national administration.

Thanks to the inspired leadership of our President, this country is gradually emerging from the terrible blight that has paralyzed its almost every function; but as the sun of prosperity rises and the economic skies brighten, greed will again assert itself, and selfish men who have failed to heed the warning of this last cataclysm will again seek special privilege, will again attempt to line their pockets by the use of other people's money, other people's credit, and the curtailment of other people's rights.

It will be the function of this organization to stand behind the President to prevent the happening of such events in national affairs and, acting as a unit in State, county, and municipal affairs, to prevent the happening of such events in those governmental jurisdictions.

This league will have to be prepared to combat the insidious propaganda of the Tory press of the city, which, during the shades of night, prepares for the reading public a Democratic newspaper and, with the coming of dawn, changes its political coat and during the daylight hours operates a Republican newspaper.

Briefly, we expect our legislative committee to watch what is happening in the city council, the State legislature, and the Congress of the United States.

We will be especially active in observing the activities of the utilities, the privileged, and the special interests. All of these interests have their lobby and exercise tremendous influence in the legislative bodies.

The people—that is, the wage earners, the salaried workers, and the common men and women, so-called, in this country—have no forum to work for their interest, except that furnished by the inspired priest from Michigan, whom we have referred to this afternoon.

The incidental expense to maintain this organization, we believe, can be secured by permitting those who can afford to pay 10 cents a month dues, thereby permitting us to carry on the work that we have started.

If you are in sympathy with this undertaking, if you have confidence in the movement that my colleagues and I are starting, we ask you to join in this movement.

The history of it, its purposes, its ideals, are described in the league's brochure, which I take the liberty of reading to you:

"This movement had its inception in the espousal of the candidacy of Franklin D. Roosevelt for President of the United States by Congressman SWEENEY at the historic Chicago convention in June 1932.

"The recognition then of the now abundantly proved worth of the new leader by Congressman SWEENEY, crystalized and caused to rally to the Congressman's standard, the independent, unshackled citizens of Cleveland.

"Prior to the Congressman's stand, this great mass had been leaderless, shunning exploiting political bosses.

"Congressman SWEENEY's vote for Franklin D. Roosevelt on the third ballot at Chicago brought to him a flood of telephone calls, telegrams, and letters that enabled him upon his return from the convention to organize the movement inspired by his Chicago action. It organized under the title of 'Roosevelt Repeal League', and its objectives were the election of Franklin D. Roosevelt, the repeal of the eighteenth amendment, and of all sumptuary legislation dealing with the liquor problem.

"The triumphant election of Franklin Roosevelt and the repeal of prohibitory constitutional and legislative enactments brought about the accomplishment of the league's purposes, and it was, thereupon, determined to reorganize with a broader and further objective than the initial organization. Hence, Congressman MARTIN L. SWEENEY's Roosevelt League for the Advancement of Social Justice and the People's Lobby, which was incorporated December 29, 1933, under the laws of the State of Ohio.

ITS OBJECT

"The object of the league is to organize in each election precinct in the county of Cuyahoga a unit, fully officered and functioning as a complete entity under the direction of the central body, which will fulfill the President's admonition of 'Cultivating the soil where this good seed is sprouting', contained in his message just delivered to Congress, in which he stated:

"'We have plowed the furrows and planted the good seed; the hard beginning is over. If we would reap the full harvest, we must cultivate the soil where this good seed is sprouting and the plant is reaching up to mature growth.'

ITS PURPOSE

"This is best expressed in the purpose clause of the articles of incorporation of the league, which reads as follows:

"'The purpose of Congressman MARTIN L. SWEENEY's Roosevelt League for the Advancement of Social Justice and the People's Lobby, shall be to foster, promulgate, and direct all political action constantly to the attainment, in these United States, of social justice as defined by the promulgation of the three great religious faiths of our Nation, namely, the Encyclical of Pope Pius XI on Social Justice, published May 15, 1931; The Sermon on Labor, issued by the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America in 1932; and the Statement of the Chairman of the Social Justice Commission of the Central Conference of American Rabbis, in 1932, all epitomized in the immortal address of Franklin D. Roosevelt on the Road to Social Justice, delivered at Detroit, Mich., in November 1932.'

"To that end this league is dedicated:

"I. To develop and follow honest and unselfish leadership in political and governmental activities in the municipality, the State, and the Nation, and in all private activities of capital and labor.

"II. To fight the political boss in his exploitation of political organizations and his subversion of the power and influence of such organization to the furthering of special privilege.

"III. To expose chicanery, betrayals of trust and special privilege, wheresoever they exist, and the individual or individuals responsible therefor.

"IV. To formulate, advocate, and contend unceasingly for the enactment into law of remedies for such evils.

"V. To maintain a 'people's lobby' in all legislative assemblages; to vigilantly scrutinize legislation; warn the people of special privileges sought by legislative enactment; inform the people of activities to influence legislation by all lobbies, maintained by special interests, and enable the people to keep before their servants, the legislators, to whom they have delegated the power of enacting laws, the fact that their function is to protect the interests of their constituents rather than to become the almoners to special interests of legalized favors not within their power to grant.

"VI. To seek constantly a legal means to bring about a more equitable distribution of wealth and a guaranty of security for the industrious and thrifty by striving for the immediate enactment and, thereafter, the proper administration of laws governing—

"(a) Minimum wages and maximum hours of labor.

"(b) Unemployment insurance.

"(c) Old-age pensions.

"(d) The inordinate accumulation of wealth in the hands of the few.

"VII. To have for its paramount, ultimate object the due observance and strict practice of the tenets of his particular religion by each league member, and if he be not so allied then by his observance and strict practice of the altruistic principles of social ideals, each member of this league recognizing as all society must ultimately recognize that every other individual composing the social fabric varying only in degree as the advantage gained and detriment suffered is great or insignificant.

"VIII. To issue charters to subordinate organizations to be organized in the various election precincts of any political subdivision and to prescribe rules and regulations for the Government and functions of such subordinate organizations.

"IX. To lease, own, and operate any and every means for the dissemination of information.

"X. To exercise each and every power incidental to or necessary for the accomplishment of the purposes above set forth."

ITS FUNCTION

"The formation of the precinct unit will furnish the remedy for the present weakness of the great mass of 'forgotten men', namely, lack of organization.

"It will weld into a militant body the followers of Franklin Roosevelt and the admirers of his fellow crusader, Rev. Charles E. Coughlin, so that in each election precinct there will be a club, with a president, a vice president, a secretary, a treasurer, trustees, and other officers, which will transform the forgotten man's 'mite' into the 'might' of a powerful unified majority and enable the forgotten man to be mobilized into the most formidable force ever created for political action.

"Such an organization will place under the leadership of the President a mighty army of his followers, organized and prepared to battle by persuasion and with the ballot for the accomplishment of his high purposes.

ITS PLAN

"Each unit will have a minimum of 10 contributing members who will each donate 10 cents a month to help defray the expenses of the activities of the league, furthering the purpose of the organization as outlined under that title. This includes the maintenance of the people's lobby, the people's forum, and the other educational activities sponsored by the league.

"Appications for charters for precinct units are now available at the headquarters of the league, 1022 Leader Building, Cleveland, Ohio.

"The requisites for the issuing of a charter to a precinct unit is not less than 10 contributing charter members.

"Lack of means, however, is in no event to bar any person from membership in the precinct unit, the test of membership to be, solely and alone, a complete accord with the purposes of the league set forth above and the whole-hearted espousal of the political philosophy of Franklin D. Roosevelt for the advance of social justice."

My friends, that is an ambitious program, but the leadership of our great leader—the emancipator of the wage slave, Franklin D. Roosevelt—certainly inspires it, and certainly deserves every effort made to bring such a program to fruition.

Let each man and woman concerned with the welfare of this Republic, who desires to see that day come when those willing to toil for the food, shelter, and raiment of their loved ones may have that opportunity for the asking; when the laborer will receive his fair share of the things he produces—not merely subsistence—but security in old age and in sickness together with some of the common so-called luxuries of life—let each such man and woman band together in Roosevelt leagues all over this city, State, and Nation to bring into existence the high purpose of our God-given Chief Executive—social justice.

DESIGNATION OF SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state that it will not be possible for him to be in the city for the rest of the day. The Chair designates the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. PARSONS, to act as Speaker pro tempore in his absence.

TREASURY AND POST OFFICE DEPARTMENTS APPROPRIATION BILL—FISCAL YEAR 1935

Mr. ARNOLD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H.R. 7295) making appropriations for the Treasury and Post Office Departments for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and for other purposes; and pending that, may I ask the gentleman from New York if we can arrange for a time to close debate. From the number of requests we have on this side it seems it might require about 3 hours on both sides.

Mr. TABER. I should think that would be about right.

Mr. ARNOLD. Then I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that general debate continue for 3 hours, one half of the time to be controlled by the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] and one half by myself.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H.R. 7295, the Treasury and Post Office Departments appropriation bill, with Mr. FULLER in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. ARNOLD. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 30 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, I shall take this time now to explain to you some of the more important provisions of this bill. Before doing so, however, I want to pause for a few moments to pay my respects to the gentlemen who served with me on the subcommittee and who gave of their time and their talents unselfishly in the preparation of the bill, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LUDLOW], the gentleman from New York [Mr. BOYLAN] on the majority side, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER], and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MCLEOD] on the minority side. These gentlemen came to Washington in December and we began hearings on the bill. We had rather extended hearings covering probably every phase of the bill now before us. I may say it was a pleasure, indeed, to serve with these men. They are all men of ability who are earnestly and sincerely interested in working these matters out for the best interests of the Government and all parties concerned. There was no trace of partisanship anywhere along the line in conducting the hearings or in the preparation of the bill, and so far as I know the bill, as it is now presented to you, meets the approval generally of the entire membership of the subcommittee as well as the entire membership of the Appropriations Committee proper.

I feel in this connection I would not be doing justice if I did not refer to the wonderful aid and assistance given to us by the very congenial and accommodating clerk of the committee, Mr. Sheild. [Applause.] It has been my pleasure to have served on this particular subcommittee for some years, and Mr. Sheild has always been the clerk in direct charge of the bill. I think I am not overstating it when I say that he knows more about the Appropriations Committee, the needs and requirement in appropriation bills, than any other man in this House. He has practically grown up in the work, and he is untiring in his work and unselfish, and always ready and willing to contribute in every way he possibly can to make the burdens of our committee lighter.

This bill, as you doubtless have observed, contains two titles, carrying appropriations for the Treasury Department and Post Office Department, two of the most important departments in the entire Federal Government.

Title I has to do with the appropriations concerning the Treasury Department proper and Treasury functions. Title II concerns appropriations having to do with the Post Office Department proper and the postal functions.

This bill in the two titles carries recommendations for a sum total of $820,693,270. That is $403,623,327 less than was appropriated for 1934, and $6,683,839 less than was recommended by the Budget estimates.

In that amount there is carried for the Treasury Department $149,842,330. That amount is $358,640,889 less than was carried in the appropriation bill for 1934, and it is $685,539 less than was recommended by the Budget estimates.

For the Post Office Department the sum total appropriation carried in this bill is $670,850,940, which is $44,982,438 under the amount appropriated in 1934, and it is $5,998,300 under the amount recommended by the Budget estimates.

In the time I have before me it would be impossible to go into details, but as the bill comes up for consideration under the 5-minute rule I hope that any query that may be directed toward that end may be answered at that time.

There are a few matters in this bill that I want particularly to call your attention to, and for that reason I shall pass on to such items as I feel you may be more particularly interested in.

Permit me to say, however, that as far as salaries are concerned, this bill is based upon a restoration of 5 percent of the salary reduction that was made in the economy bill. That is carried through both the Treasury sections and Post Office sections.

I want particularly to call your attention to a rather material change in this bill from what has been carried in former bills. Under the Executive order of the President providing for consolidation and elimination of boards and bureaus there was created in the Treasury Department a Procurement Division. This Procurement Division encompasses the functions of the determination of policies and methods of procurement, warehousing, and distribution now exercised by any agency of the Government.

The old general supply committee of the Treasury Department is abolished but that organization becomes the nucleus of the supply branch of the Division of Procurement. Covered into that supply branch is the Government fuel yards, Bureau of Mines, Department of Commerce. Into this Procurement Division comes the function of determination of methods of procurement of the various supplies and the distribution and warehousing of these supplied for every department of the Government.

That division had not progressed very far in the work it had to perform at the time of the hearings, but is now engaged in making studies of various matters with the idea of bringing about greater efficiency and greater economy in government.

What they will be able to accomplish along that line at this time is purely conjectural, but we were told there is a good opportunity for getting results.

Another branch of that Division of Procurement is the Public Works Branch. To the Public Works Branch is transferred the Supervising Architect's Office, and hereafter the appropriations for these activities, as in this bill this year, will be carried under the Division of Procurement. The Supervising Architect's Office is now engaged in the completion of the public-building program that has been laid out by Congress in the past. Hereafter, under the law enacted at the last session of Congress, the funds for construction of public buildings throughout the country will be allotted by the Public Works Administration, and the Supervising Architect's Office will be working under those allocations of funds for construction purposes.

There is another rather important matter that is involved in this Executive order of the President. Heretofore the care and maintenance of public buildings has been under the Treasury Department. By this Executive order the care and maintenance of public buildings that are devoted mainly or entirely to postal activities are transferred to the Post Office Department, and this bill contains an item of something like $16,404,000 for maintenance of public buildings under the Post Office Department which was formerly carried under the Treasury. Buildings that accommodate strictly Treasury functions still remain under the Treasury, but some few of the buildings have been transferred to the Interior Department, where the purposes or uses of those buildings are neither Postal nor Treasury.

We carry in this bill $13,000,000 for the completion of the construction of building projects under the old program under the act of May 26, 1926, as amended. If any Member is interested, if he will look at the hearings, he will see a complete history and set-up of the public-buildings program from the time of its renewal in 1926 down to the present time. When that public-buildings program was started after the World War Congress made specific allocations for the buildings. Later on that was changed and that authority was given to a Joint Committee of the Post Office Department and the Treasury, which reported the allocations to Congress and Congress fixed the limit of cost, and then appropriations were made in a lump sum for those allocations. Now, under the legislation as it exists today, that authority was transferred, as I said a moment ago, to the Public Works Administration under the appropriation made for carrying out the National Industrial Recovery Act, and the duty devolves upon the Public Works Administrator of making the allocations. Gentlemen will find in the hearings, pages 543–544, a complete statement of building projects under the old program of building projects under the Emergency Relief Act program, where $100,000,000 was appropriated, and of building projects that have been undertaken under the Public Works Administration at the date of our hearings, together with the status of each and every one of those buildings. It is very interesting history, and I am sure Members will be very much interested in looking into it.

I pass now to the Post Office Department. I have given you the general appropriations for the Post Office Department, but there are a few things in that I want to deal with particularly, in view of the fact that it is a very, very live subject in this country today. I refer to the subsidies for the domestic air mail, foreign air mail, and ocean air mail.

Doubtless gentlemen have heard before from me from this floor my opposition to this method of granting subsidies for the development of aviation, for the development of our merchant marine, and for the development of our trade relations with the Central and South American Republics. I have always taken the position that it is entirely too much power to place in the hands of the Postmaster General or any one man to give him carte blanche authority and say to him, "Enter into a contract with whom you wish; you need pay no attention to the value of the services that the Government is to receive in return for the amount you pay, but pay the amount of money that you think ought to be paid for the development of aviation in this country, for the development of our merchant marine, and for the development of our trade relations in the Central and South American Republics." That authority was practically unlimited. From what we have been hearing, emanating from the other end of the Capitol, it seems that there has been something wrong in letting some of these contracts. Your committee at this stage of the game could not go into those questions, because we did not have the time, and for the further reason that it would be a duplication of the work that is being conducted by the Black committee, and also a duplication of the work that is being conducted to some extent by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads of the House, and also a duplication to some extent of the investigation being made by the Post Office Department itself and the Department of Justice in regard to these various contracts.

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ARNOLD. Yes.

Mr. GLOVER. Has the gentleman's committee thought of bringing out legislation to curb the very thing that he has spoken of, this great power being given to one man, and fixing it so that these charges cannot be again made, and so that the Government can be safeguarded in the making of these contracts hereafter.

Mr. ARNOLD. Permit me to say to the gentleman from Arkansas that the Appropriations Committee has no power whatever to bring out legislation. That is entirely beyond the functions of the Committee on Appropriations. However, the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads of the House has now under consideration some legislation wherein it is hoped to get away from some of the evils that are attendant upon this present system. So far as the Appropriations Committee of the House is concerned, all we can do is to go ahead and make available for use of these Departments the money that it deems is necessary for the carrying out of these contracts until their invalidity is determined.

May I say I have examined a number of those contracts, and as far as I can see the contracts on their face appear to be within the provisions of the law. If these contracts are invalid it is because of fraud in their inception and not from anything appearing on their face. Of course, if there is fraud in the inception of a contract, it vitiates the entire contract. If there is no fraud in the inception of the contract, then as far as the Committee on Appropriations is concerned, the only thing it can do is make the money available for the uses set forth, because the obligation of the Government is fixed by the contract, under legislation that has been passed by previous Congresses.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ARNOLD. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. While that is perfectly true with reference to the Committee on Appropriations, nevertheless, as the gentleman knows, section 5 of the Independent Offices Appropriation Act, 1934, gives the President the power, until April 1935, to modify or cancel any contracts that were made in connection with air mail or the carrying of ocean mail. Therefore, I think if the evidence that is being brought out is presented to the President, and is sufficient to warrant him to take action under that provision, he will act.

The President has the power under the Economy Act to cancel or modify any contract, even though there be no fraud, if in his judgment it is for the best interests of the Government.

Mr. ARNOLD. The gentleman from Missouri is entirely right in what he says, and there is no doubt in my mind whatever but what, if it is disclosed that there is fraud in the inception of those contracts, or if they were improperly granted, the President will exercise the authority vested in him to cancel them; but as far as your committee is concerned, its hands are tied until that is done.

Mr. TABER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ARNOLD. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. TABER. Is it not a fact that if there is fraud in connection with the inception of those contracts the President, without any provisions of the Economy Act, has the right to cancel them?

Mr. ARNOLD. If there is fraud in the inception of the contracts, they are void, ab initio, and they cannot be enforced.

Mr. TABER. And if there is no fraud in connection with them and they are valid contracts, under the Economy Act those people would have a claim for damages if the contracts were canceled?

Mr. ARNOLD. If the money is not made available and those contracts are valid contracts, the holders of the contracts can go into the Court of Claims and sue the Government and recover. We cannot escape the obligation of paying the amount called for under those contracts, if the contracts are not fraudulent. So the committee has accepted the Budget recommendations. We have made some reductions, however, in the amounts, and we deemed it advisable under the circumstances to make available this money. As far as the appropriation is concerned, it does not put the money into the hands of the people who hold the contracts. The money will not be spent for that purpose should the contracts be invalid, but it is made available for that purpose if the Post Office Department feels that these contracts are enforceable and should be complied with. Let me say in that connection that I have the utmost faith in the sincerity and integrity of the present Postmaster General. I am sure that when this matter comes before him it will be given careful and thoughtful consideration, and if any of these contracts have been improperly entered into, he will not permit a dollar of funds to go to the holders of the fraudulent contracts.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ARNOLD. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. SABATH. Did the gentleman's committee have any opportunity to study the method of how these contracts were awarded or parceled out, so that any investigation that has been made by the gentleman's committee could be submitted to the Postmaster General and also to the President, so that they could act without delay upon these fraudulent awards, or parceling out of these contracts?

Mr. ARNOLD. That would be a duplication of the work that is now being conducted by the Black committee. It would require an interminable amount of time and study and investigation, and your committee could not possibly have time to go into that, and we would not have authority, in any event, to determine whether those contracts were fraudulent.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. ARNOLD. I yield.

Mr. SABATH. Did the Post Office Committee make any recommendation to the gentleman's committee? The Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads started its investigation last year, and a great amount of evidence has been introduced showing fraud on the part of these contractors. I was hoping that the House committee, which started this investigation, would be in possession of facts that they would be able to submit to the gentleman's committee, as well as to the President and the Postmaster General, to bring about the early cancelation of all those contracts which had been obtained by fraud.

Mr. ARNOLD. I am satisfied that just as soon as the matter can be determined, if it is found that any of those contracts were improperly entered into or they were fraudulent in their inception, they will be set aside.

Mr. TABER. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. ARNOLD. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. TABER. Is it not a fact that if our committee had attempted to go into a complete investigation of this situation and had called the witnesses away from the Black committee, that would have had the effect of delaying the Black investigation?

Mr. ARNOLD. It would have that effect, and we could not possibly have that hearing and get that data collected in time to present this appropriation bill to this Congress.

Mr. PARSONS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ARNOLD. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. PARSONS. On page 55 of the bill where the total amount is specified, it is provided that "no part of the money herein appropriated shall be paid on contract no. 56 to the Seatrain Co." I wonder what the circumstances were surrounding that contract which would make an exception of that particular contract?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ARNOLD] has expired.

Mr. ARNOLD. I yield myself 15 additional minutes, Mr. Chairman.

In reply to the gentleman from Illinois, that language was carried in the bill last year. The Seatrain Co. is a company running car ferries in coastwise shipping on the Atlantic seaboard and Gulf, and there is a very serious question in our minds if it were not exclusively engaged in coastwise shipping. If it were engaged in coastwise shipping, it would not be entitled to any subsidy in competition with other companies engaged in coastwise shipping. This money is for the development of the merchant marine, and it applies in no way to coastwise shipping. Your committee thought last year—and the same condition exists now—that this contract which was proposed to be entered into with the Seatrain Co. was not justified and not warranted by the Merchant Marine Act of 1928. Therefore we withheld funds from it last year and we are withholding the funds from it this year, because we do not think that company is entitled to share in any amount of money that might be voted for that fund. No payments have been made under the contract and the Department is not placing mail on their boats.

Mr. PARSONS. If the gentleman will yield further, following up this matter, has this company applied to the Court of Claims for a refund on their contract?

Mr. ARNOLD. I do not know. We did not hear from the Seatrain Co. during these hearings. I presume they realize they are out of the picture so far as Congress is concerned. At any rate we are going to make it impossible for them to get any funds through this bill during the fiscal year 1935.

Mr. PARSONS. They have a contract but are not realizing anything out of it at the present time.

Mr. ARNOLD. That is the answer.

Taking up air mail, the estimated revenues from domestic air mail are $6,500,000. This indicates that there is a subsidy amounting to $7,500,000 for domestic air mail. Of course, you understand the purpose back of that law was to encourage the development of aviation in this country.

In the matter of foreign air mail, $7,000,000 has been earmarked for this service. The receipts from the foreign air mail are estimated at $1,250,000, indicating a subsidy of $5,750,000. The act of March 8, 1928, had as its specific purpose subsidizing commercial aviation for the development of trade relations with Central and South American Republics. German lines subsidized by the German Government are going into South America; and they are making a bold bid for this trade. French lines subsidized by the French Government are in this field are also making a bold bid for this trade.

Reports from the Department of Commerce show that our foreign trade in South America has been holding up very well, considering the general depression, and that is attributed in no small degree to our foreign air mail service in that territory; but there is quite a contest there as to the control of the South American trade, and this is the purpose back of the act that made possible the subsidy contracts for the foreign air mail. Those are 10-year contracts. Those contracts are fixed. Neither Congress nor the Government can escape liability for the amounts provided, if the contracts are otherwise valid; and in this connection permit me to say that each and every one of these contracts under domestic air mail, under foreign air mail, and under ocean mail was entered into before the 4th day of March 1933. No new contracts have been entered into since that time.

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ARNOLD. I yield.

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. And some of the contracts were entered into within 4 or 5 days of March 4 last.

Mr. ARNOLD. At least within a very few days of the 4th of March as to one or two.

Mr. TERRELL of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ARNOLD. I yield.

Mr. TERRELL of Texas. Did testimony before the committee show it was advantageous to the Government to make these long contracts—the 10-year contracts, for instance?

Mr. ARNOLD. That is water over the dam, I may say to the gentleman from Texas. The policy of the Congress was determined when these laws were enacted in previous Congresses, and the Appropriations Committee has no power to change the policy of Congress. That can only be done through new legislation.

Mr. TERRELL of Texas. Under the statutes is there no power to cancel these contracts?

Mr. ARNOLD. We have given the President power, under section 5 of the Independent Offices Appropriation Act, 1934, to cancel contracts; but if he does cancel those contracts, if they are valid contracts, our Government will have to respond in damages to the extent the holders of the contracts are damaged.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ARNOLD. I yield.

Mr. TARVER. The Government, however, would not have to respond to the extent of the contract price. Damages are given for the injuries sustained, and the measure of damages would merely be the amount of loss suffered by the party having the contract by reason of its cancelation. The measure of damages would not be the amount provided in the contract as a subsidy. Is not this true?

Mr. ARNOLD. I think the gentleman is correct.

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ARNOLD. I yield.

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Under the economy bill the gentleman says the President has the authority to cancel these contracts. Under that same economy bill practically all the contracts between the Government and the disabled veterans have been canceled. By the gentleman's argument in the case of the air mail contracts, the veterans would have the same right to claim damages from the Government, for they built homes on the assumption that the allowances and pensions would be continued. They would have the same right the shipping companies have, would they not?

Mr. ARNOLD. Oh, no. They are not on the same basis at all. In one case you have an executed contract; in the other case there is no executed contract.

Mr. SHOEMAKER. But in both cases they are contracts.

Mr. ARNOLD. They are not contracts on the same basis at all.

Mr. PARSONS and Mr. DOWELL rose.

Mr. ARNOLD. Pardon me, gentlemen. I have not very much time and I have many subjects to cover. If you have questions to ask, please make them brief.

Mr. PARSONS. The gentleman is making a very splendid exposition of the bill. I do not want to take any of his time, in view of his statement.

Mr. ARNOLD. I should be pleased to answer the gentleman's question if he will make it brief.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ARNOLD. I yield.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman advise the House the length of time these contracts run, so we may have definite information about them?

Mr. ARNOLD. The ocean mail contracts are 10-year contracts. They run for a full and complete 10 years. I do not think any of these contracts will expire before 1938. The foreign air mail contracts, too, are 10-year contracts; but the contracts in the case of domestic air mail are on a different basis.

They first entered into contracts. Then the law permitted an arrangement whereby certificates might be given, but these certificates are 10-year certificates. Under the Watres Domestic Air Mail Act it is possible for the Postmaster General to reduce the rates to such an extent that they would strangle the contracts and would not be of very much use to the holders of these certificates. All of the original contracts formerly entered into for domestic air mail transportation have been surrendered and certificates issued in each and every case.

Mr. DOWELL. Can the gentleman tell us why the others have not been canceled in the same way?

Mr. ARNOLD. The law does not provide for that. There are three different laws here, I may say to the gentleman. For the domestic air mail, under the certificate plan, the Postmaster General can say how much money he will pay for carrying the mail. He must review the rates at least once a year.

Under the ocean mail contracts and under the foreign air mail contracts the rates of compensation are fixed by law, but the rate of compensation so far as the ocean mail contracts are concerned automatically increases by reason of the fact that the holders of these contracts are obligated to build new ships, bigger ships, and speedier ships, and as they built those new and speedier ships and put them into commission, then the amount that they are to get for the pretext of carrying this mail is automatically increased. This is provided by their original contract.

Mr. DOWELL. Does not the gentleman understand they would only be able to recover if they were canceled—and they should be canceled—what they have actually been damaged, if they are able to recover at all? Should not we establish the principle here of canceling the contracts and not continue further any contract that is against the interests of the people of the United States?

Mr. ARNOLD. I do not think these contracts can be canceled unless there is fraud shown in their inception without the Government responding in damages.

Mr. HENNEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ARNOLD. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. HENNEY. Were these contracts let after competitive bids were submitted?

Mr. ARNOLD. So we are informed. There was some degree of competition.

Mr. HENNEY. I was under the impression that there were about six or eight of them that were not let under competitive bidding.

Mr. ARNOLD. In some of these contracts there was practically no competition, but they were let in the form of competitive bidding.

I have here a very interesting study of the Post Office Department. This is the cost ascertainment report for the fiscal year 1933. There are some very interesting data in this. This gives a rather complete set-up of the postal operations for the fiscal year 1933. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to insert this in the RECORD because I think it is very informative.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

The matter is as follows:

Recapitulation of allocations and apportionments of postal revenues and expenditures for the fiscal year 1933 to the classes of mail and special services, not taking into account relative priority, degrees of preferment, and value of service in respect to expenditures—Continued

	Revenues	Expenditures	Excess of apportioned expenditures over revenues	Excess of revenues over apportioned expenditures
Expense credits (act of June 9, 1930): Aircraft service		$20,036,482.16
Differential favoring vessels of American registry		25,228,463.41
Grand total, 1933 (adjusted to the act of June 9, 1930)	$604,769,078.14	653,085,083.59	$48,316,005.45

Mr. ARNOLD. It will be observed that the total deficit for the fiscal year 1933 is $110,007,292.04. There has been much comment in the press about the cost of franked mail by Members of Congress. Referring to this table of revenues and expenditures it will be seen that the cost to the Government for carrying franked mail for Members of Congress is $570,436.07, or less than one tenth of 1 percent of the total postal expenditures. The cost of carrying penalty mail for departments of Government, other than the Post Office Department, is $4,417,744.36. If second-class matter (newspapers) that now goes free of cost in the county had paid the regular postage applying to that class, it would have yielded to the Government receipts of $538,221, while publications that are now exempt from zone rates would have contributed to the postal receipts an additional $458,569.02, had the regular rate of postage been paid on such publications. It will be noted, further, that the expense credit of aircraft service of $20,036,482.16 and differential favoring vessels of American registry of $25,228,463.41, or a total of $45,264,945.57, is included in the grand total of expenditures of $653,085,083.59. If all the nonpostal activities were figured in on a basis of what would have been received therefrom had the regular postage been paid, and the amounts paid for subsidies deducted, the deficit for the fiscal year 1933 would have been $48,316,005.45.

Mr. Chairman, there is before you here [indicating] a chart which has a vast amount of information on it. This gives a remarkably complete picture of our postal receipts and expenditures from the year 1914 to the year 1935. Of course, the figures for 1934 and 1935 are more or less estimates, but it shows what the exact figures are for 1933 and prior years. The columns in red represent the expenses of the Post Office Department.

The heavy red in each column of expenditures is the sum total of salaries, and as you read across the columns you can get a comparison year by year of the expenses and receipts of our postal functions. For instance, in 1933 our total postal expenses were around $650,000,000. This checkered area gives the nonpostal and down below, in different designations, are the other designated elements that enter into the maintenance of the Post Office Department. Here are the receipts in the columns in black. The solid black represents the sales of stamped paper and the various other receipts are shown by special designations. I have not the time to explain this fully and give you the whole story, but it will be interesting for the Members to study the chart. I doubt if it is possible to have this incorporated in the RECORD. I have tried to give you, Mr. Chairman and Members of the Committee, in a general way, a picture of the postal functions, both receipts and expenditures, without going into details.

It seems to me that under the contracts and the state that they are in now, we will have to make this money available for domestic air mail, foreign air mail, and ocean mail as much as some of us dislike to do. We cannot tell what the developments may be from the investigations now being conducted. Something perhaps may be done later. But at the present time the only thing to do, as I see it, is to make this money available for obligations that have been fixed by contracts solemnly entered into by Government officials who were authorized to enter into contracts of the character specified under the laws enacted by previous Congresses.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Will the gentleman yield?

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TABER. I yield the gentleman an additional 5 minutes.

Mr. ARNOLD. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Would anything be lost if we should strike the appropriation out of the bill and await the disclosures in the committee now investigating these contracts, and then put through special appropriation bills later, providing whatever money the Government may need to meet its honest obligations?

Mr. ARNOLD. I believe it is not wise to entirely crucify the domestic air mail. If you strike these appropriations out, you are crucifying the domestic air mail, and I do not believe the country is ready for that. The country is interested, so far as these matters are concerned, in squeezing out the subsidies and getting down to a basis of pay for services rendered.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. It was not my suggestion that we should crucify the air mail. My suggestion is that inasmuch as the money we are now appropriating is to be available for the fiscal year ending July 1, 1935, that we can well defer the appropriation of the amount that we shall appropriate for that purpose until the facts which are now being brought out can be made completely available to us.

Mr. ARNOLD. This money will not be used unless it is necessary to use it. The mere fact that we have appropriated the money does not mean it must be spent. This bill makes it available. No one can tell at this stage of the game what the outcome is going to be. Here is a solemn obligation of our Government, entered into by Government officials that were authorized and empowered under laws enacted by Congress to do the things that have been done. If they have been properly done, we have to go ahead and furnish the money. If they have been improperly done, this is a matter that would have to be determined when it is ascertained whether or not the contracts are valid.

Mr. PARSONS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ARNOLD. Yes.

Mr. PARSONS. I do not think there is any Member of this House who is for an out-and-out subsidy to some individual or some corporation to make money or fleece the Government out of money. However, there are a number of Members in this House who are in favor of the development of our merchant marine and the development of our air mail, both domestic and foreign. Has the gentleman ever given any consideration to paying these companies what they should be paid in the way of carrying the mail, whether it is ocean mail or air mail, and then have some other agency furnish the subsidy without linking it up with the postal fund and showing a deficit in the Post Office Department, when really the deficit should apply to some agency besides the Post Office Department?

Mr. ARNOLD. I think these things should not be linked up with the Post Office Department, and I think further it is entirely wrong to put the power in the hands of one man to determine the subsidies. If we are to vote subsidies, the Congress itself ought to vote them and determine in its own way how much they want to give by way of subsidy for anything.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ARNOLD. I yield.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Having made that confession, has not the gentleman admitted that the proper course for us to pursue is to strike this item out of the appropriation bill and consider it on its merits later on when we have ascertained what are the facts?

Mr. ARNOLD. Does the gentleman think we ought to stop all of our outgoing foreign mail at the shore line?

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. I would call the gentleman's attention to the fact that these appropriations are for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1934, and, certainly, whether we appropriate this money or not would not stop any mail going out from our ports in the meantime.

Mr. ARNOLD. It would at the time this appropriation bill becomes effective, if there were no money provided.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. ARNOLD. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. DOWELL. I understood the gentleman to say that the appropriation of this money did not mean its expenditure. From my understanding of the gentleman's argument, he states that we have an obligation which we must carry on. If this be true, we will spend the money if it is appropriated.

Mr. ARNOLD. We must furnish the money for that purpose, and the mere appropriation of it does not spend it. If these contracts are declared invalid or if they are canceled, then the money we provide in this bill will not be spent by the Post Office Department.

Mr. DOWELL. That is true; but as I understood the gentleman, the appropriation of the money does not mean its expenditure. From the gentleman's argument, it does mean the expenditure of the money, because if we appropriate the money we are going to carry out the provisions of these contracts.

Mr. ARNOLD. Oh, no; the act of appropriation makes it available for expenditure by the Department. In 1934 we appropriated vast sums of money that have not been spent and will not be spent but will be covered back into the Treasury.

Mr. DOWELL. Does the gentleman mean under these contracts?

Mr. ARNOLD. Some, under these contracts; yes.

Mr. DOWELL. The gentleman means that the contracts have not been complied with in all particulars by the Government.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 3 additional minutes.

Mr. ARNOLD. There are some variables in the contracts, as, for instance frequency of sailings and flight and suspension of trips on certain routes, and frequency of sailings and ports of call and things of that kind. There are variables whereby the amount of pay is not constant. All the contracts are based upon variables that enter into them to some extent.

Mr. DOWELL. But such provision is not in the ocean mail contracts?

Mr. ARNOLD. Yes; there is some variation in the ocean mail contracts in regard to the frequency of sailings call-at-ports, and so forth, provisions. I do not know just the extent of this, but there is some variable that enters into the amount that is finally paid.

Mr. STUDLEY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ARNOLD. I yield.

Mr. STUDLEY. Is it not true that the officers and directors of these ship-subsidy companies are among the most prominent and conspicuous members of the National Economy League?

Mr. ARNOLD. I have heard so.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 7 minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MERRITT].

Mr. MERRITT. Mr. Chairman, yesterday the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED] referred to a project to construct a factory in Reedsville, W.Va., for the purpose of making post-office screens. I am not sure that all the Members know what is covered by the words "post-office screens." This means that part of the office which the public really uses, the delivery windows, the post-office boxes, money-order counters, and so forth. This consists mostly of cabinet work, but also includes a considerable amount of hardware, such as locks, lockboxes, and door hinges.

The population of the town of Reedsville is somewhere between 300 and 400 people. The factory is authorized to cost $525,000. It seems clear that no ordinary business man who proposes to manufacture this class of goods would put it in a town of this sort, because it is perfectly evident that the population of the town cannot possibly supply workmen to run the factory. It is evident that the men who are to do this cabinet work and manufacture this hardware have to be skilled workmen and they must be brought in from other parts of the country. It is equally evident that the construction of this factory is entirely uneconomical, because at the present time in the United States there are too many factories and too few jobs. If and when the factory gets going, all the work which it turns out will take away work from people who are already employed, men who have been trained in the business and who have been making their living in this way for years. This does not seem to me to be either economical or humanitarian.

Perhaps you may also know that the great bulk of the post-office equipment in this country is required for private buildings.

In the ordinary small town the Government does not build the post office but it is leased and the equipment is bought by the man who owns the building.

When this factory is completed and in operation in Reedsville it is evident that the management will seek work all over the United States and the private manufacturer under these circumstances will be under a fatal handicap because the Government factory does not have to consider any interest on the cost of the factory or any taxes or any profit. Any deficit will be paid by the United States. In all these Government enterprises the bookkeeping is not scientific, as pointed out by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LUDLOW] the other day. They will go into the market and compete on an entirely unfair basis with private factories.

This one factory in itself is perhaps not very important but it is very important because it initiates the policy of the United States going into commercial business in competition with private parties. On that very question, as Mr. REED pointed out, when it was proposed to use the United States prison at Leavenworth to manufacture furniture, the Congress decided almost unanimously that that should not be permitted. I submit the principle is the same in this case as in the case of Leavenworth. That, I think, is a fundamental question of policy.

There is another and still deeper fundamental policy, namely, that you cannot combine business and politics and the Government cannot do any business where politics does not enter. That has been shown in the Post Office Department for years; and it is true, not only of one political party but both political parties. On every change of administration the experienced officials are taken out and men without any experience put in their place. That shows what would happen to ordinary business if the Government ran it.

I think you will all agree that we are not prepared to add to the present economic confusion by putting the Government into direct competition with private capital.

Mr. LAMNECK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MERRITT. I yield.

Mr. LAMNECK. Where do they get this money, is it in this appropriation bill?

Mr. MERRITT. No; I understand that the money has been allocated by the Public Works Administration.

Mr. EDMONDS. I can answer the gentleman. The money comes from the $25,000,000 that was given the President under the N.R.A., and the money for the building has been allotted by the P.W.A., $525,000.

Mr. LAMNECK. I agree with the gentleman exactly that we ought to stop this kind of foolishness.

Mr. MILLARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MERRITT. I yield.

Mr. MILLARD. Have you taken this up with the committee headed by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHANNON]? I agree with the gentleman absolutely.

Mr. MERRITT. As I said before, it is not the amount of money, although $525,000 is worthy of consideration, but this Reedsville factory will start a policy which will endure and be destructive of private business all through this country. I do not think it should be permitted. Therefore I hope that gentlemen will use their influence with their colleagues and with the administration to stop this far-reaching and dangerous policy. [Applause.]

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GILCHRIST].

Mr. GILCHRIST. Mr. Chairman, we must believe in the inherent and genuine worth of every man and every woman—the poor, the rich, the lame, the halt, the blind. We must believe that every man should have opportunities to extend his sphere beyond the physical barriers which circumscribe him and finally obtain the fullest expression of his individuality. But, after all, their physical wants are of first importance, and the realization of their potentialities and possibilities cannot take place when men have no bread to eat. There is no hope for a generation of men and women who cannot find employment. The first duty of statesmanship is to see to it that men and women are given an opportunity to earn their bread by honest work. When millions of men are out of work the cry for bread is the most plaintive and impelling cry that can possibly reach the ears of those who are in authority. Without jobs for its members society is bankrupt. It is better to give men jobs than to give them doles. We are all joined together in one fellowship. We are our brother's keeper. We want bread for every man who will work, and we must give bread to every man who has worked. And whenever the introduction of machinery displaces human labor, statesmen are bound to see that industry and capital do not take all the gains without bearing a substantial part, and a very substantial part, of the consequent dislocation of the human element. The public must absorb the maladjustment which follows technocracy. Society pays for misery and distress, for hunger and want and suffering. Society always pays.

I am therefore glad that we have in the White House a man whose heart beats in sympathy with his fellow creatures. I am glad that his political program is one which rejects the laissez-faire, do-nothing policy. We are not going to allow men and women to starve in this country. I am glad that women and children are to be clothed. It is our disgrace that our people are starving beside bursting granaries; that they are suffering from cold when production of material for fabrics is abundant; that hunger and want and distress stalk the land like a pestilence at noonday—all at a time when we are rich not alone in production but in possibilities—the richest people in all the world. I therefore rejoice that we have in the White House a man who believes that the Government should reach out its philanthropic hand to relieve distress by giving jobs to workingmen.

The Civil Works program is as bold as it is humanitarian. It is conceived in Christian brotherhood, and is in answer to the call of humanity. But there are some things about its administration that merit adverse criticism. Brotherly love and humanitarian sentiments are not consistent with injustice and rank discrimination. There was promulgated last Friday by the Administrator of the C.W.A. an order which is illogical and undemocratic, which separates the citizens of this country into artificial classes and groups, which tries to divide them into two classes, and to separate the sheep from the goats, and which raises unfair differences among us in regard to giving men the right to earn bread by the sweat of their face. I must brand that order as a most unhappy and wicked one, and one which cannot be defended upon any rational theory. If all men are created equal, then certainly the right to labor in the C.W.A. ought to be equally distributed and not allowed to rest on artificial and foolish distinctions.

The regulation referred to was made by Mr. Hopkins, Administrator of the Civil Works program. A copy of it will be found on page 1195 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 23, having been inserted in the RECORD by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CARPENTER]. Mr. Hopkins decreed that all per diem workers are hereafter to be divided into two classes, and that a man who happens to live in a town of 2,500 population may have a work week of 24 hours, but a man who happens to live in a town of lesser population may work only 15 hours.

About 19 centuries ago there came on earth a great Teacher who told men to pray to Almighty God for their daily bread. The Son of Man did not indicate a religious philosophy which was artificial and did not teach us to pray for fifteen twenty-fifths of a daily ration. I must make it plain that I am for a policy which will give jobs to laboring men. I am for a government or administration which approves and grants their prayer for daily bread. But just as such a policy is kind and beneficent, so also must a policy of discrimination in awarding jobs be indefensible and wicked.

I am convinced that the administrator of this magnificent venture and noble experiment has entered such discrimination without adequate study and without sufficient reason. There is no logic in it. It is not armed with facts and data and cannot find support in any rational theory. It is unkind and heartless and runs contrary to every precept of democracy. The hand of philanthropy did not write it, nor was it actuated by any sense of fairness or of charity. It offends every idea that rights and privileges should be awarded equally to all of our citizens. It will not give sufficient work to hungry men who need it. It will not clothe those who are ragged or those who may be suffering from wintry blasts.

Are you hungry? Well, it is just too bad! You live in a village and you ought not to expect to get the same rights that go to city folks who reside where the bright lights shine and the street cars clang. Have you a child whom you want to protect from exposure and cold, perhaps in a northern winter? Well, your child is not as worthy as other children who play around the city square or in the public park. We have determined that you can work only 15 hours per week, while your brother who lives ten or fifty or a thousand miles away can work 24 hours per week. Does your wife need shelter? Well, go ask for lodgment in the county house. You ought not to live in a village anyway. You ought to move away from the open spaces and get yourself into bigger places where congregations are larger or political influence is, perhaps, more centered and therefore quicker in action and more powerful in achieving results.

Mr. Chairman, I have made inquiry of those who ought to know and have asked the reasons for this order. No satisfactory answer was or can be given to the criticism of such an unfounded regulation. They attempt to defend it almost wholly because they needed more money. Rents are not lower in villages under 2,500 than they are in thousands of towns over that population. Groceries are no less in the smaller place. Clothing is no less. In fact these are very likely to be higher in the smaller villages than in the larger towns.

I repeat that I thank the President and the administration for this bold and fearless endeavor. It is concrete humanitarianism and not abstraction. It is broad benevolence. It is social philanthropy. It regards the whole of mankind. We must vote money for it. But this money, when voted, should be evenly distributed according to needs and conditions and not farmed out to favored communities without a study of real needs.

I am not against giving jobs to folks in cities of more than 2,500. I pray that they shall be relieved also. Vote the money for them. Give them jobs, too. But I want all to be treated with an even-handed justice. I want no unfair differentiations. I am protesting an unfair thing which prevents a large number of men who need work from getting enough of it to supply their needs. These men are American citizens as well as those who reside in larger places. They are just as honest, just as industrious, and just as willing to work as anybody. They are guilty of no crime except it be the high crime and misdemeanor of living in a community of less than 2,500 souls!

We must vote money to carry out this policy honestly and fairly to all. We must vote money sufficient to do away with a regulation which has been promulgated, as I believe, without any adequate study of the facts, is based on no data that can support it, and is advanced without knowledge of the situation except to say, "Well, we need the money."

I repeat that I thank the President and the administration for a bold and fearless policy which gives work to workingmen. I shall always be glad to vote for anything that relieves suffering; but when the money is to be distributed in the name of philanthropy or of fairness, then let it be distributed wisely and upon some rational basis. Let us not do injury to one in order to help another. Let us not rob Peter to pay Paul.

In closing, I do not charge anyone with wrongful intentions, but I do believe that some of those who are in charge of the distribution of this money have come to hasty and untenable conclusions. If such an order can be defended because the cost of living is less in a town of 1,500 than in a town of 2,500, then let the figures be discovered and disclosed. But it is not so. I know that there are no such figures. If the money is to be distributed as a right, then this order violates right, because it is unfair and discriminatory. It is not a charity, because charity is unearned and is cold, and this money should be distributed with sympathetic consideration for all citizens. If misguided people should believe that the money is given in the name of mercy, then this order is not merciful, because the quality of mercy is not strained. Let us vote the money and abrogate a wicked, uncharitable, unmerciful, unfair, unwise, and undemocratic order and regulation. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I have received several telegrams and letters about this matter, which I ask unanimous consent to incorporate in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The telegrams are as follows:

POCAHONTAS, IOWA, January 20, 1934.

Hon. FRED C. GILCHRIST,
House Office Building:

Pocahontas County C.W.A. workers cut to 15 hours per week. Complaints received our office regard to workers in adjoining counties permitted to work 24 hours per week. Adjoining counties no larger in population, no different in unemployment, no different in living conditions; difference made because of single town in county over 2,500 population. In one case we have 50 men working at Storm Lake alongside men from Buena Vista and Sac. Ours cut to 15 hours, theirs to 24 hours. This is unjust discrimination against our workers. Make strong protest at once to authorities in charge. Pocahontas County issued $31,000 bonds for poor relief last year, now issuing $28,000 for same purpose; more necessary unless C.W.A. program continued.

C. B. MCCARTAN,
Chairman Reemployment Committee.
R. L. HUDEK,
Chairman Board of Supervisors.

FOREST CITY, IOWA, January 20, 1934.

Hon. FRED C. GILCHRIST,
House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.:

We, the undersigned, are protesting the reduction of hours in C.W.A. work in Winnebago County. Surrounding counties have been cut 6 hours per week and we have been cut 15 hours per week. Living costs are the same here as in surrounding counties. We feel this is an injustice and would appreciate any help you can give us in adjusting this.

H. F. THOMPSON,
Civil Works Administrator,
G. S. JONES,
Chairman National Reemployment Service,
Board of Supervisors, Winnebago County.

HUMBOLDT, IOWA, January 20, 1934.

Congressman F. C. GILCHRIST,
House Office Building:

We protest discrimination in hours for C.W.A. workers; $7.50 week not living wages in this county. We urge you to use your influence to secure 24-hour week for C.W.A. workers in this county. We demand equality with surrounding counties. We represent sentiment of entire county.

O. J. OLSON,
Chairman Board of Supervisors.
GEO. K. MCCOLLOUGH,
Mayor of Humboldt.
FRANKLIN JAQUA,
Chairman Emergency Relief Committee.
S. M. HELGELAND,
Manager National Reemployment Office.
Dr. IVAN T. SCHULTZ,
President Chamber of Commerce.

Mr. ARNOLD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MEAD].

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Chairman, it is my desire to discuss commercial aviation in the time allotted to me, and I hope to intensify the interest of at least a few of the Members in this subject. I want their support and cooperation in an effort which our committee will make in this Congress to put the air mail on a self-sustaining basis, to take it out of the subsidy, to pay the air mail lines for the services they perform. It is not my desire to advocate increasing the appropriations for air mail. I am not interested in the desires of any particular section of the country, so far as securing added or retaining present air mail privileges are concerned. I am not concerned with the efforts of any individual air mail contractor, but I approach this subject from the standpoint of the welfare of our National Government, its usefulness in promoting trade and commerce, and its usefulness as a means of national defense. It might seem farfetched, but, in my judgment, if Congress 22 years ago had recognized the future possibilities of aviation, if it had agreed with a recommendation of the Post Office Department and had made an appropriation for an experimental air mail line, the United States Government would have been a more effective power in bringing about a termination of the World War. We neglected that opportunity when Congress turned down the Post Office Department's recommendation to establish an experimental air service.

Later, and before the war, the Post Office Department in an attempt to utilize this new transportation facility, advertised for bids, but because of the condition of the industry at that time, there was not a contractor who could furnish the equipment required under the specifications issued at that time, and so only in 1918, with the war upon us, did the Congress become properly concerned with this new transportation facility. I maintain that had the United States Government pioneered as it should have in the development of aviation, as was the case with foreign governments, many lives would have been saved by a more speedy termination of the World War. So far as our contribution to the World War is concerned, in connection with aircraft and aircraft equipment, I need only explain to you that it became the subject of a very serious controversy which resulted in the appointment of a special investigating committee to find out why we were not able to get a first-class fighting airship over there during that conflict.

Last year we spent approximately $148,000,000 for aviation for the Army, the Navy, for commercial aeronautics, and for air mail in the Post Office Department, but of all that tremendous appropriation only about $8,000,000 was appropriated in the form of subsidy for postal aviation activities. True, the appropriation totaled $14,000,000, but it can be explained that approximately $6,000,000 of that in some form or other found its way back into the Treasury of the United States, either as mail revenue or in some form of taxes. It should be remembered that we maintain over 600 trained pilots in the Air Mail Service without expense to the Government, and it is held in reliable quarters that it costs the United States Government upward of $20,000 to train a pilot, and at least half that much to keep him in training. Here is a magnificent body of men trained up to the minute without cost to the Government except what cost might be charged to the subsidy.

Recognizing the fact that we neglected the opportunity to build up this great arm for our national defense prior to the World War, and because of the fact that we are going to bring in an appropriation bill in a few days for a treaty navy, I believe the Congress ought to become more interested in this question. For a few dollars, in comparison with the millions spent in other activities, we can command the best air corps in all the world and set up along every coast line an almost impenetrable defense. We have today skirting the Atlantic and the Pacific and the international border to the north and to the south air lines, splendidly equipped for all kinds of flying, with every modern facility for safety and speed that a modern air line could have. We have along the east coast, from Boston down to the Keys, an air line with many stations, well lighted with beacon lights, where the personnel, both mechanics and pilots, could be turned over to the Government in an hour's notice. This system has been built up, in most part, with little Federal expense, and is available in an hour's notice for our national defense. Therefore, I believe the money we spend in the development of commercial aviation is a good investment. This small expenditure we make to keep these ships of every type flying, to keep these pilots trained to the minute, to keep developing this industry, and to keep America in the forefront among the nations of the world, is, in my judgment, as good an investment as the investment we will be called upon to make next week for battleships.

So with that in mind I want the interest of my colleagues for a few moments to explain to you what our committee is trying to do. We recognize the unfair, unjust administration of the air mail lines under the former Postmaster General—the discrimination and favoritism in the extension of contracts and in his czarlike attitude in forcing consolidations, depriving independent lines of their day in court—but we are not going to be content with finding fault with what he has done. We are eager to build for the future in order that America might always command its rightful place in this new industry. The investigations of the Post Office Department have been very helpful and indicate the need of new legislation.

In 1925 our committee passed its first bill, the Kelly bill. In that bill the air mail contractor received four fifths of the revenues accruing from the mails carried. It was decided in 1926 that that was a rather cumbersome method of computation, so an amendment was passed giving the contractor $3 a pound. This simplified the work of the Department and of the carriers in counting the mail. In both measures the underlying principle of the legislation was to give the carrier a percentage of the revenues he produced. Air mail developed, but not as speedily as it should have developed.

In 1930 the Postmaster General recommended what became the Watrous Act, which entirely changed the method of payment. This act authorized the Postmaster General to grant extensions and to effect consolidations, to pay the contractor on a definite space-weight basis. We found as a result of the passage of the so-called "Watrous Act" the Postmaster General contracting for a great deal of space, far more than was ever used on some lines, and paying as much as $1.25 a mile. We found that the space in some of the ships was used to a very marked degree and in others there was not 5 percent of the space used for postal purposes. So most of the difficulties that developed as the result of the efforts of Congress to develop the Air Mail Service came through the administration of the Watrous Act. Our committee now is very anxious to repeal this obnoxious law. We want to return to a definite fixed-price basis, so that an air mail contractor will be paid in proportion to the work he performs, so that there will be some reason and definiteness to our air mail policy. We feel that the air mail has grown so rapidly that it is now time to terminate the subsidy, at least insofar as the major number of companies are concerned; and in order not to do an injustice to the smaller companies, we believe that for a period of 5 years a reduced subsidy should be continued, until it is finally eliminated.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. MEAD] has expired.

Mr. ARNOLD. I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes.

Mr. TABER. I yield the gentleman from New York 3 additional minutes.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEAD. Yes. I yield.

Mr. RAMSPECK. I was just wondering if the gentleman has any figures to show whether those companies are performing a service that actually costs more than they receive from the Government, in which event, of course, it would not be a subsidy.

Mr. MEAD. I may say to the gentleman that there are two lines at least that are earning more than they are receiving. There are two or three other companies that are approximately in that same position.

Mr. FOCHT. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. MEAD. Certainly.

Mr. FOCHT. May I ask whether there has been any marked increase in commerce in consequence of this subsidy to the air mail companies?

Mr. MEAD. I think I can say that as the result of our assistance to the Pan-American Lines, which operates through Central and South America and the islands of the Caribbean Sea, we have developed not only more trade and commerce but a goodwill and a better understanding, all of which is most beneficial.

I said a moment ago that the time is ripe for the termination of the air mail subsidy. To prove that assertion let me briefly explain to you just how this particular industry has developed. Everybody realizes that the coal industry, the railroad industry, and nearly every other industry has gone through 3 terrible years and that their revenues have been decreasing rather than increasing. On the other hand, the passenger business and the express business of the aviation industry has increased tremendously, and it is now ready to stand upon its own feet.

Mr. GLOVER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MEAD. I shall be very glad to.

Mr. GLOVER. How much deficit is caused by the air mail service now?

Mr. MEAD. I would say about $7,000,000 would be a very liberal estimate, although it has been estimated as low as $6,000,000 and as high as $8,000,000; but I would say approximately $7,000,000.

Mr. GLOVER. What is the deficit now in the receipts from all sources in the Post Office Department?

Mr. MEAD. For our domestic air mail we are appropriating $14,000,000. It is estimated, as I say, that they will earn about $7,000,000.

Mr. GLOVER. If these evils that are spoken of could be corrected, we could soon return to the lower rate of postage and stop this 3-cent postage that we are now paying.

Mr. MEAD. I am glad the gentleman brought that question up, because in my judgment it was a mistake to increase postage rates.

Mr. GLOVER. I think so, too.

Mr. MEAD. The longer we continue the increase, the more difficult it will be for us to regain the lost volume. In other words, if we have 3-cent postage for 1 year, we might win back the lost business in a period of 3 or 4 years; but if we continue this high rate of postage over a period of years, there is no doubt but that a large volume of business will for a long time remain outside of the Postal Service.

Mr. GLOVER. I hope the gentleman will bring in a bill at this session of Congress to put the postage rate back where it was.

Mr. MEAD. I think we will bring in a bill, and I will ask the gentleman to help us in securing its passage.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. MEAD] has again expired.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SWICK].

Mr. SWICK. Mr. Chairman, on January 10, 1934, I called attention of this House to certain conditions concerning employment in one of the divisions of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation which appeared to be quite irregular, to say the least. The gist of my remarks at that time called attention to charges made by one of my constituents, to the effect that the Washington Business Bureau, operated by John D. Kendall, located in the Bond Building, this city, had furnished certain employees to the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, after having collected certain fees from them, with the understanding that the employees so placed would continue to pay a percentage of their salary to the Washington Business Bureau in payment for having been placed in employment.

I placed the facts before John H. Fahey, Chairman of the Federal Home Loan Bank Board, on January 9, and requested that he investigate the charges. Mr. Fahey has gone into the matter thoroughly and has submitted a report on the matter which I feel is of interest to the Members of this House.

It is interesting to note that Mr. Kendall claims to have been called upon to supply help to several Government offices. If this is true, those offices should be investigated, and I have advised the Department of Justice that they should endeavor to verify his statement and determine the reason for such request having been made. It is certainly time that we insist on fair treatment of those who seek Federal employment. Employment agencies operating for profit should be impressed with the fact that they are not needed to secure personnel for the Federal service.

With the many charges being hurled at the heads of the C.W.A. concerning unfair—and that is putting it mildly—practices in the selection of workers by some local administrators, we should insist on some drastic action, which would deter those who cannot resist the temptation to exploit the unemployed. I am proud to state that I have not had one letter of complaint from my district relative to C.W.A. employment. The administrators in each of my three counties are to be commended upon the splendid manner in which they have carried on their duties, without the slightest rumor of scandal attached to their administration. They are doing a great work, and are entitled to receive the respect of their communities, and their superiors.

The following correspondence from Mr. Fahey explains the attitude of the administration, which I think is right, and the results of the investigation conducted by him:

Office of John H. Fahey, Chairman.

Hon. J. HOWARD SWICK,
House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: I want to acknowledge and thank you for your letter of January 9, bringing to my attention the fact that one of the employees of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation engaged the services of a local employment agency in his effort to secure additional clerical employees.

Let me assure you that we would not approve this procedure under any circumstances.

I appreciate your bringing the matter directly to my attention.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN H. FAHEY, Chairman.

Re: Employment of typists through the Washington Business Bureau.

Hon. J. HOWARD SWICK,
House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN SWICK: Supplementing my letter to you of January 15, concerning the above case, I am inclosing herewith a copy of a report made by our personnel officer after an exhaustive investigation of the matter, both through the office of Mr. Downes and through the Washington Business Bureau.

Mr. Scott's summary reported in his memorandum to my deputy, Mr. Ormond E. Loomis, under date of January 22, is comprehensive. Mr. Scott's investigation fails to reveal any collusion, but does reveal careless stupidity on the part of Mr. Downes in dealing with the employment of typists for the per diem work over which he had charge.

Mr. Scott does not recommend the removal of Mr. Downes, but suggests that the question of his removal be left in abeyance temporarily.

Mr. Downes, through the investigation, has shown a disposition to do the right thing and is not only mortified, but ready to accept whatever judgment we reach with respect to his continuance. He will be glad to resign immediately, or to accept discharge; but, in view of his own financial needs and the fact that he does not appear to have been consciously guilty of misconduct, we are inclined to let him continue, at least temporarily.

Very truly yours,

JOHN H. FAHEY, Chairman.

JANUARY 22, 1934.

Memorandum to: Mr. Loomis.
From: Mr. Scott.

I have investigated the matter of the employment of several typists through the Washington Business Bureau, an employment agency. So far as I can ascertain, there are eight who have been thus employed, all of whom have been working under the supervision of Mr. Downes.

Mr. Downes came to me on January 10 and attempted to explain the matter, a memorandum of that call being in the enclosed papers. In answer to my question, Downes stated that he had not previously known Kendall, the owner of the agency. Later Downes phoned that he had talked with Kendall over the telephone and that the latter stated that he had met him at a cocktail party some 2 months previously. In his statement to me Downes indicated that in the beginning Kendall telephoned that he understood there were some typists needed, that he (Downes) confirmed this, and that Kendall thereupon stated that he would send some over. During the course of the investigation Mr. Mackey stated that there was urgent need for the typists and that Downes stated he could get them quickly. Downes states that there were on file no applications of typists who had passed our test. Nevertheless, there must have been hundreds of applications on file. Nor is it shown that those employed through the agency ever passed the test.

I have been able to interview only one of these employees. Her statement is herewith. It will be noted that as soon as she registered, she was sent to Mr. Downes, who immediately employed her. This would indicate that Kendall had advance information as to these vacancies and that there was collusion. In the sworn statement herewith of Amelia L. McHale and Mrs. Dorothy Meade Jackson it is stated that the woman who interviewed them at the office of the employment agency stated that there was just one branch of the Government where the agency could furnish workers, and that was because a Government employee there was a personal friend of Mr. Kendall. It is evident from another statement in the affidavit that Mr. Downes is the Government employee referred to.

Even if Mr. Downes were innocent in this instance, I cannot understand why the applications were not consulted. There seems to have been no reasonable excuse for going to the employment agency. Downes takes full responsibility for this act, but claims that he did so through error. I had about concluded that there was a desire on the part of Mr. Downes to favor Mr. Kendall with some business, and so told Mr. Downes. He, thereupon, made a vehement denial and repeated other statements that he had made to clear himself of the appearances of collusion in this instance. A doubt was raised in my mind, and you will recall that I then asked you to hear Mr. Downes' statement. During the course of the statement he expressed a willingness to write a letter of explanation and also to endeavor to obtain a refund of the money which these employees had paid to Kendall in the form of commissions. His letter is herewith. He makes a straightforward statement, and it appears that he is guilty of a serious mistake, which he admits, but not of collusion. Mr. Downes also brought in a letter from Mr. Kendall, with which was transmitted a check made payable to me in the amount of $39.40, together with a statement of the amount that he had received from each of the girls whom he had placed with the Home Owners' Loan Corporation.

These girls have all confirmed these amounts, and I have cashed Mr. Kendall's check and paid the money to the girls, their receipts being attached hereto. There is one of the girls, Miss Anne E. Wood, who claims to have left $4 on Mr. Kendall's desk when there was nobody in the room. Upon reaching the street she decided that was a foolish thing to do and returned to get the money; but when she got back to the room it was gone. A tall gentleman, who entered the room just as she was leaving, claimed to know nothing about it. She holds herself responsible for the loss of this money.

Mr. Kendall says that he had not the slightest idea of doing anything illegal or unethical when these typists were sent to Mr. Downes, and that in the past he has actually been called upon to supply temporary help to several Government offices. He cites one such place as being in the Mills Building. He states also that he met Mr. Downes at a mutual friend's house. During the evening it came out that Mr. Downes was employed by the Government and might be in need of some help, and that later he had one of his assistants telephone Mr. Downes to ascertain if he needed any typists. Upon learning that some typists were needed, he sent several to see Mr. Downes about the work.

In view of the statements by Mr. Downes and Mr. Kendall, and in view of the fact that the commissions have been refunded to the girls, it is recommended that the matter be allowed to rest, and that Mr. Downes be allowed to remain on the pay roll until the completion of the work upon which he is engaged, and that Representative SWICK and Mr. Roper, who wrote us about the matter, be advised of the outcome of our investigation. I shall acknowledge receipt of Mr. Kendall's letter and send him photostatic copies of the receipts of these employees for the money refunded to them.

GEO. E. SCOTT.

Mr. TABER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWICK. I yield.

Mr. TABER. This shows that this man was collecting from employees of the C.W.A. a commission for obtaining jobs for them?

Mr. SWICK. It shows that, and it also shows that this money has been paid back, the $39.40, or whatever the amount is that was collected has all been paid back to these employees. I think they have been very fair about it, and I am glad to insert in the RECORD this correspondence, which shows how the matter has been handled by the Department.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS].

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, I want to discuss two matters: First, the expenditure of money appropriated by Congress for the relief of the unemployed, and, second, the Rural Mail Service.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

In this period of distress, when it was estimated there were from 10 to 15 million people unemployed, and when the States were no longer able to cope with the situation, Congress passed the National Recovery Act, authorizing the expenditure of $3,300,000,000 for the relief of unemployment throughout the country.

There has been much discussion as to how the money should be spent to the best advantage, and, of course, there has been much difference of opinion. Each locality is influenced by local conditions. The act itself authorizes the allocation of $400,000,000 for the improvement of dirt or leader roads to connect the various communities with marketing centers.

In my judgment, this appropriation should be increased until every rural- and star-route road is improved. If these roads are drained and improved and inexpensive culverts placed where most needed, they will be passable at all seasons of the year, and reference to a postal map will show that if all of these roads are improved practically every community will be connected with a marketing center. The local authorities, with their own funds, will improve connecting roads.

This road work gives more employment generally than perhaps any other form of expenditure. It enables the workers to live at home and they will be able to save more money. The work is more generally distributed than any other class of work, because work of this kind may be secured in every county throughout the country.

The second class of work I want to emphasize is public-building work. This program should be enlarged. Under legislation enacted May 25, 1926, Congress placed the selection of sites for Federal buildings with the Treasury and Post Office Departments.

In my opinion, each county-seat town in the country should have a public building to house its postal facilities and other Government activities it may have. This applies also to other cities and towns where the population is sufficient and the postal revenues justify it. A county-seat town is regarded as a permanent town. Most of the larger county-seat towns throughout the country are now provided with public buildings. I now have in mind, and want to bring to the attention of Congress, the needs of the smaller towns.

In my opinion, the Office of the Architect could easily and quickly prepare a standard form of building for places where only postal facilities are to be provided for, and while these plans would, perhaps, vary with the climatic conditions, yet a few standard forms could be quickly prepared, sites for the buildings selected, and the contracts let within a comparatively short time. A building program of this kind would relieve the unemployment situation throughout the country. In my judgment, where only postal facilities are to be provided for a building, exclusive of furniture and equipment, could be built for around $10,000. I have not calculated how many buildings such a program would embrace. Exclusive of those places which have public buildings, such a building program would be of very great benefit to the unemployment situation throughout the country.

I am sure if more money were allocated for public buildings throughout the country there would be less criticism of the expenditure of public funds. I earnestly believe that every county-seat town should have a public building; and, I repeat, that exclusive of the site and furniture and fixtures, adequate public buildings could be erected in towns of around 2,500 to 5,000 people, where only postal facilities are to be provided for, at a cost of not to exceed $10,000. The cost of such a program, in my judgment, would be comparatively small, and jobs would be provided for the unemployed and the respective communities permanently benefited, and the Government would be saved large sums now paid out annually in rentals for buildings which in large numbers of cases are not convenient or suitable for such purposes.

THE RURAL MAIL SERVICE

Since coming to Congress I have been deeply interested in the Rural Mail Service. Three years ago the appropriation for this service was $106,500,000. The appropriation carried in the present bill is $82,902,500, or a reduction of $12,097,500 under the appropriation for the year 1934.

The Post Office Department urges that because of consolidations the decreased amount will be adequate. I think the reduction is too great. There is no greater service which the Government renders to the rural population than the Rural Mail Service. In the Eastern States there is perhaps adequate rural mail service, but in some of our Western States extensions to adequately serve the various communities are needed and are being requested. In every case, and almost without exception in my own State, so far as I know, no extensions have been granted and the reason is given that the postal funds are insufficient.

The report of the Postmaster General shows that 1,608 routes were discontinued last year through consolidation; that 19 new routes were established, and that extensions were granted on 15 routes. None of these were in the district which I represent.

The average length of a rural mail route is 34.12 miles. During the last 10 years the report shows a reduction through consolidation of 4,426 routes, and there were on June 30 last 40,013 routes. However, the mileage has been extended on the remaining routes, 175,203 miles being added. The report shows a deficit in the postal revenues for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, of $112,374,892. This is a reduction in the deficit of about $25,000,000 under the previous year, and the hope is expressed that the deficit may be entirely wiped out within 2 years. I know how anxious the Department is to conduct the Postal Service within its revenues, but I submit that the Rural Mail Service should not be too greatly impaired and our economies should be along other lines.

Many of the best students of our Postal Service insist that more revenue would be derived from a postage rate of 2 cents on letters than is now being secured from the 3-cents rate. We charge only 2 cents where the letter is delivered out of the office where it is mailed. I believe that as the clouds of depression lift and normal business conditions return, if the 2-cent postage rate is returned the volume of mail will be increased and more revenue will be derived than from the present rate of 3 cents. At any rate all agree that letter mail is carried at a profit and that our postal deficit comes from subsidies and from other postal expenditures.

Applications have been made for extensions of rural routes in a number of places in the district which I represent and, so far as I know, none of them have been approved, in each case the excuse being given that the postal revenues would not justify the increase.

With the building of better roads throughout the country the remote rural sections may now be reached at all seasons of the year and adequate mail facilities should be given them. This would aid the back-to-the-farm movement. Let me repeat, in my judgment, there is no more beneficial service rendered by the Government to the people than the Rural Mail Service. I fear that this appropriation has been too greatly reduced, and I want to express the hope that the Senate subcommittee will give more detailed consideration to the necessity for increasing the item for the Rural Mail Service.

When there are so many applications pending for extensions of rural routes, it seems to me that a reduction of $12,097,500 under the appropriation for the present year for this service is too great. This great army of rural-mail carriers is rendering a continuous, dependable, and beneficial service to the people throughout the country, and there is no more loyal class of Federal employees in the Government service. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. ARNOLD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN].

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, considerable has been said in the last few days, both on the floor and off the floor, in reference to officials of States, counties, and cities holding Federal positions under the emergency administrations.

In 1873 President Grant issued an Executive order which applies t. this subject. The Executive order stands today but slightly modified on various occasions by succeeding Presidents in certain individual cases.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to print the Executive order in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to follows:

BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES—EXECUTIVE ORDER

Whereas it has been brought to the notice of the President of the United States that many persons holding civil office by appointment from him, or otherwise under the Constitution and laws of the United States, while holding such Federal positions accept offices under the authority of the States and Territories in which they reside, or of municipal corporations under the charters and ordinances of such corporations, thereby assuming the duties of the State, Territorial, or municipal office at the same time that they are charged with the duties of the civil office held under Federal authority; and

Whereas it is believed that with few exceptions the holding of two such offices by the same person is incompatible with a due and faithful discharge of the duties of either office, that it frequently gives rise to great inconvenience and often results in detriment to the public service, and moreover is not in harmony with the genius of the Government.

In view of the premises, therefore, the President has deemed it proper thus and hereby to give public notice that from and after the 4th day of March, A.D. 1873 (except as herein specified), persons holding any Federal civil office by appointment under the Constitution and laws of the United States, will be expected, while holding such office, not to accept or hold any office under any State or Territorial government or under the charter or ordinances of any municipal corporation; and further, that the acceptance or continued holding of any such State, Territorial, or municipal office, whether elective or by appointment, by any person holding civil office as aforesaid under the Government of the United States, other than judicial offices under the Constitution of the United States, will be deemed a vacation of the Federal office held by such person, and will be taken to be and will be treated as a resignation by such Federal officer of his commission or appointment in the service of the United States.

The offices of justices of the peace, of notaries public, and of commissioners to take the acknowledgment of deeds, of bail, or to administer oaths, shall not be deemed within the purview of this order and are excepted from its operation and may be held by Federal officers.

The appointment of deputy marshal of the United States may be conferred upon sheriffs or deputy sheriffs; and deputy postmasters, the emoluments of whose office do not exceed $600 per annum, are also excepted from the operation of this order, and may accept and hold appointments under State, Territorial, or municipal authority, provided the same be found not to interfere with the discharge of their duties as postmaster, heads of departments, and other officers of the Government who have the appointment of subordinate officers, are required to take notice of this order, and to see to the enforcement of its provisions and terms, within the sphere of their respective departments or offices and as relates to the several persons holding appointments under them respectively.

By order of the President:

HAMILTON FISH,
Secretary of State.

WASHINGTON, January 17, 1873.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, January 28, 1873.

Inquiries having been made from various quarters as to the application of the Executive order, issued on the 17th January, relating to the holding of State or municipal offices by persons holding civil offices under the Federal Government, the President directs the following reply to be made:

It has been asked whether the order prohibits a Federal officer from holding also the office of an alderman or of a common councilman in a city, or of a town councilman of a town or village, or of appointments under city, town, or village governments. By some it has been suggested that there may be distinction made in case the office be with or without salary or compensation. The city or town offices of the description referred to, by whatever names they may be locally known, whether held by election or by appointment, and whether with or without salary or compensation, are of the class which the Executive order intends not to be held by persons holding Federal offices.

It has been asked whether the order prohibits Federal officers from holding positions on boards of education, school committees, public libraries, religious or eleemosynary institutions incorporated or established or sustained by State or municipal authority. Positions and service on such boards or committees, and professorships in colleges, are not regarded as "offices" within the contemplation of the Executive order, but as employments or service in which all good citizens may be engaged without incompatibility, and in many cases without necessary interference with any position which they may hold under the Federal Government. Officers of the Federal Government may, therefore, engage in such service, provided the attention required by such employment does not interfere with the regular and efficient discharge of the duties of their office under the Federal Government. The head of the department under whom the Federal office is held will, in all cases, be the sole judge whether or not the employment does thus interfere.

The question has also been asked with regard to officers of the State militia. Congress having exercised the power conferred by the Constitution to provide for organizing the militia, which is liable to be called forth to be employed in the service of the United States, and is thus, in some sense, under the control of the General Government, and is moreover of the greatest value to the public, the Executive order of 17th January is not considered as prohibiting Federal officers from being officers of the militia in the States and Territories.

It has been asked whether the order prohibits persons holding office under the Federal Government being members of local or municipal fire departments; also, whether it applies to mechanics employed by the day in the armories, arsenals, and navy yards, etc., of the United States. Unpaid service in local or municipal fire departments is not regarded as an office within the intent of the Executive order, and may be performed by Federal officers, provided it does not interfere with the regular and efficient discharge of the duties of the Federal office, of which the head of the department under which the office is held will, in each case, be the judge. Employment by the day as mechanics or laborers in the armories, arsenals, navy yards, etc., does not constitute an office of any kind, and those thus employed are not within the contemplation of the Executive order. Master workmen, and others who hold appointments from the Government, or from any department, whether for a fixed time or at the pleasure of the appointing power, are embraced within the operation of the order.

By order of the President.

HAMILTON FISH,
Secretary of State.

EXECUTIVE ORDER—PARTICIPATION IN THE GOVERNMENT OF ARLINGTON COUNTY, VA., BY FEDERAL EMPLOYEES PERMANENTLY RESIDING THEREIN

Officers and employees of the executive civil service permanently residing in Arlington County, Va., may become candidates for and hold local office in such county and may participate in campaigns for election to such offices.

In the exercise of the privilege granted by this order, officers and employees must not neglect their official duties and must not engage in National or State politics in violation of the civil-service rules. If there is such violation, the head of the department or independent office in which the person is employed shall inflict such punishment as the Civil Service Commission shall recommend.

Officers and employees elected or appointed to offices requiring full-time service shall resign their positions with the Federal Government. If elected or appointed to offices requiring only part-time service, they may accept and hold same without relinquishing their Federal employment, provided the holding of such part-time office does not conflict or interfere with their official duties as officers or employees of the Federal Government.

This order is based upon the facts that Arlington County is substantially a municipality, that a considerable number of the residents and taxpayers are employed in the Government service, that service as local officers in such county should in no way involve general partisan political activity, and that the principle of home rule and local self-government justifies such participation.

The permission granted by this order may be suspended or withdrawn by the Civil Service Commission when, in its opinion, the activities resulting therefrom are, or may become, detrimental to the public interest or inimical to the proper enforcement of the civil-service rules.

EXECUTIVE ORDER

Whereas by Executive order of January 17, 1873, the holding of a State and Federal office by the same person at the same time, with certain exceptions, was prohibited; and

Whereas it would materially assist the Director of the Census in the taking of the Fifteenth Decennial Census if he were permitted to appoint certain persons holding State or county offices as supervisors of the census.

In view of the premises, therefore, the President has deemed it advisable in certain instances to permit the appointment of certain State and county officers as supervisors of the census. The Director of the Census is hereby authorized to appoint State, county, and municipal officers as supervisors of the census if in his opinion the duties of such State, county, and municipal officers do not in any manner conflict with the performance of the duties of supervisors of the census, and where the Director of the Census is satisfied that the appointment of such State, county, or municipal officer is for the best interest of the service.

EXECUTIVE ORDER—PERMITTING PERSONS HOLDING CERTAIN POSITIONS TO RECEIVE APPOINTMENTS UNDER THE DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE

Executive Order No. 9 of January 17, 1873, prohibiting the holding of Federal and State offices at the same time is hereby amended so as to permit persons holding State, Territorial, or municipal positions to receive, unless prohibited by law, appointments under the Department of Commerce when the Secretary of that Department deems such employment necessary to secure a more efficient administration of the duties of his Department.

HERBERT HOOVER.

THE WHITE HOUSE, July 3, 1931.

[No. 5666]

EXECUTIVE ORDER

Executive orders of January 17, and 28, 1873, are further modified as follows:

Officers and employees of the Indian Service serving in a medical or sanitary capacity on a part-time basis may, with the consent of the Secretary of the Interior, also hold State, county, or municipal positions of a similar character.

HERBERT HOOVER.

THE WHITE HOUSE, September 10, 1929.

[No. 5188]

EXECUTIVE ORDER

The provisions of the Executive order of January 17, 1873, prohibiting Federal employees from holding office under any State, Territorial, or municipal government are hereby waived to permit Hon. Percy W. Phillips, member of the United States Board of Tax Appeals, to teach in the Summer School of the University of North Carolina.

THE WHITE HOUSE, June 7, 1929.

[No. 5133]

EXECUTIVE ORDER WAIVING PROVISIONS OF EXECUTIVE ORDER OF JANUARY 17, 1873, PROHIBITING FEDERAL OFFICERS AND EMPLOYEES FROM HOLDING STATE OR MUNICIPAL OFFICES, AS TO MARTIN CONBOY

Whereas Martin Conboy has been appointed to the Federal office of United States attorney for the southern district of New York; and

Whereas the said Martin Conboy has also been appointed to the State office of special assistant attorney general of the State of New York to conduct (1) the defense of certain actions brought in the supreme court of Erie County, N.Y., by Joseph J. Lunghino against Joseph A. Broderick, superintendent of banks of the State of New York, and others, and (2) investigations and prosecutions pursuant to the proclamation of October 6, 1933, of the Governor of the State of New York convening an extraordinary special and trial term of the supreme court of Kings County on November 1, 1933, for the purpose of inquiring into any and all unlawful acts in relation to the investigation, indictment, prosecution, sentence, and/or commitment in the case of the People of the State of New York v. Jacob Mellon, Edward Lollo, and Morris Rothenberg, in the county court of Kings County, and for the purpose of inquiring into any and all unlawful acts relating to the conduct of the laundry trade or business; and

Whereas the performance of the duties of the said Martin Conboy as special assistant attorney general of the State of New York with respect to the above-mentioned matters will be to the public interest and will not prevent the faithful discharge of his duties as United States attorney of the southern district of New York;

Now, therefore, by virtue of the authority vested in me under section 1753 of the Revised Statutes of the United States (title 5, U.S.C., sec. 631), the provisions of the Executive order of January 17, 1873, as amended, prohibiting, with certain exceptions, Federal officers and employees from holding State or municipal offices, are hereby waived as to the said Martin Conboy in connection with the performance of his aforesaid duties as special assistant attorney general of the State of New York.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, December 21, 1933.

Mr. ARNOLD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LUDLOW].

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I am deeply appreciative of the honor that has come to me in the call to service on the important Committee on Appropriations, and on the subcommittee dealing with the Treasury and Post Office Departments.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN], the generalissimo of the full committee, is a lovable leader who rules with the scepter of comradeship.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ARNOLD], chairman of this particular subcommittee, is a wise and safe counselor with a broad vision and a most comprehensive knowledge of the multifarious and varied activities of the Government. It is a pleasure and a privilege to serve under a chairman of such distinguished ability.

It has been a delight, too, to me to serve with the gentleman from New York, JOHN TABER, the able and alert ranking representative of the opposition party; with the gentleman from New York, JOHN BOYLAN; and the gentleman from Michigan, CLARENCE J. MCLEOD, all patrotic and devoted servants of the people.

During the prolonged hearings and conferences incident to the framing of this bill there has not been the slightest trace of partisanship in evidence in this subcommittee. All of the members have applied themselves devotedly to the public interest in many days of tedious labor with the single thought uppermost of doing in every circumstance what was best for the American people.

I was immensely pleased, too, when the chairman of our subcommittee paid that deserved tribute a few moments ago to Marcellus C. Sheild, the clerk of the Appropriations Committee. Mr. Sheild's situation is a most trying one, but his ability and scope of knowledge meet every test. I know of no better description of Mr. Sheild than to say that he is a phenomenon of efficiency in a most important and difficult position.

Mr. Chairman, the subject matter in this bill is so comprehensive and extensive that in 5 minutes I could not even touch the outer fringe of it, but I should like to address myself for the moment to one problem, and that is the problem of the domestic Air Mail Service.

I hope that in our zeal to uproot crookedness in the public service we will not go to emotional extremes and blindly crucify the air mail.

If there has been crookedness in the Air Mail Service, I hope it will be ruthlessly exposed; and if there are existing contracts into which the element of fraud enters, I hope those contracts will be vitiated and that the contractors guilty of fraudulent practices will be banned from any future dealings with the Government and will be allowed to sojourn for a time in the penitentiary.

Whether or not such frauds have been perpetrated no doubt will be brought out in due time by the Senate committee that is investigating this subject, and which apparently is doing its work with great thoroughness.

Meanwhile it has seemed to our House Committee on Appropriations that it would be unwise to kill the patient while trying to effect a cure. It has seemed to our committee that the sound, safe, and conservative way of handling this subject, awaiting further developments, is to maintain the status quo by declining to appropriate the additional millions recommended by the Post Office Department and the additional hundreds of thousands recommended by the Bureau of the Budget and maintain the cost of air mail at exactly the same outlay that is being expended in the fiscal year 1934, namely, $14,000,000.

This program permits the continuance of existing air mail activities without restoring any of the service that was cut off in the retrenchment that was forced by the reduced available funds to carry on the Service during the current fiscal year.

The total investment of the Government in Air Mail Service up to the present time is around $86,000,000. With that amount involved as an investment, it would seem to be sound policy not to wreck the Service or to seriously impair it until a permanent program for the future can be worked out by legislative and administrative action.

The growth of Air Mail Service is graphically illustrated by the fact that 2,000,000 miles were flown in the entire fiscal year 1926, while the Service is now being carried on at a rate of over 2,000,000 miles every 15 days, or approximately 50,000,000 miles flown a year. The contractors took a cut last year ranging from 21 to 31 percent, and they are willing to carry on under that reduced appropriation during the next fiscal year.

As one who would like to see the Air Mail Service maintained and reasonably developed, with every cent of graft squeezed out of it and with every cent of subsidy eliminated as soon as that can possibly be brought about, I believe the program proposed by your committee is the one that should be followed by Congress. I think it would be utterly unwise to increase the appropriation beyond the amount which is believed to be necessary to maintain the existing services, and likewise I should very much regret to see the Service wrecked by too drastic a program of retrenchment.

I believe it is a good policy just now to mark time and to stand on the appropriation which measures the cost of service for the existing fiscal year. I think we should not fail to take into consideration as an argument against an increased appropriation and for the actual amount expended this year a probability that through enactment of the proposed Mead-Kelly bill it will be possible within 3 or 4 years to squeeze all of the subsidy out of the domestic Air Mail Service, and a considerable part of it just as soon as that act goes into effect.

By placing the Air Mail Service on a pound-mile basis instead of on mileage-flown basis the Mead-Kelly bill will write finis to subsidies in the Air Mail Service. In the case of transition from the mileage-flown basis to the pound-mile basis, there would be a period when some of the desirable weaker air mail lines may have to be paid some subsidy, but right at the outset a number of the stronger companies will voluntarily accept the new basis of pay and relinquish all claim to subsidy, thus giving the new system of payment an impetus that will go far to insure its ultimate successful fulfillment.

It is interesting to know that some of the transcontinental air mail trunk lines are actually bringing more revenue to the Government than they are receiving in pay at the present time. In the case of those companies subsidy is even now a fiction. The Transcontinental & Western Air Mail Service and the Northern Transcontinental Co. are two of these companies which I understand now carry more mail than the service on those lines costs.

With the prospect so promising that the day is not far distant when by legislation we will eliminate subsidy entirely from the Air Mail Service, I would like to impress upon the House what I regard as a sensible view of this whole matter, namely, that we maintain for the present, the skeleton Air Mail Service that is now in existence without restoring any of the suspended service or taking on any new contracts, and the way to maintain the existing service, pending the time when the problem can be worked out satisfactorily, is to vote for the appropriation of $14,000,000 carried in this bill.

Mr. ARNOLD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. THOM].

Mr. THOM. Mr. Chairman, I have in mind the extension of the post-office service to a somewhat new duty. It is not an original suggestion with me. It comes from many of my constituents. It is to invest the Post Office Department with the duty of collecting the partial payments from those persons who are the recipients of loans from the Home Owners' Loan Corporation.

I believe that the Home Owners' Loan Corporation has instructed its borrowers to make their monthly payments direct to Washington. This plan does not seem to be satisfactory. The borrower in the past has made his monthly installment payments on his loan to the office of a building and loan association or to some bank which represents insurance companies. In return the borrowers were given an installment book in which credit was entered for payments made. This plan seems to appeal to borrowers.

I find that in my home city of Canton many of these borrowers do not seem to understand the system now in vogue of sending their monthly payments to Washington. They are familiar with the routine of the post office, know its officials, and feel they ought to have the opportunity to make local payments at the post office. This matter has been suggested to the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, and I am presenting it at this time in order to get the reaction of the House of Representatives.

I may say in conclusion that the Home Owners' Loan Corporation has had unusual success in the district I represent. I understand in some parts of the country it has not been so successful, but in my four counties over 600 loans have been made up to date. A very fine organization is in existence. Now that there is a prospect of guaranty of both the interest and principal of the bonds issued by the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, more and more applications for loans are being made.

I should like to ask a member of the Post Office Committee present whether any proposal has been made to that committee with reference to having the local post offices undertake the collection of these installment payments to the Home Owners' Loan Corporation?

Mr. JOHNSON of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I may say that no such proposition has been made to the Post Office Committee. I have listened to the statement of the gentleman with a great deal of interest, and I am concerned about the same thing the gentleman refers to and have had requests along the same line. I should be very glad if the gentleman would appear before that committee and make a statement to that end so that we might take such steps as we may agree to take.

Mr. THOM. The gentleman sees no reason why such a plan could not be adopted?

Mr. JOHNSON of West Virginia. On the contrary, and at first glance, I would say it would be very helpful.

Mr. GLOVER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THOM. I yield.

Mr. GLOVER. I am sure something should be done, but it strikes me that the head office in each of the States ought to collect the interest on these bonds and then forward it to the head office in Washington. It is very cumbersome to have to send this money from all parts of the country to Washington. The same agency should be set up in each State, and my idea is that the parent office in each State ought to be the collecting agency in that State and forward the collections from that office to the head office in Washington.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN].

Mr. MCFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, referring to the remarks which I made on the floor of the House yesterday in regard to the present gold bill, I rise to say that information of the greatest importance has just come to me. I want to say to the Membership of this House, to the Membership at the other end of this Capitol, to the gentlemen who are there considering this bill, that the passage of this bill is going to bring forth great international complications.

I call the attention of the House to the fact that this morning in London the British Cabinet met and broke up in disagreement over the question of gold revaluation in the United States, which subject at this moment is under consideration at the other end of the Capitol.

The British Cabinet has just sent a message to their Ambassador in Washington, Sir Ronald Lindsay, requesting definite information as to just what the value of the gold dollar is going to be. I direct attention to a speech made by Ramsay MacDonald at Leeds night before last, in which he had much to say about this question of the stabilization of the pound with our depreciated dollar and which apparently resulted in the meeting of the British Cabinet this morning.

I again want to warn, with every bit of vehemence I can express, the danger to this country of the action which is about to be consummated by the Senate.

Great Britain is out to control this situation. I predict now that if this bill passes the Senate we are going to have serious conflict not only with Great Britain but with every other country that is involved in international trade relations with us.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 25 minutes. I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a little table showing the sums that will be available for the departments involved in this bill, with the appropriations carried here, the permanent appropriations, and the allotments so far as we know them.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, before I proceed with the discussion of this bill I want to say to the Members of the House that I have never worked upon a committee where there was more of a desire on the part of all members of the subcommittee to try to do what each one thought was right than was apparent in the operations of the Treasury-Post Office Subcommittee this year. The chairman, Mr. ARNOLD, was especially courteous, and when we were all through we reached an agreement upon the different items that are carried in the bill. Frankly, each one of these items does not represent what any individual member of the committee thought ought to be done, but represents what was worked out after a full and fair discussion.

There are a few things that I desire to call attention to in connection with the bill.

In the first place, there are a few items of supplies in connection with which deficits will be created if the present price level maintains. In the Coast Guard the supplies, if bought on the present market, would run $800,000 above what is carried in the bill. The best estimate I can make of the other supplies in the bill is that if they were bought on present prices they would probably run a million dollars above what is carried in the bill. These figures were all based on costs in the year 1933 when prices were somewhat lower. Whether they will be higher or lower, or whether a deficit of perhaps $2,000,000 will result I do not know, but a deficit will result unless prices drop off again.

There are two or three other items which have generally been carried in the normal appropriation bill as to which there will be deficits. In the first place, there will be a deficit with reference to the operations of the Comptroller's office in connection with banks. The appropriation of $2,000,000 which was made last March will be exhausted, as I understand it, before this fiscal year is over, and we will probably be called upon to make another appropriation. I do not know exactly what this will be, but possibly a couple million dollars.

Besides that there will be a deficit growing out of the failure to provide an estimate for the enforcement of the liquor-tax law. We will have to have quite a considerable amount of money to do that. Just exactly how much and in what way we do not know, because no estimates have been brought to us as yet by the Bureau of the Budget. I expect this will probably run into a very considerable amount.

The old Prohibition Bureau was in the Department of Justice. Under the law as it stands today, without a transfer of functions on the part of the Executive, there is no authority for the Department of Justice to proceed with that operation. It is going to be necessary to set up practically a new unit in the Bureau of Internal Revenue for that purpose.

These are the items of deficit that we know are in sight.

There were several items that came up during the consideration of the bill. In the first place, there were allotments from the P.W.A., both current and prospective, into the fiscal year 1935.

The current allotments from the Public Works Administration amount to $24,845,300. These allotments were divided, $13,693,400 to the Coast Guard, $1,051,900 to the Public Health Service, $10,000,000 for public buildings, and $100,000 to the Treasury for United States relief of contracts.

In the next fiscal year there already has been made available, after July 1, out of the $3,300,000,000 appropriation, which was made last June, $11,139,900 for the Coast Guard, $90,000 for the Public Health Service, and $22,000,000 for public buildings, or a total of $33,229,900. The Coast Guard will cost not so far from what it has in the past with these allotments.

The Coast Guard is being provided with a lot of new cutters. It seems that with the advent of prohibition the officers of the Treasury Department and the Coast Guard do not feel there is to be a large let-up in the activities of the Coast Guard in connection with the prevention of rum smuggling. We were told that with a duty of $5 per gallon upon spirits and a tax of approximately $2 by the Federal Government and approximately $1 in most of the States—more in some and less in others—making a total of $8, there was expected to be a very considerable amount of rum smuggling, as to which an effort would have to be made to prevent it. If I recall correctly, the total amount available to the Coast Guard, with these items, will be something like $34,000,000 or $35,000,000 in the next fiscal year.

A large portion of these allotments from public works is for the purpose of normal repairs upon buildings and for the purpose of boat replacement, which is a normal, recurrent item and which has heretofore been carried in the regular appropriations.

This bill, as I understand it, carries, in the way of direct appropriations for the Treasury Department, $149,842,330. It is hard to get the exact figure which compares with this for the current year, because there have been so many transfers of appropriations in and out. The amount available for expenditure for the regular activities of the Department, which is comparable, was not very different, except in 1934 there was available for tax refunds $55,000,000, and this year we are carrying $40,000,000.

The total permanent appropriation for the year 1935 is $1,363,494,072, and the total permanent appropriation the year 1934, which Congress does not have to pass upon from year to year, was $1,278,738,072, or an increase of approximately $85,000,000 for the fiscal year 1935 over the fiscal year 1934.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. Yes.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Do those figures also include capital investments?

Mr. TABER. These figures are very largely for interest on the public debt, debt retirement, and sinking-fund purposes. There are some items, such as debentures or drawbacks, bounties, and allowances under customs of $7,000,000, repayments to importers for excess of deposits, $4,000,000, redemption of stamps $1,000,000, which are routine matters, and then a lot of other small items.

The total available for both departments in this bill against the amount that was available for expenditure, including allotments that have already been made from Public Works, for 1935, was $2,218,107,242, and for the fiscal year 1934, which we are now in, $2,166,587,139, or an increase of approximately $52,000,000.

The following table shows the funds available to the two Departments from all sources in the fiscal years 1934 and 1935.

	Available, 1934	Appropriations and allotments, 1935
Treasury Department:
Direct appropriations	$218,966,020	$149,842,330
Permanent appropriations	1,278,731,072	1,363,494,072
Transfers P.W.A.	24,845,300	33,229,900
Total, Treasury Department	1,522,542,392	1,546,566,302
Post Office Department:
Direct appropriations	643,872,147	670,850,940
Permanent appropriations	165,000	165,000
P.W.A. allotments	7,600	525,000
Total, Post Office Department	644,044,747	671,540,940
Total for bill	2,166,587,139	2,218,107,242

There is another feature of the bill to which I think I should call your attention. There has been set up in the Treasury Department what is known as the Procurement Division under Admiral Peoples, who is now Chief of the Bureau of Supplies and Accounts in the Navy, and who occupied that same position during the World War. He is a man of considerable ability. The Division has not been put in operation to such an extent that anyone can say how it will work out or just how far it will go. Of course everyone realizes that if it attempts to take over, as permitted to do under the order of the President, all of the purchasing activities of the Government, it will become so cumbersome that instead of showing a gain to the Government it will show a loss. There are, undoubtedly, however, a large number of items that can be consolidated into the purchasing of one unit where savings might be effected. I hope something of this kind will work out, but this is not very much different from the old supply committee for which appropriations have been carried under the Treasury Department for a long time. No one can tell anything about how this will work out.

Another thing I feel I should call to the attention of the committee is the matter of retirements in the Post Office. There have been approximately 4,065 retirements under the 30-year rule, which was established here, under which the Department has the right to force retirements if it desires to do so.

As a result of this there have been some eliminations in the number of employees and some consolidations in mail routes. I think it is estimated that there will be for the fiscal year 1935, in the Post Office Department, something like 2,000 retirements and consolidations of R.F.D. routes. These retirements are estimated to save $1,000,000, according to the information we were given, or approximately $500 for each one.

This saving will not be reflected until the carrier who is retired dies. During the time he lives it is going to cost the Government a little better than $900 to make its contribution toward his retirement, and instead of showing a gain in some of these figures, the operation is going to show a decided loss.

There have been one or two things where there has been a transfer of money from one fund to another which I ought to call to the attention of the House.

Mr. MAPES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. MAPES. The gentleman spoke about the consolidation of rural routes. Does the Department take into consideration in making the estimate of the saving on account of consolidations the fact that the retired carriers receive or are paid retirement pay?

Mr. TABER. By the Government?

Mr. MAPES. Yes.

Mr. TABER. No; they do not; because if they did, the consolidation would not show a gain but a loss.

Mr. MAPES. Then when the Department says it is going to make a saving of a thousand or twelve hundred dollars, it really ought to deduct from that amount the retirement pay of the retired employee.

Mr. TABER. Perhaps not exactly, because the retired carrier will die sometime; and when he dies, that $900 per year is not paid; but I think it should be amortized.

The facts are told on page 84 of the hearings.

Now, there is another item that I should like to call to the attention of the Committee. There was allotted money to spend for rural sanitation. I think the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. LUDLOW, called attention to this a year ago. It appears that the Government was going onto private property in the country and building toilets for farmers and other people in the country with the object of showing them how to build such things. They built them of concrete and wood, and in a great many cases they planted roses and vines to cover them and beautify them.

As I understand, the expenditure from the allotment from P.W.A. was approximately $5,000,000 in this fiscal year. It hardly seems to me that that was a proper outlet for public funds, but that is not the only thing that I desire to talk about at this time.

At Reedsville, W.Va., there is a proposition that several of my colleagues have called attention to within the last few days; the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. PETTENGILL, the gentleman from New York, Mr. REED, and the gentleman from Connecticut, Mr. MERRITT, called attention to this project, where $525,000 is allocated to build a factory to make certain furnishings for the Post Office Department that are now manufactured by private industry. One is the Keyless Lock Co., in Indianapolis; another outfit is located in New York and another in Connecticut. There can be but one result from the organization of such a factory under the Post Office Department. It will not relieve the depression; it will destroy private business.

If the object of the P.W.A. is to destroy private business, to hit at the small manufacturer and drive him out of business, that is just what the allotment will bring about.

I consider this allotment of $525,000 to wipe out private industry one of the most flagrant abuses that the bureaucrats have ever committed in this country.

I hope that calling attention to these things will stop this outrage before the factory can be constructed, and if it is started, then stop it on its way.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. Yes.

Mr. LUDLOW. I agree with the gentleman 100 percent in his attitude toward this idea of the projection of the Government into competitive business. I state for the information of the gentleman that while the allotment has been made, the project has not actually been consummated, and I think I am warranted in saying that it is going to receive further consideration. At least I hope so. The humanitarian purpose back of this project is admirable, but it violates fundamental American philosophy and, in my opinion, establishes a dangerous precedent.

Mr. MILLARD. Is it before the Postmaster General now, or the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. TABER. It does not appear in the allotments that appear on pages 80–A and 81–A of the Budget. My understanding is that the allotment was made to the Post Office Department in October before the close of the period covered by these pages.

Mr. MILLARD. So it is now up to the Postmaster General?

Mr. TABER. I am not sure, because the figures do not show, but it is somewhere, and it ought to be stopped before it can go any further.

Mr. MILLARD. I agree with the gentleman; it is an outrage.

Mr. LUDLOW. The allotment was made to the Post Office Department, with the commission of the whole matter to that Department to execute it. As I said awhile ago, I think the matter is having further consideration. I do not know what the final outcome will be.

Mr. TABER. I believe that is an item where every man in this House will agree that a withdrawal of the allotment and a transfer of that sum to some of the C.W.A. operations might perhaps be providing some relief, and should be made right now.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. Yes.

Mr. MAPES. Confirming what the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LUDLOW] has said, I have had occasion to look this matter up, and the office of the Secretary of the Interior, who has charge of the P.W.A. work, informs me that the allotment has been made, and that the matter is now entirely in the hands of the Post Office Department.

Mr. TABER. I call the gentleman's attention to a fact that I think might be very useful to him and to the gentleman from Indiana in their operations. Awhile ago an allotment was made to the Department of Commerce for the Coast and Geodetic Survey of $6,463,120, and that allotment was withdrawn, thereby establishing a precedent for withdrawing this, without going anywhere else.

Mr. MAPES. Personally, I filed a protest with the Secretary of the Interior and the Postmaster General both, asking, if possible, that the plans be reconsidered and the project abandoned. Does the gentleman from New York think it would be possible to put through Congress an appropriation if the Members knew in advance that the money was to be used, as it is proposed to use it in this case, at Reedsville, W.Va., to build a furniture factory?

Mr. TABER. I do not think it would get 10 votes on the floor of this House.

Mr. MAPES. Is not that the curse of Congress making appropriations and giving anyone a blanket commission to use the money as he sees fit?

Mr. TABER. Congress has been criticized for pork-barrel legislation, but Congress cannot hold a candle to the bureaucrats.

Mr. LUDLOW. Echoing what the gentleman says, I think there are quite a number here that hope, as he does, that this project will be withdrawn. As far as I have been able to sense the situation, sentiment in this House is practically unanimous against it. We consider it altogether inadvisable, and believe it would be a very bad practice, to establish an industry that might be the opening wedge perhaps in the future to the nationalization of industry.

Mr. TABER. I want now to say a word about the air mail situation and the ocean mail situation. In my opinion, that has been handled by the committee as well as we could handle it. Unless there is absolute definite proof, we cannot deduct from these items some particular item, and nothing of that kind has been brought up to us. The Department tells us that they have not got it as yet, and the Black committee has developed nothing of that sort as yet. The whole matter is up in the air. Whether finally they will get anything on any of these contracts I do not know. If there is any contract over there which is illegal or bad, it ought to be wiped out, and we ought not to carry money for it, but until we know something about it I do not see how we can escape the responsibility of the Government meeting its obligations. If the contracts are honest and valid, and were made fairly in the interest of the Government—and we cannot say to the contrary unless we know—then we have got to go through and meet the obligation of the Government.

Mr. ARNOLD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MCKEOWN].

Mr. MCKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, yesterday our distinguished friend from Michigan [Mr. HOOPER] discussed the discharge of Commissioner Humphrey. I have no feeling at all in the matter, because I have known Mr. Humphrey for many years and served with him in Congress. But because of his viewpoint I think there is no question but that the President of the United States owed it to the American people to ask for his removal. If gentlemen will note the correspondence, which I read carefully, they will find that the President hesitated. He wanted to do it nicely; he did not want to hurt his feelings, and he suggested to him that he might get off that Commission. Here is the situation: The President of the United States has ideas of economics which are entirely opposed to the heretofore-known expressed ideas of the Commission. It is necessary that these commissions which we create should function, but there is no doubt that the policies of the Executive in carrying out a great program are entitled to have the support of these independent commissions. These independent commissions were created, and the appointing power was given to the President. A former illustrious President of political faith opposite to mine tied these Commissioners down with a request for their resignations before they were appointed.

A great many criticized him about it. I did not criticize him, because he wanted cooperation. He wanted cooperation in the policies of the Government for which he was responsible, and he required them to give him a resignation when they were appointed. So he had the resignation in his hands already. As to the legal question, of course, I am not going to enter into any discussion of that, because that will be a question that will go to the courts to be determined.

The proposition simply narrows itself down to this, that the Executive, with new ideas, new economic theories, new thought, in order to succeed, must have the cooperation of the different commissions.

But I did not rise particularly to discuss that question, except incidentally. What I arose to talk about is what is happening to the Members from the far stretches of the West in regard to our small public buildings. I led a fight in this House on several occasions against surrendering the power of Congress to establish this Interdepartmental Commission. I fought it to the bitter end. They finally overrode me and pushed me into a back seat, and so I sat down and was good. The Interdepartmental Commission developed to be a splendid Commission. They told me this: "You will be agreeably surprised at the fairness with which we deal with this." I have nothing but the best things to say about this Commission, because it labored hard and worked out a fair and just distribution of this money for public buildings. Now, what has happened? We took away from them the right to go on and construct these buildings, and they have allotted this money to some public works somewhere.

Instead of carrying out the program as set out by the Interdepartmental Commission, they have taken a lot of the money and put it into a lot of buildings that we never heard of, and they have cut every one of my little buildings right square in two. They have put in a lot of substations in Chicago, and they spent $2,000,000 in Chicago on substations, one of them to be around the stockyards.

Mr. DONDERO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MCKEOWN. I yield.

Mr. DONDERO. They have cut a post office back in my district almost 50 percent.

Mr. MCKEOWN. They have cut mine right square in two. Oklahoma only had $600,000 under the Interdepartmental Commission. They gave me $103,000 for two really good towns. They are not little abandoned places, but they are real, progressive towns, paying from fifty to sixty thousand dollars a year revenue into the Government, and they have cut those down to $53,000. My people have said, "We do not want that kind of building. We would not build a thing like that if we were building it ourselves."

I received an amusing letter the other day from the Secretary of the Interior, in which he stated, "If they are not pushing work in your district on public works, please let me know, because we want to push them right out." Lo and behold, there has not been a thing done in my whole district, so I cannot push them. There is no chance to push them. [Laughter and applause.]

This Public Works program is coming back here again, gentlemen, and I want you in this House to see what they have done with this money and where they have allocated it. If you Members of this House are willing to go along with me, I am willing to earmark some of this money and see that it goes to the places where it ought to go. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MCKEOWN] has expired.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. WELCH].

Mr. WELCH. Mr. Chairman, I cannot let this opportunity pass without expressing my appreciation to the members of the Appropriations Subcommittee on the Post Office and Post Roads for having brought to the House for consideration this well-balanced and constructive bill H.R. 7295. Particularly is the committee to be complimented for the manner in which it has provided for the upbuilding and maintenance of our merchant marine by adequately providing for the continuance of mail contracts.

The Merchant Marine Act of 1928 has often been referred to as one of the most constructive acts adopted by Congress during the past 50 years. Since the enactment of this law Congress has appropriated approximately $150,000,000 for what is known as "construction-loan fund" provided for under the act. The money has been loaned to American shipowners at a very low rate of interest. The Commission loans as high as 80 percent of the construction cost of a vessel. The act also provides for contracts and also provides for a subvention—bonus. Contracts carrying subventions are entered into by the Postmaster General with mail-carrying steamship companies. These loans and generous subventions are justified on the ground of national defense alone. Without them a modern merchant marine would be impossible. Without them the shipbuilding business of the United States would diminish to almost nothing. As a result of them, new markets have been created for our surplus products, and American shipyards have been doing a profitable business and have been giving employment to thousands of American workingmen.

In the past the purpose of the act has been misunderstood by some Members of this House. The outlays made by the Government pursuant to the provisions of the act are not to be gaged by direct and immediate returns to the Government in the form of profits, nor with strict reference to the extent of commercial value of the immediate carrier service rendered. The advances are made for the primary purpose of the upbuilding and maintenance of a merchant marine. This purpose can be served only by the creation of ships of efficient type, the establishment of regular services upon which shippers can depend and the inauguration of trade routes which will become permanent arteries of an expanding ocean commerce. This policy was forcibly brought to the attention of the Senate Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads during the last session of Congress by an important trade organization whose membership includes representatives of Ohio, Michigan, Illinois, Indiana, West Virginia, Iowa, Wisconsin, Minnesota, North Dakota, South Dakota, Nebraska, Kansas, Oklahoma, Missouri, Kentucky, and Tennessee. It is known as the "Middle-West Foreign Trade Committee." It speaks for important agricultural, industrial, and business groups, in the Midwestern States referred to. Declaring that the uncertain status of American shipping, owing to attacks in Congress, has created misgivings on the part of American shippers who otherwise would be disposed to use American vessels, the chairman of this trade committee stated that such attacks give a distinct advantage to foreign shipping interests in the competition for American export business.

We are discouraged to find—

Said he—

that every time an appropriation bill comes up for passage there are proposals to destroy what has been accomplished in the upbuilding of American steamship lines. This discredits us in the face of the whole world, due to the fact that our foreign competitors are frankly expecting the collapse of the American merchant marine every time Congress meets. Representatives of foreign lines say to our shippers: "Why not patronize a well-established foreign line whose government is always behind it?"

They capitalize the attacks in Congress on our shipping and assure the American shippers that no continuity of service is to be expected from the American merchant marine.

Speaking particularly for the business of the Middle West, he continued:

Our people of the Middle West are 800 miles or more from the sea. We are compelled to depend on established and continuing services. We must have regular dependable schedules of sailings. Our exporters are not situated like the man at or near the seaport, who can avail himself of occasional sailings or tramp ships. Our people must make arrangements for shipping far in advance and must know that the line will have a ship on a certain date.

This is obviously true, and such unwarranted attacks as heretofore made on this floor should cease. It was the ocean mail contracts which seemed particularly inviting to this form of attack in the past. The fact that they are not intended as mere compensation for the transportation of mail has been lost sight of entirely. They are the channels through which the assistance of the Government is passed and are designed to offset the difference in cost of operation between American and foreign vessels owing to the higher wages and operating costs of American-built and American-manned ships. It must not be forgotten that the Government imposes substantial burdens in return for its aid. It stipulates the routes on which the vessels receiving assistance shall be operated and the frequency of their sailings. Each line obligates itself to build new vessels—of the best equipped and most suitable types—on plans approved by the Navy Department, and as to old vessels to reconstruct or recondition them so they will be suitable as naval or military auxiliaries in time of war or national emergency.

There were completed under the requirements of these obligations during the past year 11 modern vessels of 113,176 tons, which were built in American shipyards at a cost to the contractors of approximately $46,810,800. The contractors also reconditioned existing vessels with tonnage aggregating 60,527 tons at a cost to them of approximately $1,623,100. These new vessels were also constructed according to plans and specifications approved by the Secretary of the Navy, with particular reference to economical conversion into auxiliary naval vessels.

It is not fair to attack these contracts as extravagant without having in mind all the considerations which the Government receives in return, including the assurance which is provided by efficient ships and fixed sailings that our trade routes will be kept open to our foreign markets and our foreign sources of supply. Our merchant marine has made wonderful progress since the enactment of the Jones-White Act. American steamships have more than held their own with foreign competitors despite the depression.

We should conserve our gains and maintain the progress already made, and give notice to the world that the Government support of our merchant marine is consistent, and not spasmodic, thereby assuring the American shippers that our merchant marine is firmly established and here to stay. [Applause.]

Mr. ARNOLD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the Delegate from Alaska [Mr. DIMOND].

Mr. DIMOND. Mr. Chairman, in view of some of the things that have been said here and elsewhere about the Civil Works Administration, it may not be inappropriate for me here and now to pay my tribute to the great good that has been accomplished, in my country at least, by the activities of the Civil Works Administration and to pay tribute also to the very fine executive ability that has been displayed in the administration of the funds allotted to it.

What I wish to speak about today, of course, concerns Alaska. I observe on page 53 of the bill an item which reads as follows:

For inland transportation by star routes in Alaska, $132,000.

A reference to the report shows that the appropriation for the former fiscal year was $135,000, and that the Budget set up the same amount for the fiscal year 1935; but in committee this amount so set up by the Budget was reduced to $132,000, a cutting down in the amount of $3,000. This may not seem much to you, but it may result in the Territory of Alaska's preventing the giving of mail service to some community of citizens of the United States to whom mail means more than it possibly can mean to you. I think this cutting down in committee is the result of a misunderstanding, and I arrive at that conclusion from a reading of the hearing at pages 170 and 171. I find here on page 170 of the hearings the following:

INLAND TRANSPORTATION OF MAIL BY STAR ROUTES IN ALASKA

Mr. ARNOLD. For inland transportation by star routes in Alaska, the appropriation for 1934 was $135,000, and your estimate for 1935 is the same amount. You have available this year $135,000.

Mr. TABER. And spent $130,701 in 1933.

Mr. ARNOLD. Those contracts extend over, do they, on the same basis for 1935?

This refers to the year 1935, the fiscal year 1935.

Mr. Donaldson, from the Post Office Department, answered, "Yes, sir."

Evidently, Mr. Donaldson was laboring under a misapprehension as to the year involved because the star-route contracts in Alaska terminate on June 30, 1934, and do not extend over into 1935. I know this, because I have been to the Post Office Department and discussed it. Officials of that Department tell me that every star-route contract in Alaska was advertised for last summer; that the bids have been received; and that when they get around to it, they will award the contracts for the fiscal year 1935 and the three succeeding years. Therefore, there is an error somewhere in transcription, or else there was a misapprehension on the part of Mr. Donaldson.

I suppose the committee, seeing that only $130,701 was spent in the fiscal year 1933, thought $132,000 would be sufficient for the fiscal year 1935. But in the meantime and after this hearing was held, as I understand, the bids have come in; and now I am informed by the Post Office Department that the total of the lowest bids for this service for the fiscal year 1935 will exceed $135,000. I do not know how we are going to get mail service in some of those regions unless the amount is increased.

Mr. Chairman, I know how futile it is for me, as Delegate from Alaska, to offer an amendment to this bill unless the committee will accept the amendment. Therefore, I respectfully request the committee to again consult with the officials of the Post Office Department and determine whether or not this amount of $132,000 is not really based upon a misunderstanding and whether it should not be raised to $135,000. As I intimated a moment ago, if this is not done, some of us somewhere in Alaska will suffer from lack of mail service.

In this connection it is worthy of note that the cost of the star-route contracts in Alaska has been coming down slowly but steadily for a good many years, with some variations, and those variations are dependent, I think, upon the necessity of giving emergency contracts where the regular contracts fail. Taking the figures from the Statutes at Large showing appropriations made for the star-route service in Alaska we find the following sums provided for the fiscal years indicated: 1927, $170,000; 1928, $165,000; 1929, $155,000; 1930, $165,000; 1931, $175,000; 1932, $165,000; 1933, $150,000, of which apparently $130,701 was used; and for 1934, $135,000.

I know how the amount came to be so low for the fiscal year 1934. We have no regular contracts for air mail service in Alaska the same as you have in the United States. Nevertheless, several years ago a man named Frank Dorbandt, who was a skillful and bold pilot, determined that he ought to make bids for himself and associates for some of these star-route contracts. He was a better pilot than financier, because he underbid the old dog-team contractors in some cases by as much as 50 percent. Of course, he got the contracts; and, of course, he lost money. He and his associates, losing money, sold out to another company, and this other company lost money and finally sold its assets to the present operating company, the Pacific-Alaska Airways, which, as I understand, is a subsidiary of Pan American Airways. In the meatime, the contracts have been fulfilled at a very low price, but the operators tell me they have continually lost money on these contracts.

Instead of having the level up to $175,170 or $170,000, which is almost as cheap as the service can be performed without loss to the contractors, we find it down to $135,000, and now it has even been cut to $132,000.

I do not suppose I can make you realize what Air Mail Service means to the people in the remote regions of Alaska. I lived there for many years. I remember back in 1905, or thereabouts, the great thrill of pleasure we all had in the camp when the first mail came in. Now, that does not mean the first mail for a year, or 2 years, but the first mail that had ever come into that camp. Why, it was better than almost anything else that could have been offered us. I did not get any letters, and many of the other prospectors did not, but some of the boys did, and they simply glowed with the joy of it. So I can testify from my own experience the great advantage and benefit that is given to the people in these remote regions by having their mail, and having it delivered speedily.

Well, the years have passed since then, and, where it used to take 30 days to haul mail by dog team from Fairbanks to Nome on the Bering Sea, it now takes something like 5 or 6 hours, or at the worst 2 days, by air, stopping at all the intervening camps—2 days against 30. Down on the lower Kuskokwim River, Bethel, where it used to take 40 to 50 days to get mail by dog team—that is half the winter, is it not?—at least half the winter down here, whatever it is in Alaska—mail goes there now in 2 days.

The people of Alaska ought not be penalized because the original contractor who carried mail by air made an error in his estimates. The Government of the United States has in the past 3 or 4 years saved a good many thousand dollars by reason of that error, and the residents of the region served by the star-route contracts where mail has been carried by air have, most of them, been greatly benefited.

As a result of these very low original bids the mail has been carried for several years past in Alaska much below the actual cost to the contractors, but the service has been faithfully performed and the contracts have been carried out.

When the new bids were called for last summer on the star routes in Alaska, for almost the entire interior country they were called for in the alternative. That is to say specifications were prepared which could be met only by the air carriers and other specifications were prepared which could be met by those who used dog teams to carry the mail. Referring to the advertisement of the Post Office Department for these routes we find under no. 78114 an advertisement for the carrying of mails from Nenana or Fairbanks by way of Minchumina, Medfra, McGrath, Sleetmute, Crooked Creek, Napamute, Kalskag, and Akiak to Bethel, 540 miles—form Fairbanks it would be about 600 miles—and back, once a week from about November 1 to about April 1, 26 round trips each year, carrying not to exceed 1,000 pounds of mail a single trip each way by a schedule satisfactory to the Department of not to exceed 5 days' running time each way. I repeat the time limitation, which is not to exceed 5 days' running time each way. This means, of course, that anyone who takes this contract must carry the mail by air, fo rit is humanly impossible to carry it within 5 days running time each way by any other means of transportation. This is coupled with no. 78115 covering the route from Nenana to Diamond. Then further along in the Post Office Department advertisement we find that alternative bids may be offered under nos. 78120, 78121, and 78122, covering substantially the same routes in which there are no limitations as to time and consequently the successful bidders may, if awarded these contracts, carry the mail with dog teams.

I am advised that bids have been received by the Post Office Department both from air carriers and from bidders who plan to carry the mail by dog teams, and those who plan to use dog teams have submitted the lower bids which will not greatly exceed the sum of $135,000 for the service set up by the Budget and for which the bill under consideration allows only $132,000.

If all the bids are awarded to the carriers by dog team, it seems that our Air Mail Service in Alaska is ended for the time being. This would be a great pity. If there is one place in the world where an air service is needed, it is in the Territory of Alaska. If the mail could be carried by railroads all over the Territory, we would have no complaint to make, for we would then have a service prompt and speedy enough to meet our requirements; but if we are obliged to go back to dog-team carriage, it means that after mail from the United States reaches Fairbanks or Nenana, at least 30 days more must elapse before that mail can get to Nome and at least 40 days more must elapse before it can be delivered at Bethel on the lower Kuskokwim.

Now, it may be said that we should be still getting service the same as we had before the airplane came into the picture, and that would be true, but the service will be so much slowed up that the business of this part of the Territory cannot be adequately or properly carried on. I suggest that if any possible way exists to give us the faster service by air, that way should be taken and followed.

The next question is whether we can under any circumstances have service of mail by air, and if so, what the cost will be. In this connection I am advised by the Post Office Department that the total of bids for carrying mail by air over these principal routes which I have mentioned exceeds the bids for carriage of mail by dog team by about $36,000. In view of the benefits of such speedier carriage by air, both to the people of Alaska and to the people of the United States, is not the greater amount which has been bid for carrying mail by air entirely justified? Even adding this increased amount to the appropriation for the current year of $135,000 we should still be only $1,000 above the amount appropriated for the carriage of mails on the star routes for the fiscal year 1927 and $4,000 below the appropriation for the fiscal year 1931.

As I have indicated the benefits would not alone be to the Territory of Alaska but also to the people of the United States who have merchandise to sell that is used in Alaska. Since the United States purchased Alaska from Russia, there has been shipped to Alaska from the United States merchandise in the value of more than $900,000,000. From this alone you will see that Alaska is a valuable customer of the continental United States.

The report of the collector of customs for the calendar year 1932 reveals that during that year the value of merchandise shipped into Alaska from the United States was in excess of $19,500,000. Of course, all of this merchandise does not go into the interior, but a material part of it does, and any reasonable expenditure that will stimulate trade and commerce between the United States and Alaska is well justified.

In some respects, and for a few people, the dog-team transportation of all mail would be an advantage, but I think I am safe in saying that 90 percent of the inhabitants of the regions to be served by these star-route contracts would be greatly benefited through the carriage of mail by air carriers between the principal towns, leaving the dog-team service to the intermediate regions. The question is whether we wish to go backward or forward. Air transportation, and particularly the transportation of mail by air, is here to stay. No substitute for it is in sight, and the people of Alaska are fairly entitled, within reasonable cost, to the same treatment with respect to mail service as the people of the United States; and, as I have pointed out, the improved service in Alaska would benefit the people of the United States almost as much as the residents of those regions of Alaska which are served by the star routes.

It has been developed in the debate on this bill that at the present time the United States is paying to the air mail contractors what amounts to a subsidy of about $7,000,000. Is it out of line to ask that $36,000 be spent as a subsidy, if you want to call it that, for air mail service in Alaska? In this connection I wish to make it clear that this is not a case of awarding the contract to the highest or to some intermediate bidder. It has been reported—in the press, at least—that as to some of the air mail contracts in the United States the lowest bids were rejected and higher bids, perhaps the highest bids, accepted. This is not the case in Alaska. The bids to which I have reference which would insure the carriage of mail by air in Alaska are the lowest bids, and I believe they leave little, if any, probable margin of profit for the bidders. The information on that point which I have is to the effect that in many cases there is not likely to be any profit. I would not think of advocating the acceptance of any but the lowest bids for carrying mail by air. The acceptance of the lowest bids would increase the cost of carrying the mails on these star-route contracts, as heretofore stated, by only about $36,000.

Surely, if the Government has a definite policy to pay what may amount to a subsidy for the development of the air-transportation industry, it is not out of reason to ask for the development of that industry uniformly over the entire United States, including the Territory of Alaska.

There is another feature that is worthy of consideration in connection with this subject and that is the feature of the national-defense program. Anyone who looks at the map will see that in planning the national defense one approach to the continental United States has been overlooked, and that approach lies through the Territory of Alaska. I am not an alarmist, and I do not prophesy war anywhere, and I hope to Heaven that no war may ever come, and that is the general thought and sentiment of the people of the United States. Nevertheless, as a measure of defense of the United States, the Hawaiian Islands have been fortified and there are fortifications of means of defense at various other places along the Pacific coast, but Alaska has been left wide open. Would it not be wise, as a measure of defense and protection, that, through the assistance to air transportation in Alaska, a body of pilots may be trained in civilian work in what is commonly referred to as sub-Arctic flying where flyers may be trained not only through a knowledge of the terrain in Alaska but also through a knowledge of conditions and how they may be met in that vast Territory?
